So far our Lord behaved Himself as the 'root and offspring of David.' But He was also 'the bright and morning star.' And religion was His by a revelation that was immediate, as well as by that which was mediated. Into the secrets of His sublime self-consciousness as the beloved Son of God and one with the Father we cannot penetrate. But His words are before us, with all their august claim: 'It was said by them of old, . . . but I say unto you' (Mt  $5^{216}$  etc.); 'Ye search the Scriptures, . . . but ye will not come to me,' etc. (Jn  $5^{286}$ .). The immediacy of revelation to Him is fully declared in Mt  $112^{6}$ . All things are delivered unterestimated Mt 1127 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father, and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' None has ever challenged that solitary claim. Yet it is notable that our Lord did not shut up His followers to a revelation that is mediated even through His own blessed words.

'Christ found men everywhere ready to receive Him as a Rabbi. On the authorit yof other people they would accept anything. But He insisted on basing what He taught on the authority of their own hearts and consciences. To this end He spoke in parables that they might not understand on any other conditions' (Oman, Vision and Authority, p. 104).

And it is for us to remember that Christ has not left us His revelation, as it were, on deposit. The left us His revelation, as it were, on deposit. partial records of His life, first in the flesh and then in the spirit, which are ours through the NT, are certainly means whereby the Divine grace and truth are mediated to us, providing, indeed, our canon of spiritual judgment. But we are to trust also to the immediacy of Divine access to our minds, knowing that there is a Spirit to lead us into all the truth, enabling us to judge all things and approve those that are excellent (Jn 16<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>10</sup>).* Thus Christianity is like an ever new commandment, being true in Him and in us (1 Jn 2<sup>6</sup>). See, further, art. REVELATION.

2. Religion as response.—The primary response to the resolution of Colleges to the could be supposed.

to the revelation of God may be said to run on three lines, the sense of (a) dependence, (b) estrangement, (c) obligation.

(a) The soul's response in a sense of dependence. The soul, when it comes to itself, finds itself solitary and orphaned. The issues of life run up into eternity, and the soul first proves it is awakened by crying out for the living God. The fact that man is a spiritual being soon asserts itself in the life that is not wholly preoccupied with things temporal. In the words of St. Augustine (Confess.), 'Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless until it find its rest in Thee.' Thus begins a 'commerce, a conscious and willed relation, into which the soul in distress enters with the mysterious power on which it feels that it and its destiny depend' (Sabatier, Outlines, p. 27). This need of security and rest is perfectly met by Christ. He satisfies the soul's sense of dependence by drawing it to Himself. In His Divine Personality men find their long-sought God. To the soul once awakened there is no resting-place except in the eternal Christ, 'the same yesterday and to-day and for ever.

Holding His hand, my steadied feet May walk the air, the seas; On life and death His smile falls sweet, Lights up all mysteries. Stranger nor exile can I be In new worlds where He leadeth me.'

(b) A second primary response of the soul in religion is a sense of sin, or separation. Religion has found expression in sacrifices on account of the well-nigh universal instinct that something must be offered in order to avert the wrath or unkindness of the Deity, or at least to restore happy relations between the worshipper and the world that is beyond his control. Whether they were originally offered in fear of malevolent deities, or in commemoration of the ghosts of the departed, or to renew the covenant of a tribe with its proper deity, does not greatly matter. Suffice it that the sacrifice is intended to restore communion with God in such a way that in the place of guilt and fear there may come a sense of favour through prosperity and peace.

This strong sense of a separateness that may be bridged is more or less efficient in all human response to the Unseen, and is the basis on which the higher religions rest. The danger is that the interest may run out towards the material sacrifice and its attendant rites in such a way that the end is forgotten in the means. But here Christ meets the supreme need of reconciliation in the only worthy way conceivable. On the cross the soul's reliance can be securely planted. It so suffices that all other sacrifices can only be put aside as mistaken, superfluous, and vain (He 1315), unless they are the sacrifices of empty hands and a full

(c) There is a third primary strand of religion in the sense of obligation, by which the soul is brought under a supreme law and purpose. There is a con-

straining influence in all religion, in addition to the feeling of dependence and the sense of estrangement. Religion really begins for us, says Lotze, 'with a feeling of duty' (Phil. of Religion, p. 150). It involves a committal of the life, the framing of its career on lines that often lie athwart the obvious advantages of life. The Indian fakir or Buddhist monk is moved strongly by this sense of obligation, and observes conditions of consecration even to the crippling of his life. But here, again, the faith of Jesus Christ fulfils this need of the soul in a way that liberates and enlarges it. He made that absolute claim on the soul's affection and the life's service to which so many have thankfully responded. He knew human nature too well to ask for a partial surrender, and an obedience in outward things which is hard and toilsome. But His yoke is easy, because it brings the whole life, love, and strength under contribution to a reasonable service; so that 'I ought' is transmuted into 'I must, and the struggling life of division becomes the soaring life of dedication. And as prayer is the expression of the sense of dependence, and exertifice of the consciousness of estrangement, so the sacrament is the symbol of the sense of obliga-

3. True religion embodied in Jesus Christ.—It is evident from this brief analysis of religion on its responsive side, that Christ has the key to all its intimacies, because the meanings of religion are consummated in Himself. The religion which we believe to be universal and everlasting in its character is just the fuller knowledge and obedience of He is His own religion, and therefore He not only harmonizes the various feelings of religion, as we have just seen, by satisfying the desire for security, for reconciliation, and for authority, but He also brings into unity its various forms. There are three chief forms which religion has taken, corresponding to the emotional, intellectual, and volitional elements in human nature:
(a) the ritual side of religion, presided over by the priests, (b) the speculative side, represented by the theologians and philosophers, and (c) the legal or customary side, typified by the office of the scribes. All these departments are resolved in the NT into the headship and hegemony of Christ. He did not incorporate His religion in a hierarchic order (as with the Buddhists), or in philosophical books (as with the Brahmans), or in codes and customs (as with the Confucians and Muhammadans). Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life (Jn 146) for all humanity.

(a) Christ is the perfect expression of the Temple symbolism (He 911.). His name is the shrine (Mt 1820, cf. 2 Co 517); His will is the altar (Mt 2540, cf. 18<sup>20</sup>, cf. 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>); His will is the altar (Mt 25<sup>20</sup>, cf. 2 Co 8<sup>3</sup>). In His self-surrender He is the sacrifice (Mt 26<sup>26,67</sup>, cf. He 10<sup>10</sup>); in His self-manifestation He is the priest (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Having then a great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our confession . . . let us draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace' (He 4<sup>14, 18</sup>). (b) Christ is also the final secret of revelation. The Spirit's work was to be focussed on Himself (Jn 16<sup>14f</sup>.), for to know Him is to know the Father (Jn 14°), and that is life eternal (Jn 17°). This is a wisdom that the rulers of this world never knew (1 Co 265 though prophets and kings have desired to look into it (Lk 10<sup>24</sup>). For the mystery of God is Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col 2<sup>2</sup>). (c) Christ is, moreover, 'the end of the law unto righteousness to everyone that believeth' (Ro 104). His spirit of love is a law of liberty to His disciples (Jn 13<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>14</sup>, cf. Ja 1<sup>23</sup>). Keeping the commandments is consummated in following Him (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>), i.e. walking in love (Eph 511.); for love is the fulfilling

of law (Ro 1310) and solves the complicated problems of social life (Ro 1418).

The three provinces of religious manifestation correspond with the three primary sensibilities of the religious life. The religious philosopher seeks to rationalize the consciousness of dependence on some theistic basis. The priest comes into being through the urgent need of reconciliation. The scribe meets the desire for some authority amid the tangled questions of practical life. Thus Christianity, which is essentially a life hid with Christ in God, is always in danger of being drawn down to the level of those who would reduce religion to a ritual of worship, a system of thought, or a fashion of life. But the fact that Jesus Christ is His own religion is the one guarantee of religion arriving at perfection. For it may truly be said that religion is in its essence the consciousness of personal being under the eye of the eternal Personality. It is surely too vague to define it, with Max Müller, as a 'perception of the infinite,' or, with Schleiermacher, as the 'immediate consciousness of the eternal in the temporal.' Lotze gives the following propositions as the characteristic convictions of the religious mind: (1) Moral laws embody the will of God; (2) individual finite spirits are not products of nature, but are children of God; (3) resulty is more and other than the mere course of nature, it is a kingdom of God. In each of these propositions the note of personality is sounded, both subjectively and objectively. And Ritschl states one side of this truth strongly when he explains religion out of 'the necessity which man feels of maintaining his personality and spiritual independence against the limitations of Nature.' But surely the religious man is at equal pains to assure himself of an all-embracing Personality at the heart of things, to which his own soul can return and be at rest (Ps 1167). That being so, we can see that only through Christ, the Godman, can this twofold consciousness be securely maintained, and the balance kept elements in religion.

In Christ is perfected both the revelation and the response. He is the focus of revelation and the norm of religion. In fact, 'He reveals most because He awakens most' (Matheson, Growth of Spirit of Christianity, p. 8). He enables us to see in God our Father, because He quickens in us a Christianity of the High Spirit of Christianity of the High Spirit of Christianity of the Spirit of Christianity of the High Spirit o filial consciousness and behaviour. As for His revelation of Godhead, men have seen in Him that interwoven authority of love and law, of truth and grace, which gives fulness of meaning to the conceptions of a Father in heaven, free-will and human immortality. As for the response which He has awakened in men, they have been won to His ideal through His fulfilment of filial and fraternal obligations in His sacrificial life. The authority and the obedience were alike pre-eminent in the Cross. Thence came the kindling spark which made the Person of Christ a vital religious fact for humanity. Man had thought of himself as being in some sense on a cross because of the presence of suffering, sin, and death; and, so far as he was religious, tried by ritual to propitiate the Almighty, by philosophy to vindicate His ways, by methods of conduct to reduce the mischief of evil. But in Christ crucified man has found God Himself on the cross; and with Him there, there can be no injustice in suffering, no victory for sin, no sting

4. Characteristics of Christ's religion.—Having set this corner-stone, it only remains to mention seven characteristics of the religion which is derived from Jesus Christ and lives upon Him still.

(1) Christ has made religion personal in its uthority. He is the only and absolute Lord. authority. His spirit has broken and broken again the bands of ecclesiastical systems which multiply the scruples of conscience. The authority which is not as that of the scribes has been in more or less effectual operation through all the history of Christendom. Unlearned men, the weak and foolish of this world, have more than held their own in the name of Jesus of Nazareth (Ac 4, cf. 1 Co 1261.). His people have gone forth, indifferent to praise or blame, favour or persecution, and even suspending their judgment of one another on the ground that to their own Master they stand or fall, before whose judgment-seat all must appear (Ro 14<sup>4-10f.</sup>). Heroic exploits have been undertaken and meanest duties performed by those whose one desire is to be wellpleasing unto Him (He 1321) whom not having seen Christianity loses its secret they love (1 Pl8). when it forgets the glorious egotism of the Master, who not only made Himself a law to the disciples who accompanied His ministry (Mt 23<sup>10</sup>), but gave Himself back to them as more than ever theirs after death (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>, Jn 20. 21). Christian mysticism is not only in place, it is imperative for the believer. Though he may not rise to the full height of St. Paul's 'Not I, but Christ' (Gal 290), he must be in

(2) Christ made religion human in its sympathy. It was stamped upon the remembrance of His disciples that He went about doing good. Jesus presented to a world much given to religiosity the problem of One who reserved His devotions for the solitude of night, and filled His days, including the Sabbaths, with helping the needy and the outcast. True, He went up to the national Feasts (Jn 2<sup>13</sup> etc.), but He was most Himself when He provided a miraculous meal of His own (Mk 6356.||). True, He revered the Temple; but the occasions of His triumphs, and the moment of His transfiguration, were in secular places (Mt 17<sup>1fr</sup>.||). True, He was were in securar places (Mt 17<sup>-11</sup>). True, He was subject unto the Law; but He made its requirements a secondary consideration when the cause of humanity was at stake (Mk 2<sup>2267</sup>, 3<sup>167</sup>). These incidents are typical of the attitude of Jesus towards religious duty. He denounced the advocates of 'Corban,' and those who 'devoured widows' houses and for a pretence made long prayers'; demanded 'mercy instead of sacrifice, and reconciliation rather than ritual' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>23t</sup>); and declared that the service of the 'little ones,' the least of His brethren, was the true way of honouring the Father in heaven (Mt 10<sup>40</sup> 25<sup>40</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14</sup>). Slowly the disciples were weaned from their contempt for the multitude, their disparagement of women and children (Mk 10<sup>135</sup>.), their vexation with men like Bartimeus and Zaccheus who interfered with their religious plans (v. 48, Lk 197). At last they deserved the name of 'League of Pity.' Their first social experiment was to have all things in common Their first economic problem was how to distribute alms most wisely to the widows (Ac 61). They invented a new virtue called 'brotherly love,' in which all shared who were of the faith, whatever their status or nationality. The revolution which Christ effected in humanizing the conception of religion may be clearly seen in a study of words. There were three Greek words for service: διακονία, which was used for service from man to man, chiefly reserved for slaves; λειτουργία, which was used for the service of a man to the commonwealth; and λατρεία, for the service rendered to the gods.

The Christian consciousness rejected the last word; but adopted and hallowed the other two, which stood for human, not Divine service. They appear in 'deacon' and 'liturgy' respectively: the third word is left embedded in idolatry.—See, further, below, § 5.

(3) Christ has made religion moral in its character, because He is pre-eminently the Saviour from sin. Religion under other auspices may mean almost anything but a moral conflict and victory. It may even, as in various Asiatic beliefs, spread its sanction over immorality. And even where there is a high ethical standard, as in Confucianism, goodness is rather a codified substitute for religion than the vital substance of it. Nowhere but in Christianity is love for God identified with a passion for real righteousness and inmost cleansing. Not that there is no teaching to this end in the OT. On the contrary, it is the main burden of the prophets. And John the Baptist stood in the true succession when he turned religion into the terms of a repentant and reconstructed life. But it too easily became a means to an end, so that personal righteousness became subsidiary to national rights. And goodness became so degenerate in the chair of the scribes that their ideal was not so much rectitude as correctitude.

But the religion of the Sermon on the Mount breathes out a holiness which consumes every lesser thing, and carries the moral imperative into the inmost recesses of the soul. It is a remarkable thing that Jesus brought so few charges of sin against the irreligious people. If one might venture on a reason, it is that sin itself, i.e. the enthronement of self against God, meant so much to Him that He let other things pass in order to strike at the Prince of this world (Jn 12<sup>81</sup> 16<sup>11</sup>). His life and spiritual presence have made men conscious of sin without the aid of any catalogue of transgres-sions. On the other hand, Christ's conception of morality was always warm and positive, on the ground that 'no virtue is safe that is not enthusiastic' (Seeley, Ecce Homo, ch. i.). Every token of self-abandonment in humility, faith, and love drew forth His admiration, whether it was the quiet confidence of the centurion (Mt 8<sup>56</sup>, Lk 17<sup>26</sup>), the moral enthusiasm of the young ruler (Mk 10<sup>176</sup>,||), the sacrificial giving of the poor widow (12<sup>126</sup>,||), or the overflowing repentance of the woman who wept at His feet (Lk 7<sup>366</sup>). Every human trait that escaped the imprisonment of self was in the eyes of Jesus the material of true religion. And it was a radiant goodness, unconscious and unlaboured, in the early Christians that chiefly arrested the attention of the world.

(4) Christ has made religion individual in its esponsibility, because He is the Lord of all. Religion always tends to congeal into a system. There is, of course, a solidarity of mankind, of which religion must take note, of which indeed it is an expression. Sin is a common inheritance, and redemption, too, is a universal fact. It is on this truth that the gospel of Jesus rests. But starting from this truth the gospel lays a test and an obligation on individuals as such. There is no safeguard in being a son of Abraham or a disciple of Moses without giving personal credence, allegiance, and service.  $\mu b \nu o \nu \pi i \sigma \tau e \nu e$  is the keyword by which the individual escapes from 'an evil and adulterous generation,' and all that threatens the full exercise of personality. From the beginning Jesus kept the multitude at the distance of a strait gate and a narrow way, which can be traversed only by one at a time, by the giving of the will, and the crucifying of the self. And what is true of entrance to the kingdom holds good of its final appointments. Punishment will be proportioned to knowledge and reward to fidelity. With all to knowledge and reward to fidelity. With all that He Himself brought, Jesus did not allow men to take anything for granted, but bade them watch, as if on that alone hung the issue of the day.

(5) Christ has made religion spiritual in its essence, because 'the Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co 3!7) as God is Spirit (Jn 424). Religion is apt to become a mere sediment of observance, a shell from which the life has departed. It certainly was so in the days of our Lord; it threatens to be so still. The words in vogue among the Greeks were λατρεία and θρησκεία, the latter word being translated 'religion' in Ac 26° and Ja 126°, the former 'service' in Jn 16°, Ro 9° 12¹, He 9¹. 6. But they only connoted rites of worship and sacrifice: they were old bottles which could not be entrusted with the new spirit of Christianity. St. James uses  $\theta \rho \eta \sigma \kappa \epsilon d$  almost ironically when he says that 'pure religion and undefiled is visiting widows in their affliction and keeping one's self uspotted from the world.' St. Paul (Ro 12¹) takes up λατρεία and θυσία with equal scorn, qualifying the former word with λογική and the latter with ζωσα, before allowing them to be applicable to Christianity.

It was in this way that Christ Himself had dealt with the prayers and almagiving of pious Jews (Mt 61.4); and the whole tendency of professional (Mt 6<sup>-12</sup>); and the whole tendency of professional separatism among the Pharisees (cf. Pro Christo et Ecclesia). His Father 'sees in secret,' and 'seeks those to be his worshippers who worship in spirit and in truth' (Mt 6<sup>4</sup>, Jn 4<sup>34</sup>). By resting religion on spirituality, and giving free access by the Spirit to the Father (Ro 5<sup>3</sup>, Eph 2<sup>18</sup>), the whole basis of the seafficial existent was an accountage and access. the sacrificial system was undermined and sacerdotalism became an anachronism.

'The socsety as founded by Christ has in its collective being a priestly character, but is without an official priesthood. It has no temple save the living man; no sacrifices save those of the spirit and the life (Faarbalra, Christ is Modern Theology,

(6) Christ made religion independent in its action, because, as He once said, 'My kingdom is not of this world' (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>) Being the expression of His eternal Spirit, Christianity has never been stamped or cramped by the language of a given period or the fashion of a particular people. His gospel, being a secret of personal experience, has received a most varied witness even within the NT. It has continually broken through language and escaped. And while the Christian religion in its purity has always been able to shake itself free from the encombrance of a theological system, it has been no less an independent spirit in regard to other departments of human activity. It has been free to enter and often able to renew them without being itself captured in the process. Political movements, new departures in art, and even advances in science, have as often as not received guidance and support from the Christian spirit. But to none of them has it remained captive, hecause it moves by right in a higher realm. Thus age cannot stale its infinite variety. It exercises the royal prerogative of lending to all, but borrowing nothing ing nothing in return, and so is free for every emergency which history unfolds in the whole compass of humanity.

(7) Christ has made religion missionary in its outlook, because He is the Saviour of the world. Christianity is not equipped like, e.g., Muhammadanism, for capturing whole tribes at once, for it is not, properly speaking, nationalist in its range. But it stands alone among all other religions in its power to emancipate individuals, and ultimately to regenerate society in every race under the sun. It takes secure root in the universul soil of human needs and possibilities, and with such a grip it is in command of the future. All it waits for is that its professors should realize that it increases in proportion as it is given away, and is truly known only by those who try to make it known.

Christ always believed in small beginnings, but His hope was ever set on great and triumphant conclusions. That He was alone, with nowhere to lay His head, did not trouble Him, for He knew that when He was lifted up from the earth He would draw all men unto Him (Jn 122). That His would draw all men unto Him (Jn 12<sup>m</sup>). That His disciples were not wise and learned satisfied Him perfectly, because He saw them (metaphorically speaking) seated on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. That none of the rulers believed on Him did not perturb Him greatly; for He foreast the time when they would come from the east and the west, the north and the south, to sit down in the Kingdom of God (Lk 13<sup>m</sup>). His parables suggested His confidence in the irresistible constant of the lives of men who had once been work. tagion of the lives of men who had once been won for the Kingdom. He likened His word to a fire (Lk 1246), to leaven (Mt 1388), to a seed (v.16), so potent is its influence on life and on society. And because the needs of the world are so great and deep, and the fields white unto harvest, He gave Himself up wholly to the ingathering work of the Father, and, more than that, He laid it as a last charge and responsibility upon His disciples that they should go out into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature (Mt 2819).

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. — 1. Evidential value of religious experience. Experience is the ultimate test of truth. All knowledge comes from within. World-knowledge, self-knowledge, God-knowledge, all equally depend upon the trust-worthiness of this inner organ of information. A universal experience, or an intuitive consciousness, gives us knowledge lifted to the highest power. That which is most universal and most enduring is vouched for by the nature of things. religious consciousness is as clear and universal as the world-consciousness. It is as natural to man as volition or mathematics. Every baby is born blind and dumb and without the power to will, and there may be some tribes with poor eyes and slow tongues and no theology; but in normal humanity there is a latent capacity for sight and speech and volition, and at least a hope that the soul has relations with the supernatural. Religion is not something miraculous. It is as natural to man as eyesight and star-gazing. It is as normal as any physiologic function. Modern psychology has indisputably proved that religious experience is as closely related to the nerves and blood as puberty; the vital organs and psychic mechanism are built with reference to it. Its importance and value to the race are doubly starred, for 'its best fruits are the best things history has to show (James, Varieties of Religious Experience, p. 259). To doubt its verscity would be an insolence to the Providence of the universe. Modern psy-Modern psychology has only emphasized Augustine's decision : 'Lord, if we are deceived, we are deceived by Thee.' It is because the NT grew out of, and is the record of, genuine first-hand religious experience that it has the gift of tongues, and can speak to every man in the language wherein he was born.

2. Pre-requisites of religious experience. The great fundamental pre-requisites of religious experi-ence the Gospels take for granted. There is no more of an attempt to prove God's existence than man's existence, or God's power of speech than man's. God loves to speak to man, and man can understand. God is the imperative preliminary to all religious life; He is the chief factor in its continuance and perfecting. Each soul possesses as its birthright a knowledge of moral distinctions, a sense of moral obligation, a conscious power of obedience or disobedience to such law as the soul knows. All this, where not affirmed, is assumed by all the Gospel writers.

2. Pre-Christian religious experience.—Much of the religious experience described in the Gospels is pre-Christian. Primitive Christianity never imagined that a rich religious experience was not possible outside the Christian community. The Divine Shepherd has 'other sheep' besides the Israelites (Ju 10°). Jesus Himself expressly affirms

* Professor James, from a study perhaps ton largely developments of the religious emotions, reaches nevertheless the significant conclusion that, 'if intercourse between man and God is not a fact, then religion does not study contain elements of delusion, but is rooted in delusion altogether' (op. cst. p. 465, cf. p. 547).

this, and refers to Naaman the Syrian, the widow of Zidon, the Roman centurion, and the Syrophemician woman as possessing better religious experience than their Jewish neighbours, and definitely announces that 'many' shall come from the heathen nations and enter the future Kingdom in peace (Jn 12<sup>25, 25</sup>, Lk 4<sup>26–26</sup>, Mk 7<sup>26</sup>, Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 15<sup>26</sup>). So, the Samaritans were at various times praised by Jesus, and one of them was selected as the ideal type of brotherhood (Lk 7<sup>11, 19</sup> 10<sup>26–27</sup>). Yet, while Jesus proclaimed faith and gratitude and compassion to be religious virtues wherever found, and evidently preferred honest heresy to thoughtless orthodoxy, He nevertheless regarded Gentiles and Samaritans as heretics, and the Jews as the natural 'children of the kingdom' (Mt 8<sup>12</sup>; cf. 18<sup>17</sup>, Jn 4<sup>28</sup>). The Apostles were all Jews, and the holy men and women whose prayers and hymns filled the earth with prophetic hope at the birth of John and Jesus were representative OT saints. They had been 'prepared for the Lord' (Mk 1<sup>17</sup>), and were 'prayerful,' devout,' and 'righteous' people who 'rejoiced in God,' being 'filled with the Holy Ghost,' and could depart this world 'in peace' (Lk 1<sup>4, 47, 47</sup> 2<sup>26–26</sup>, ef. Jn 1<sup>47</sup>). Such religious fruit does not grow on a tree with a rotten root.

4. Christian experience contrasted with all other religious experience.—Nevertheless, as compared even with the best religious experiences of the Old Covenant, those of the New seemed like 'new wine' (Mk 250), like newly discovered treasure (Mt 1354), like a wedding day (Mt 915), like the 'one pearl of great price' (Mt 1354), like a king's banquet (Mt 225), like the rising of the sun (Lk 170, cf. Jn 171). The religious knowledge and outlook even of that holy prophet and herald of whom Jesus Himself said that there had been 'none greater born of women,' were to be so eclipsed that he who was 'little' in the New Kingdom should be greater than he (Mt 1111). New standards, new ideals, new spiritual magnitudes, above all, a new spiritual dynamic had appeared, and with these a totally new spiritual experience. The new things introduced by the gospel have often been catalogued, but Jesus was the supremely new thing in the new religion. Much of the teaching, even its central Golden Rule, was old, but He was new. He, not His teaching, was the centre of the new gospel. He was the gospel; Himself the glad tidings of great joy. His coming brought a new morning to the world (Lk 178), and originated a new vision of righteousness and a new sunrise type of religious experience in the scale of men.

5. Religious experience of Jesus.—But although Jesus created a new religion characterized by strangely new religious dispositions, it is a difficult task to discover from the records the facts concerning His own soul life. That He prayed and had the inner certainty of reply; that He was tempted; accepted the Father's will even when unexplained to Him; that He had great confidence in God, and felt a peculiar harmony between Himself and the Infinite Goodness,—all this, and much more, is known. But did the self-identity with the moral law which He claimed (Jn 14°, cf. Mk 8<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>, Mt 5<sup>17</sup>) involve the consciousness of self-identity with Jehovah? So St. John's Gospels, He claimed a jurisdiction here and hereafter which no other sane man has ever ventured to claim. He showed no hesitancy in calling Himself 'meek and lowly,' while in almost the same breath He demanded absolute submission of intellect and will from all who expected to remain His 'friends,' or hoped to be at peace with God hereafter (e.g.
Mt 7<sup>312</sup> 11<sup>322</sup>, Lk 6<sup>46</sup>, Jn 15<sup>14</sup>). Even in Mk. He is represented as claiming, without misgiving, to be the expected Messiah and Judge of the world (8<sup>32</sup>), who has power to forgive sins (210), and to whom all men owe absolute spiritual allegiance (834.38). The other Synoptics, as well as Jn., specifically represent Him as claiming to be superior to the wisest lawgivers and prophets of the past (Mt 1242 195, Lk 1131, Jn 117).—One whose mission in the world was to give His life a ransom for the race (Jn 316, cf. Mk 1046), Himself the centre and object of the devotion of all men loyal to the inner light (Lk 1914 2018, Jn 546 711), the only Being who knew God (Mt 1127), a Saviour and Judge whose 'Depart from me' was the severest penalty which could be pronounced on guilty man (Mt 111 723). Yet, notwithstanding all this, He is represented in every Gospel as being peculiarly calm, sincere, humble, and self-forgetful, possessing a heart of singular purity, having not the slightest doubt of His own right relationship to God, trusting the inner witness perfectly, and constantly possessing a peace 'deep as the unfathomed sea,' which peace He believed He could impart to others. The self-consciousness of Jesus was the spring underneath the Templealtar, out of which flowed the healing waters of Christianity.

8. Christ's relation to Christian experience.—

6. Christ's relation to Christian experience.—Whatever we think, who never ate at the same table with Him, there is not the slightest doubt as to what the earliest Christians thought of Jesus. They never attempted to analyze His states of consciousness,—He was to them the object rather than the subject of religion,—but of one thing they were absolutely sure, it was He who had worked the mighty change in them. Whereas they had been blind, they could now see; whereas they had been helpless, they now had conscious victory over sin; and new powers in many directions were theirs. These new experiences came through Him. In coming to Him they had found God, and a new type of thought and life had appeared within themselves. Jesus Christ was the source of this change of personality. All the NT writers agree as to this.

of personality. All the NT writers agree as to this. A writer in the JE (art. 'Jesus'), though believing that Jesus never claimed to be the Messiah, at the same time acknowledges that 'his most striking characteristic was his claim that spiritual peace and salvation were to be found in the mere acceptance of his leadership. Nathaniel Schmidt (Prophet of Nazareth, 1906) also makes a suggestive admission when he says that, while Jesus never claimed to be the Messiah, yet all the hopes of OT prophets embodied in King, Redeemer, and Divine Manifestation were more than fulfilled in Him; and although He never, and historically He has actually been the Saviour of the world, and is saving men yet (pp. 8, 208, 317).

That Jesus Christ was the Saviour every man needed, One who could save up to and beyond the limit of the man's best hope, was the common thought of those who most thoughtfully observed His influence and reported His words. It is constantly assumed as a fact of consciousness, and often declared in unequivocal language, that every man has so flagrantly sinned against light and become such a slave to sin that he needs the very power of the Almighty to enable him to fulfil his moral duty and reach his spiritual ideal. He needs more than one act of omnipotence. He needs a God who will come and stay close to him, ruling the life, not from without but from within (Mk 715, Mt 158, Lk 1721, Jn 421 151-6). The earliest Christians are unanimous in the declaration that in coming to Jesus Christ they had found the Father, and that He was not afar off but within; and after Pentecest they speak of the inward Presence either as 'God,' 'Spirit of God,' 'Holy Spirit,' or 'Spirit of Christ.'

7. Origin of Christian experience.—Herein lies the explanation of the earliest typical Christian experience. The new religion was rooted in a new conception of the Holy Ghost. A perfected Christian experience was not possible until after Pentecost. There is no emphasis in the Gospels upon personal experience. They have to do with 'Jesus only.' His statements as to truth and His promise of future blessedness were sufficient grounds of certainty without any 'experiences' to corroborate them. Salvation, according to the earliest Christian Gospel, is proved not by personal experience but by practical morality, a compassionate spirit, and obedience to the inner law—this inner law being objectified in Jesus Christ when He is known (Mt 25<sup>14-46</sup>). The proper use of talents, helpfulness, mercifulness, prayerfulness, and love for brother man—these are the marks of a Christian. To be humble and self-forgetful, to care for the poor, and the sick, and the sinful—this is to 'inherit the kingdom' (Mt 614). A man may be a member of Christ's Kingdom even though he has not consciously been serving Him (Mt 25<sup>27-28</sup>). He who forgives shall be forgiven (Mt 6<sup>14</sup>). To be a Christian is not to 'accept the word with joy,' but to live, bearing fruit (Mt 1320-23, Lk 813). In Mk. it is not even remembered that Jesus ever promised 'joy,' or 'peace,' or 'rest.' These words do not meet us in this earliest Gospel. Jesus was the sole object of thought. How a disciple felt was of too little importance to be noticed. In Mt. Jesus, and the result is 'rest' (e.g. 726 1129 1328). In Jn. the transforming principle is Jesus, who is 'the Word' and 'the Life,' and the result is 'peace' (3.623 1421 178). With St. Paul the transforming principle is Jesus, who is 'peace' (3.623 1421 178). 'peace' (3' 6'3 14'3' 17's). With St. Paul the transforming principle is the Holy Ghost applying the redemption purchased by the blood of the cross, and the result is 'joy' and 'glory.' In the Synoptics the command is 'Come,' and if you endure to the end you 'shall be saved.' In Jn. the command is 'Believe,' and he that believeth 'hath everlasting life.' With St. Paul the central interrogation is, 'Have you received the Holy Ghost?'—if so, you 'have been saved' (cf. Eph 2's). In the Synoptics it is following Jesus that is emphasized; in Jn. it is being united with Him in His death. In the Synoptics salvation is educational: in Jn. In the Synoptics salvation is educational; in Jn. it is biological; in St. Paul's letters it is sacrificial. The first type of thought emphasized the fact of salvation, the second its psychology, the third its philosophy. In their deepest meaning these three are one; but they represent three types of Christian thought, from which resulted three types of Christian doctrine and Christian experience. Each type finds its root in the Gospel teaching; but the appeal to the 'inner witness,' the making prominent of Christian experience, and the rise of what may be called the emotional type of Christianity, are all post-Pentecostal developments. So long as Jesus remained with them, the disciples did not think it worth while to talk of themselves, or notice their own inward emotions or mental experiences. But Jesus left them, and in utter loneliness and sorrow they stood gazing into the heavens which had received Him. But at Pentecost they began to awaken to the fact that He was still alive, still near them, still able to talk with them, and make their hearts burn as He talked. their eyes were turned within, and Christian experience began to be of vital theological importance. It was the new Christian thought of the Holy Ghost which gave birth both to the Johannine and to the Pauline theologies and experiences. The Holy Spirit represented Christ in the believer's heart. It spake with the authority of God Himself, and in the very accents of the One now gone. Christ was with them again. He had promised to come, and to abide with them always (Jn 6<sup>50</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>). He had kept His promise. The Word was again incarnate, and was in each one of them. The believer's flesh was His flesh (cf. Eph 5<sup>50</sup>), and especially the startling words of 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup> à δὲ κύριος τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστω). This discovery, that it was the Lord Jesus Himself who was speaking within them in the Person of the Holy Ghost, brought the experiences of the soul into new importance. It was this consciousness of the indwelling Christ which filled the hearts of the early Christians with joy, and made them a wonder to the heathen world.

Typical Christian experience did not begin until Pentecost (Jn 7<sup>20</sup>, Ac 2<sup>17</sup> 19<sup>2</sup>); yet the Synoptic Gospels contain all the roots of the beautiful rod which budded in those later ecstatic experiences. Although, when a sinner repented and was forgiven, it was only the joy of God and the angels which the Synoptics thought important enough to mention (Lk 15<sup>21,10</sup>), incidentally we learn that the return to God brings a kiss to the soul and a song to the lips (Lk 15<sup>22,24</sup>). It was a home-coming. There can be no doubt that 'praising God,' and 'gladness of heart,' and an exhilaration which was like the exhilaration of wine, were characteristic of the earliest Christian experiences (Ac 2<sup>15,46,47</sup>). Every later A postolic experience, however jubilant, appears prophetically in Jn. (e.g. 4<sup>26</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>20, 22, 24</sup> 17<sup>18</sup>).

8. Range and content of Christian experience.

No part of human nature is excluded from the influence of saving grace. Schleiermacher centred religion in the feelings, Hegel in the intellect, Kant in the will; but Jesus Christ centred it in the man. The Torah of Jesus brought into loftiest prominence the fact that all man's faculties of sensibility, intellect, and volition must be brought to focus in the act and state of loving self-surrender to God (Mk 12<sup>80</sup>). Christian experience, as depicted in the NT, includes a new intellectual vision, a radical shifting of the emotional centre, and a rectification and strengthening of the will.

The first step in a typical Christian experience is the recognition of a new horror in sin. Sin is a more hateful and deadly thing to the Christian than to the Hebrew or the Babylonian. It is not only an epidemic universal and fatal (Jn 129), a blood-poisoning (9th 15<sup>22</sup> 24), worse than a lifelong paralysis (5<sup>14</sup>), which may be eternal (Mk 329), a slavery (Jn 824), and an insanity (Lk 15<sup>17</sup>); it is ungrateful (166), traitorous (Mk 229), unfilial (Lk 15<sup>11</sup>); the assassination of one's higher self (920), and a fratricidal blow at Jesus Christ (Mt 2128, Lk 922). The cross shows God's thought of sin, and those who have seen the cross get a totally new view of the guilt of sin. Jesus can never be seen as a Saviour, in the Gospel sense, until a man sees himself to be a lost sinner having no hope of help except from God (Lk 742 15<sup>4-32</sup> 19<sup>10</sup>). It is no sign of 'healthy-mindedness' to feel no terror of sin. The 'neurotic state' is not one of keen sorrow for sin, but a state of hardness and callousness (e.g. Lk 15<sup>17</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>1</sup>). Repentance is not a 'pathological condition of melancholia,' which is to be avoided; it is the sinner's only hope. It is the goodness of God which leadeth him to repentance. To be 'pricked to the heart' when one faces the cross is characteristic of a genuine Christian experience. When one reaches a state where he cannot feel these sharp goads of pain, then even God Himself cannot help him (Mt 12<sup>21</sup>· 41, cf. He 68). Sackcloth and ashes are the appropriate clothing for the penitent (Mt 11<sup>21</sup>). Yet it is not the emotional drapery, but the decisive action of the soul away from the wrong and towards the right (i.e. Christ) which is made emphatic (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). The first call is to repentance (Mk 118). This is the first call is to repentance (Mk 118). This is the first call is to repentance (Mk 118). This is the first call is to repentance (Mk 118). This is the first call is to repentance (Mk 118). This is the first call is to repentance of the man co-operating with the constant effort of Christian experience. It is a radical change of mind (μετανοέω), involving a radical change of front (ἐπιστρέφω). The response of the will to revealed duty is the 'Yea' or 'Nay' to God's call. With the 'Yea' his eyes open, and he gets new vision. Sin can shut out even the sight of God and blind the soul to the difference between good and evil (Mt 12<sup>24</sup>). Purity of intent and purpose cleanses the lens of the intellectual telescope so that one can see God; and when one sees God, many other things previously obscured become visible (Jn 4<sup>29</sup>

Saving faith, according to the Gospels, centres in Christ. It is not faith in one's self or in one's own salvation, present, past, or future; it is a loyal surrender to Him who represents the soul's highest ideal of right, as Lord. Having accepted Him as Lord, the soul then finds Him to be Saviour (Jn 528. 24). In the Synoptics the words *lovi, **marelo* do not mean as much as with St. John and St. Paul, because the words 'Christ' and 'Saviour' did not mean as much; but in every case the surrender is to Jesus up to the level of all the light received. Whosoever 'wills to do his will' shall know at least this, that Jesus can be trusted (717, cf. 928). The testimonies to conscious personal trust in Jesus Christ as the supreme standard of right and the never-failing and ever-present Helper of all sin-sick souls, fill every page of the NT. The result of the exercise of faith is not infrequently a change of opinion and judgment; it is always a change of opinion and volitional relation to God. The man's whole nature changes. Jn. states this by the strongest possible figure—that of a second birth (310); but the Synoptics hint prophetically at the same thing. The man must make a new beginning, as radical as if he had become a child again (Mt 528 183, cf. Mk 1015). A new seed of personality must be planted within him (Lk 84-18 1711). There must be a change of the life passion (Mt 628 1029). Newborn thoughts and feelings and powers must develop until the vital functions are practically reversed (Mk 825 1230. 35, Mt 53-10 1625, Lk 1730).

St. Paul constantly dwells upon this. The new life which one consciously obtains through faith in Jesus Christ is likened to that which would be needed in quickening a corpse or bringing about a resurrection from the dead (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>, Col 2<sup>13</sup>, Eph 2<sup>3</sup>). The man obtains a new self, as if he had been recreated (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). Christ has started a new race, as truly as did Adam (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>), and the result is a new manhood, a new humanity (τον καινό [τον νίον] ἄνθρωνον, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>), governed by a new law of life.

All the Gospel writers mention, though incidentally or prophetically, the liberty and the new strength and courage to will and to do the right which come with trust in Jesus, as well as the new and glad sense of love for both man and God (e.g. Mk 12<sup>30, 31</sup>, Mt 11<sup>30</sup> 25<sup>40</sup>, Lk 6<sup>32</sup> 11<sup>21, 22</sup>, Jn 8<sup>36</sup>). One is not merely conscious of his own sincerity; he can testify that a Father's welcome has been given him, and that Christ has 'manifested' Himself to him (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>, Jn 14<sup>21</sup>). Perhaps the Gospel doctrine most fully developed in the later writings of the NT is that of spiritual unity with Christ, through self-surrender to become one with Him. This doctrine is found in germ in every Gospel, but comes to complete flower in the profound teachings of St. John. Unity with Christ does not, however, mean identity. The disciple may be perfectly like his Lord, but magnitudes differ. The best experience has in it a good hope of a better experience. Unity with the Divine does not make man a god, but splendidly and fully human. The Ego not only finds peace when it turns to God, but finds itself (Mt 10<sup>30</sup> 15<sup>16, 25</sup>, Lk 15<sup>16, 17</sup>). Progress is now possible. The man can now 'win' his own soul (Lk 21<sup>19</sup>). Jesus lifts life out of the 'tragedy of the commonplace' by offering to it a perfect ideal and the highest possible impulse to reach it. This and more grace, life and more life (Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>).

RENDING OF GARMENTS.—The practice of signifying grief by tearing the clothes. There were four occasions on which rending of garments was enjoined by the Jewish Law: (1) death; (2) the apostasy of a member of the family; (3) the destruction, during persecution, of a copy of the Law: (4) blasphemy. In the case of a member of the family becoming apostate the clothes were rent as for his death, and the mourners sat for one hour on the ground and ate bread and ashes. The הלכית קדיקה (Laws of Rending) are very minute, and embrace no fewer than thirty-nine rules. For the dead the rending was to be performed just before the body was finally hid from view, and it was to be done standing. Both sexes were ordered to rend the clothes 'to the heart,' i.e. to the skin, but in supposed obedience to Jl 2<sup>13</sup> it was to be 'no farther than the navel.' For father or mother all the garments were rent till the breast was exposed, but a woman was enjoined to rend her under garment in private, and to wear it reversed. This was for the sake of decorum, and the outer garment was then rent in public without her skin being exposed. For other relations (brothers and sisters) the outer garment only was rent. For father and mother the rent was over the heart, but in the case of others on the right side. The rent garment was worn for thirty days. The rent was ordered to be of the size of a fist (non). It was not to be repaired in the case of mourning for parents till the time of mourning was past, but for others it might be loosely drawn together, leaving a ragged tear, after seven days, and properly repaired after thirty days. A woman, however, might in all cases repair after seven days. The rending of clothes was not to take place on the Sabbath, but if it were done on that day in excess of grief, it was excusable on account of the piety it betokened. No rending of garments was obligatory unless news of the death were received within thirty days, except in the case of the death of parents.

The action of Caiaphas (Mt 26<sup>50</sup>, Mk 14<sup>53</sup>) is an instance of the rending of garments for blasphemy. In this case the high priest was enjoined to rend 'both his outer and his inner garments with a rent that could never be repaired.'

RENUNCIATION.—Ideas of renunciation in the teaching of Jesus may be classed under three heads: (1) renunciation of what is sinful, (2) surrender of worldly possessions, (3) special self-abnegation. It may not be possible to draw clear lines of demarcation, but these divisions are nevertheless distinct. The cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches and the lusts of other things (Mk 4<sup>19</sup>), that check the life of the soul as weeds choke the growth of the grain, may be said to indicate them in the reverse order.

1. Sin, of course, is to be renounced without qualification or compromise; and whatsoever leads to sin. The 'thou shalt not' of the Decalogue is carried into the inner sphere with an extent and thoroughness of application not known to the law-givers of the world. 'We have renounced,' says St. Paul, 'the hidden things of dishonesty' (2 Co 4²). But Christ's commands go farther. 'If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out' (Mt 5²²² ²²² 18² ²²). These laws require not only the renunciation of whatever desire, impulse, aim, or intention is contrary to the will of God, but also of things innocent that might tend to 'lead into temptation'; the renunciation of that trebly manifested evil (1 Jn 2¹²) by which the world is placed in antagonism to the Father.

2. Rennciation in its bearing on temporal possessions is expounded in the address that followed the rebuke of covetousness (Lk 12<sup>13-34</sup>, Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup>). Here Jesus emphasizes the distinction of the inward and the outward, the primary and the subordinate, the essential and the accidental. The life is a far greater thing than the material means of sustenance, the body by which we live is much more important than its protecting garment. 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' If what is primary and essential is made secure, what is secondary will follow as a matter of course. The error of the Gentiles is that they devote themselves to the secondary and neglect the fundamental. Men feed the outward life and starve the soul, or they adorn the body and disregard its real dignity. They store up wealth, but are not 'rich toward God.' But 'treasure in heaven' is the true riches. The spiritual is supreme. Our prayer should be for 'daily bread' or the satisfaction of necessary requirements. We should seek the Kingdom of God, in the assurance that temporal matters will find adjustment according to providential law.

3. Special self-abnegation has its clearest statement in Mt 19<sup>12</sup>. Whether that passage is literal or figurative is immaterial. The value is in the principle. The duty of abandoning good may be laid on men of hesitating disposition who need to be untrammelled, or on special ministers such as the disciples, who forsook all and followed their Master that they might give undivided effort to the preaching of the gospel. The things surrendered may be possessions, kindred, or even life (Lk 18<sup>20</sup>). An important lesson on the subject is found in the interview of the rich ruler with Jesus (Lk 18<sup>18</sup> etc.). This man was outwardly perfect, yet conscious of imperfection. He had rank, position, wealth, manners, and he had kept the Law. Jesus called on him to surrender his property and become a disciple. The first reflexion here is that formal is not real excellence; that not the outward life only, but the heart, and soul, and spirit are to be judged. Hence it is that not the right-cousness of the Law, but the right-cousness by faith is the hope of the Christian. With this youth may be contrasted his contemporary St. Paul, who attained to the mind of Christ, and for the sake of the higher life counted all things but loss. The second reflexion (which is virtually the same) is the ethical principle that benevolence precedes prudence, that the cause of the community is prior to that of the individual. The command to 'sell . . . and give to the poor' was the form adapted to the individual case in which the principle of renunciation was expressed in the shape of social duty. In a religion which begins with the requirement of repentance and renovation of life, and which in all aspects exalts the spiritual, subordinating the temporal and earthly, nothing is more fitting than the childlike spirit; the graces of humility, meekness, and gentleness belong to the new conception of the beautiful; while the strain of public duty requires the propelling motive of philanthropy and the ready acceptance of self-sacrifice. But renunciation is not without reward. The individual is one in a large family of brethren, and his own good is promoted by the health of the community. He who subordinates the self-regarding virtues to the altruistic, who abandons rights and possessions while he cherishes the love of God and of man, will find even in this life 'manifold more.' Sharing the life of others, he will receive from them more than he gives. By the frustration of false developments the basis of his personal life is strengthened; and by fellowship and service his life becomes richer, nobler, more blessed. Thus is realized the paradox (Mk 8<sup>35</sup>) that the Christian loses his life to save it. The dethronement of self is the beginning of moral victory and power. The path of renouncement leads to spiritual wealth.

These principles derive strength from a study of Christ's own life. The Son of Man had no possessions, no fixed abode. He toiled for the relief of the suffering. The project of kingship He recognized as the temptation of Satan. He saved others—He could not save Himself. The model life was at all points a life of renunciation; a life, too, of uncomplaining endurance of wrong. But life was at all points a life of renunciation; a life, too, of uncomplaining endurance of wrong. But from the date when the cross came distinctly into view, renunciation was inculcated as a necessary condition of membership in His community. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross' (Mt 16<sup>24</sup> etc.). Victory through cross-bearing, life through death, became the final maxims of duty. And the disciples were required at once to behold the career of their Master, and to be prepared to undergo a similar experience. The principle of renunciation took the form of a courageous facing of difficulties, a steadfast endurance of ills, a heroic encountering of persecution, and a submission even unto death. Perhaps the typical Christian is St. Paul. To him crucifixion is the image of his relation to established society. 'The world is crucified to me and I to the world' (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>). For Christians in general his language is more restricted but not substantially different: 'they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh' (Gal 5<sup>54</sup>). But, nevertheless, his tones are triumphant: 'all things are yours' (I Co 3<sup>22</sup>). The cross is the centre of history, and cross-bearing is the soul of virtue; and the afflicted are 'more than conquerors' (Ro 857).

The law of Renunciation has been repeatedly restated in modern literature. 'Die and re-exist' was a maxim of Goethe. Self-renouncement was expounded by Matthew Arnold (Lit. and Dogma) as the secret of Jesus. 'Die to live' is a principle of Hegelianism. This latter axiom has been expounded by Dr. E. Caird (Hegel, ad fin.; Evolution of Religion, ii. 6-8) as the fundamental principle of a universal ethic. According to this authority, it is a law of the spiritual world, as contra-distinguished from the natural, that self-realization is to be attained by self-sacrifice. The theorem 'die to live' involves on the one hand absolute surrender of self and of every good to the Father of spirits, and on the other hand restoration in another form through the possession of an enlarged life filled with deeper and wider interests. The sacrifice of selfishness proves the birth of the true self, the individual deriving from the universal the good for which it exists. The death of Christ was no accidental phenomenon, but the highest revelation of the Divine in conflict with the world's evil. The surrender of a life as a sacrifice to a cause tends to give a universal value to the life so sacrificed. This, of course, does not differentiate the death of Christ from ordinary martyrdom; but we may agree with Caird that paramount moral doctrine must accord both with the lessons of history and with the highest reason of a universal spiritual philosophy. By such tests we distinguish the true from the false renunciation, and arrive at a clearer comprehension of the Divine intuition of Jesus.

On the other side, the reverse doctrine, that selfassertion is the essence of sin, has been rightly accepted as a fundamental truth of the moral sphere. The term so used includes the exaltation of the lower nature over the higher, and the placing of the individual or particular before the social or universal. This principle denies equality of right, repudiates the primary law of love, and treats with scorn the consciences of men. Its essential manifestation is in the lust of power and pride of life, though every other selfish gratification may be included. In mediæval ideas pride held the dark pre-eminence, and conceptions of Satan were formed the other control of the saturation of the sat therefrom. But in modern times, and especially since Milton, the historic view is modified. In the career of the master-fiend whose history is the history of evil (as that career is in Paradise Lost portrayed for all time), it is 'pride and, worse, ambition' that rule. True it is that down the Christian ages, and even within the Church, selfassertion has been as prominent (though not so abundant) as self-denial. But it is equally true that where such egotism has flourished spiritual life has died. See, further, art. SELFISHNESS.

REPENTANCE.—In Christ's own life repentance has no place. The four Gospels contain no expression, direct or incidental, of any feeling of penitence or of regret for anything He ever did or left undone, for anything He ever said or left unsaid. He never prays for forgiveness. He never knows of a time when He was not in peace and harmony with God; He never speaks of coming into peace and harmony with God. Though He teaches insistently that all others must repent and become sons, and even then must pray for the forgiveness of their sins, yet He Himself knows nothing but that He is the Son of His Heavenly Father, and He never loses by any act the consciousness of the Father's approval. See, further, art. SINLESSNESS.

1. Christ's teaching on repentance. — In the teaching of Jesus the fundamental category was the Kingdom of God (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ), i.e. the spiritual rule of God in the heart of a man or in the hearts of men. This  $\beta a \sigma i \lambda \epsilon i a$  simply means God's authority established, God exercising His will and having His way, whether it be in a single human soul, or in a Church, or in a Christian community (as in the primitive Church of Pente-cost), or in the Church universal, or in the world. God's Kingdom has come, that is, His rule is established, when and where His will is done as it is supposed to be done 'in heaven,' that is, ideally, whether that be in a single heart or 'on (the whole) earth.'

This enables us to understand why Jesus has so much to say about righteousness. Righteousness was another name for the fulfilling of the will of God; it was doing what God wanted done; it was the realizing of the rule of God. Hence men were called on to repent and become righteous. 'Repentance, as conceived and taught by Jesus, m ant a change of the whole life, so as to subject it and to conform it to God, a radical and complete revolution of one's view of God and attitude toward God. This involved a change of the whole of life in its inlook as well as in its outlook; a change, in short, of one's self, one's motives, aims, pursuits.

Jesus' primary thought was of a change to. For His starting point was God. Hence the For His starting-point was God. Hence the burden of His message was God and righteousness. Hence the But this implies that there was something to change from. Men were to free their mind from one thing and to fix it on another. They were to exchange one habitual, fixed state of mind for another—for its opposite, namely, for one that recognized, preferred, hungered after and sought for righteousness as the fulfilment of the will of God, as the realization of the rule (Kingdom) of God.

What was it then that they were to change from? Naturally it was from that which was the opposite of righteousness, that which refuses the rule of God and excludes Him from life. In other words, it was from sin. In turning to God it was necessary, in the nature of the case, to turn from that which is opposed to God, from that state of mind which loves, chooses, enjoys sin, which is permeated and dominated by sin, and which brings about the inevitable consequence of living in the practice of sin. So that, while Jesus had much to say about righteousness, He had much to say, and inevitably, about sin. We are now better prepared to understand what He meant when He called on people to repent. Popularly, repentance is understood to be a sense of regret and self-abasement, looking to the forgiveness of the wrong-doings of the past. This is one part of repentance, but it is the least part. Sin lies deeper than the act. It is in the unrenewed, perverse nature behind the act. So repentance goes deeper than the act. Sin has its root in the inherent condition of man's nature; repentance contemplates a change in this condition. And until this change is effected, sin will inevitably continue to rule. Repentance then, while it is a sense of regret and sorrow for the wrong-doings of the past, is far more. It is an agonizing desire, leading to an agonizing and persistent effort, to realize such a radical change in the state of the mind as will secure and ensure against wrong-doing in the future. Born of a realization, more or less clear and pungent, of our natural sinward tendency and of our hopeless inability to correct it or control it, it impels us to desire above all things and to seek before all things that change of mind and moral condition which will not only lead us to choose righteousness, but also enable us triumphantly to realize righteousness. Repentance goes to the root of the matter. The very word goes to the root of it. For what is perduou but a 'change of mind'? That this was the meaning of the word in the thought and intent of Jesus, the whole drift of His teaching implies. But it is specifically shown in those sayings of His which reveal His view of the inherent sinfulness of which reveal fits view of the animeters annual same than an nature: 'If ye being evil' (πουηροί δυτες, Mt 7<sup>11</sup>); 'a corrupt tree cannot (οὐ δύναται, v. <sup>18</sup>) bring forth good fruit'; and that terse statement of the whole situation which in one epigrammatic sentence when the statement of the same and the statement of the same and the statement of the same and the same than the same and the same than the same and the same than the s tence sums up all that St. Paul says in the seventh and eighth chapters of Romans: 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3°). It is what St. l'aul calls 'the mind of the flesh,' and as good as calls the mind of sin (see Ro 7<sup>17, 20</sup>).

Repentance, as used in the Synoptic Gospels, covers, as a rule, the whole process of turning from sin to God (as in Lk 24°). So that in the broad, comprehensive sense of the Synoptics, it includes faith, which is a part of the process, the last step of it. It is so used also in the discourses of the early chapters of the Book of Acts. There the comprehensive condition of admission to the brotherhood of believers and of participation in the life of the Spirit is repentance (Ac 2<sup>50</sup> 3<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>). Faith is not mentioned, though, in the nature of the case it is included

the case, it is included

In the Fourth Gospel the reverse is the case There faith is the condition of salvation (Ju-20. 16-39 But while repentance is not specifically mentioned, it is included in the notion of faith. Faith is the trustful commitment of one's self to God for forgiveness of sins, and deliverance from sin: but it is psychologically impossible to commit one's self thus to God without renouncing and turning away from all that is contrary to God. And this impossibility is expressed or implied in the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. For they clearly set forth the moral conditionality of faith. A man cannot exercise faith whose heart is not right, whose moral condition and attitude of will are opposed to the right (5"). And this moral conditionality of faith is exactly what is meant by repentance, in its narrower sense. Path is the condition of entrance into the experience of salva-Faith is the tion, the enjoyment of eternal life; but repentance is the psychological and moral condition of faith As eternal life is unattainable without faith, faith is unattainable without repentance.

But Jeans was a preacher, not a theologian. Consequently His call to repentance is, as a rule, in the form of those exquisite parables that speak to the heart. Such is the parable of the Pharises and the Publican (Lk 18<sup>3-13</sup>), and that of the Prodigal Son (15<sup>13-26</sup>). The latter of these is the truest, the humanest, and the tenderest picture of repentance to be found in the Bible. The essential elements in the repentance of the Prodigal are (1) a realization of his desperate condition: 'He came to himself'; (2) a definite mental determination to reverse his course and retrace his steps at any risk: 'I will arise and go to my father'; (3) the decisive act of breaking away from his surroundings and going straight into the presence of his much wronged father: 'He arose and came to his father'; (4) his absolute, abject, self-effacing humility: 'I am no more worthy to be called a son of thine; make me as a servant'; (5) his open, outspoken, unreserved, unqualified confession: 'I have sinned to the very heaven, and my sin is against thee, O thou best of fathers.'

2. How Christ leads men to repentance .repentance means what we have seen, namely, the change from the self-centred life to the God-centred life, then Jesus is the author and inspiration of repentance. No other was ever able to reach down deep enough into human nature to effect this change. And He does it (1) by means of the revelation which He gives of the beauty and blessedness of righteousness in contrast with the ugliness and wretchedness of sin. This revelation makes one 'hunger and thirst after righteousness.'
(2) By means of the revelation which He has given of God and the Fatherly compassion of God toward alienated and sinning men. (3) By means of the surpassing and compelling exhibition of His own love in renouncing self and enduring such suffering as He did for the reconciliation and redemption of men. (4) By working in man through His Spirit that sorrow for sin and hatred of sin which lead men to renounce it and to turn away from it, seek-ing forgiveness and deliverance. (5) By holding out to men and giving to men the power to forsake sin and to overcome the tendency to sin. (6) Through the convincing effect of examples of that moral transformation which He is continually working in men and women of all sorts and conditions. In short, the history of Christianity in the past and the Christendom of the present both form a solid commentary of fact on the pregnant and potent words of St. Peter: 'Him hath God exalted as Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and for-giveness of sins' (Ac  $\delta^{2i}$ )

REPETITIONS.—The word 'repetitions' is found in the Gospels only in the phrase 'vain repetitions' in Mt 67 'When ye pray (RV 'in praying'), use not vain repetitions, as the heathen (RV 'the Gentiles') do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. The original word (βατταλογέω, written by modern scholars with ε in the second syllable, after NB) seems to be unknown to classical Greek, occurring only in the comment of Simplicins on Epictetus (c. 530 A.D.), and in Christian literature influenced by the Gospels.

and in Christian literature influenced by the Gospels. Its origin has been explained in three ways. The meaning of the word, or at least part of the meaning, is suggested by πολυλογία in the latter part of the verse. What our Lord condemns is clearly verbosity, the unthinking use of many words, and perhaps also the formal, careless use of expressions which are in themselves appropriate. The reference to Gentile errors in this respect is well illustrated by the cry of the priests of Baal on Carmel (1 K 1820), and the shout of the Ephesian mob, kept up for more than an hour (Ac 1981). Additional illustrations are supplied by Hindu practice (Ward, cited by Rosenmuller, Das alter und neue Morgenland, v. 38f.) and Tibetan Buddhism (Rhys Davids, Buddhism, 209f) For an Egyptian condemnation of the practice, see ExpT vi 537. That the later Jews were liable to wordiness in prayer might be inferred from the Lord's warnings, and is put beyond doubt by a number of passages in the Talmud. It is noted with approval (Berakh, 326) that the righteons of an earlier age used to devote three hours a day to prayer and six hours to waiting, an hour before and an hour after each hour of prayer. R. Meir (of 2nd cent. A.D.) is reported to have said that a man ought to utter a hundred benedictions in a day (Monahoth, 43b). R. Shimeon ben Nathanael, one of the disciples of R. Jochanan ben Zakai, warned his hearers against formalism: 'When thou prayest, make not thy prayer an ordinance, but an entreaty before God' ('Abôth, ii. 17, ed. Taylor). The threefold repetition of the Eighteen Blessings,' a custom the germ of which may have begun to develop in our Lord's day, was of itself calculated to encourage formal repetition. Some of the Rabbis recognized the peril and tried to check the tendency. An instance of verbosity which elicited a rebuke from a Rabbi is given in Berakh. 336, 'O God, great, mighty, awful, glorious, strong, terrible,' etc. Vain repetitions are still in favour in the East, in Islam and its sects (Robinson Lees, Village Life in Palestine<sup>2</sup>, pp. 48, 51 f.; John P. Brown, Dervishes, p. 57).

REPOSE.—1. It seems superfluous to labour (e.g. as Liddon, Bampton Lecture, p. 20; Edersheim, LT i. 599 f.) the point that Jesus needed repose, bodily rest, relaxation, as witnessing to His real human nature. This feature of His experience, along with others, appears as a quite simple and natural thing in the picture of the Prophet of Nazareth as presented by the primitive Evangelical tradition. The Synoptics repeatedly speak of the crowds that gathered about Jesus in the course of His work. The brief story is full of movement, press, and popular excitement. Withdrawal from time to time for rest and prayer was simply imperative. Mark conspicuously calls attention (as in 6th decre. . . . . dramatorate dollyor) to the various occasions when Jesus sought escape and relief from the crush. The Fourth Gospel, too, for all its peculiar portrayal of Jesus, accords with the Synoptics in this description of His ministry: see especially the mention of popular excitement in Jerusalem and elsewhere in chs. 6. 7 and 10. Nor must we overlook in another connexion the homely picture of Jesus resting, tired out with His journey, given in Jn 4th. This in a way matches the memorable picture found in the threefold Synoptic narrative, in which the Master beats a speedy retreat after one busy and exhausting day, and sleeps like a child through the storm (Mk 4the matches of the same time it is to be noted that undoubtedly Jesus sought by such withdrawals from public life not only repose and relief, but also opportunities for the special instruction of the Twelve. As particular instances of this, Mk 3th and 7th may be cited (see Bruce, art. 'Jesus,' § 11, in EBi, vol. ii.).

2. Repose of spirit as a trait in the character of Jesus abundantly appears in the Gospels. If in doing the works of Him that sent Him (Jn 94) He often seems 'ohne Rast,' He is always in manner and spirit 'ohne Hast.' Suppliants for His help in healing the sick are often frantic in their appeals; He in responding ever displays composure and deliberation. Contrast, c.g., the entreaties of Jairus (Mk 5<sup>22f.</sup>) and the calmness of the whole attitude of Jesus (v. 36); the quiet response, 'I will come and heal him' (Mt 87), and the hurried, eager request of the Roman captain on behalf of his servant. These are typical instances. John presents the same feature in the description of our Lord's behaviour on hearing of the sickness of Lazarus (ch. 11). The paroxysm of grief which shakes Him when He comes to His friend's grave (vv. 33-38) only throws into relief the normal composure which recovers itself in v. 41. Such, too, is the relation of Gethsemane's agony to the calm dignity which shows itself through all the rest of the Via Dolorosa. It is also a characteristic of the teaching of Jesus that there is an entire absence of the impatience, fuss, and strain which so often characterize the schemes of social and religious work launched by His well-meaning followers. With all the zeal and diligence that His sayings lay stress on, He always speaks with the accent of one who can afford to wait. not a mere matter of chance that serenity sits on the face of the Lord, as He is represented in the unbroken tradition of Christian art.

3. In the well-known passage Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup> Jesus offers the gift of repose (dνάπαυσις, EV rest) to those who will learn of Him. It is true, dνάπαυσις strictly speaking denotes relief from labour, a break to afford rest to tired toilers (see Trench, NT Synonyms, § 41); and it seems also to imply the resumption of labour. The words of Jesus, however, teach that to take His yoke and bear His burden, to live and serve as He teaches and as He lived and served Himself, will itself be drdrawers as compared with other modes of living and serving, the yoke of which is never to be resumed. 'A Christi corde manat quies in animas nostras' (Bengel, in loc.). Tranquillity of soul, then, is a promised accompaniment of true Christian discipleship. A temper eagerly cultivated by Stoics (Aquanimitas was the last watchword given by Antoninus Pius to his bodyguard) is also a precious Christian grace.

<sup>4</sup> Drop Thy still dews of quietness, Till all our strivings cease: Take from our souls the strain and stress, And let our ordered lives confess The beauty of Thy peace.' (Whiter).

REPROACH.—The word is found in EV as a rendering of four Gr. terms that either occur in the Gospels or are used in the NT with reference to Christ Himself—the nouns δνειδος, δνειδομός, and the vbs. δνειδιζω, ὑβρίζω. δνειδος='shame,' as the ground of reproach (whereas δνειδισμός is the actual reproaching), is found only in Lk 1<sup>25</sup> (of Elisabeth's barrenness). ὑβρίζω is once rendered 'reproach' (11<sup>40</sup>), but properly means to 'insult.' δνειδισμός and δνειδίζω are the terms with which we are specially concerned. The subject comes before us in three forms: (1) reproach as uttered by Christ; (2) reproach as borne by Him; (3) reproach as falling upon His people.

1. As uttered by Christ.—The language of rebuke (ἐπιτιμάω) is several times ascribed to Jesus (see art. REBUKE), but seldom the language of reproach. When we distinguish between the two, the difference seems to be that rebuke denotes the simple censure of a fault, while reproach carries with it some emphasis upon the personal shame (δνειδος) attaching to it. And so it seems to be part of the method of Jesus, as understood by the Evangelists, to point out faults rather than to fasten the stigma of disgrace upon the culprit; He was more anxious to effect improvement than to inflict punishment— His eyes being ever towards the future rather than towards the past (cf. 'Neither do I condemn thee: go thy way; from henceforth sin no more,' in the Pericope Adulteræ, Jn 811). Once in EV (Lk 1149) the word 'reproach' is used with reference to our Lord's utterances, but there by a misrendering; for the Gr. vb. is  ${}^{i}\beta\rho l \langle \omega \rangle$ , which means to 'insult,' not to reproach. But the Evangelist, it is to be noted, does not say that Jesus insulted any one; it is 'one of the lawyers' who accuses Him of insulting the legal class. It was not our Lord's way, however, to insult people, even though they were His enemies; and, on examination, the charge of this lawyer serves only to illustrate the tendency of offended pride to regard a declaration of the honest truth as a ground of personal offence.

Only on two occasions is the vb. δνειδίζω employed to describe the language of Jesus, and both times AV renders 'upbraid,' which RV rather inconsistently retains. In Mt 1129 Jesus reproaches the cities in which most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not; and in the Appendix to Mk. (1614) He reproaches the Eleven for their slowness to receive the testimony of His resurrection. These cases suggest that Jesus did not hesitate to add reproach to rebuke when He thought it deserved. Capernaum was 'his own city' (Mt 94, cf. 412); Chorazin and Bethsaida had shared with it in the fullest manifestations of His power and grace. The men whom He is said to have reproached for their unbelief and hardness of heart were those whom He had specially chosen to be the depositaries and messengers of His gospel, and whom He had trained through long months for this very purpose, lavishing upon them all the wealth of His Divine treasures of knowledge and love. No wonder that in these cases the censure of Jesus became reproachful. And indeed His reproach was more frequent than we might gather from the occurrence of the word in the Gospel narratives, and was most frequent when He was dealing with those of whom, loving them the best, He expected the most. Was He them the best, He expected the most. Was He not speaking reproachfully when He said, 'How is it that ye do not understand?' (Mt 16<sup>11</sup>); 'How long shall I be with you? how long shall I bear with you? (17<sup>17</sup>); 'Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip?' (Jn 14<sup>9</sup>). Was there not a more piercing reproach in His voice when He said to the traitor, 'Judas, with a kiss dost thou betray the Son of Man?' (Lk 22<sup>36</sup>); and in His eves when as the cock crew. He 22<sup>16</sup>); and in His eyes when, as the cock crew, He turned and looked upon Peter (vv. <sup>60, 61</sup>)?

2. Reproach as borne by Christ.—So far as the term is concerned, it is only by the two robbers who were crucified along with Him that our Lord is said to have been reproached (overlift, Mt 27th, Mk 1522; see RV). This reproach by the robbers belongs to the general subject of the reviling of Jesus Christ in connexion with His trial and crucifixion, for which see art. MOCKERY.

In the Epistles the word 'reproach' receives a much wider meaning, as denoting generally the shame and contempt, the hardships and suffering which Christ endured in the days of His flesh. In Ro 153 St. Paul exhorts Christians to a life of unselfish consideration for others by pointing to the example of the Master, and quotes in this connexion the exact words of the LXX tr. of Ps 69° (6810] 'The reproaches of them that reproached (of δνειδισμοί τῶν δνειδιζόντων) thee fell upon me.' The Psalm describes the sufferings of the righteous man at the hands of the ungodly, and the verse quoted represents him as telling how he has to bear the reproaches directed against God Himself. The Apostle, however, transfers the words to Christ, and makes them describe how He bore the burden of reproach for others, and so serve to give point to an exhortation against self-pleasing.

In two passages the author of Hebrews uses the expression 'the reproach (δνειδισμό) of Christ,' or 'his reproach,' to denote the earthly shame and sorrow of Jesus. In the first case (1126), Moses is described as 'esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.' The writer's idea appears to be, not only that by identifying himself with his despised people Moses took when the control with the con took upon himself a burden of contempt and suffering resembling that which was afterwards borne by Christ on our behalf, but that he had Christ prophetically in view—saw Him afar off, even as Father Abraham did (Jn 8<sup>26</sup>), and was strengthened by the vision to run his own race with patience (cf. He 12<sup>2</sup>). In the second passage (13<sup>13</sup>), the Jewish-Christian readers are exhorted to a fellowship with the sufferings of Christ, in the words, 'Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.' The allusion apparently is to the sin-offering on the Day of Atonement without the camp of Israel, and to the suffering of Jesus without the city gate; and the meaning is that those Jewish-Christians must forsake the sphere of the OT religion, break off the old ties of national fellowship, and face all the pain and contumely that this would involve, so that they might share in the better blessings of the great Sin-offering.

3. Reproach as falling upon Christ's people.—

Both in Mt. (511) and Lk. (622) reproach forms a part of the last Beatitude—the Beatitude of Persecution. There are, we have seen, two kinds of reproach—a reproach that is just, and one that is unjust; such reproach as Christ uttered, and such reproach as He endured. In deserved reproach there lies great sorrow and shame. The Lord's backward look through the open door of the hall sent Peter out into the night to weep bitterly (Lk 22611); the remembrance of the last words addressed to him by his Master must have been as a barb to the arrow of remorse that sank so deep into the soul of Judas (Mt 2650, Lk 2248). the other hand, both honour and blessing belong the other hand, both honour and blessing belong to undeserved reproach falling upon Christ's people for their Master's sake. Jesus frequently forewarned His disciples that persecution would come upon them through following Him (Mt 5<sup>10ff. 44</sup> 10<sup>23. 28</sup> 13<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Mk 10<sup>20. 28</sup>, Lk 6<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>, Jn 15<sup>20</sup>). And in this Beatitude He specially forewarns them of the persecution of false and bitter tongues —more trying to some natures than the stones of -more trying to some natures than the stones of the mob or the tyrant's scourge and sword.

The Apostles and the early Church had their full share of the reproach of evil tongues (cf. Ac 2<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>3</sup> 6, Ro 3<sup>3</sup>, Ja 2<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>4</sup>). But the glory that lies in being reproached for Christ's sake, and the Lord's great promise regarding this experience, were never forgotten. It was this that taught St. Paul to bless when he was reviled (1 Co 4<sup>12</sup>). It was evidently with the very words of Jesus echoing in his ears that St. Peter wrote, 'If ye be reproached (break(feeds) for the name of Christ, blessed are ye' (1 P 414). And when the author of Hebrews speaks of the 'reproach of Christ'—telling of the manner in which it was esteemed by Moses, and urging his fellow-believers of the Jewish race to go forth without the camp with that reproach upon them—it may be that he also is recalling how Jesus taught His disciples to rejoice in reproach because their reward in heaven was great (Mt 512, Lk 623). For in the one case he represents Moses as forming his estimate of the reproach of Christ from his respect unto the re-compense of the reward (He 11<sup>26</sup>), and in the other he exhorts Christians to the bearing of the same reproach, on the ground that they look for the abiding city which is to come (1314).

J. C. LAMBERT. RESERVE.—In Mt 76 Jesus counsels reserve in the communication of religious truth. That maxim, which has had great and sinister developments in the Church, stands alone, both in its place in the Sermon on the Mount and in His teaching. meaning, then, can be gathered only from His practice.

1. It was never Jesus' custom to meet religious curiosity or speculation. As He was teaching, one said unto Him, 'Lord, are there few that be saved?' (Lk 13<sup>22-25</sup>). He did not answer; He said, 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate . . .' He turned His hearers' attention from that specularity the same continuous properties in the the classes. tion, which has no saving power in it, to the clear duty and wisdom of the moment. When Peter asked if the parable of the Servants waiting for their Lord was addressed to the disciples specially, or to all, Jesus did not answer (1241). He painted, instead, another picture for the inward eye of the heart. In both cases it was the practical and most imperative needs of the soul's relation to God that He considered. That directing purpose shown in these cases, explains the silences of His teaching, the reserves of His revelation. When He spoke of those on whom the tower fell, and of the Galilæans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices (131-5), the old problem of the suffering of the innocent was suggested; but He shed no light upon it. He made practical use of it, instead, as a call to repentance. The immortality of the soul is the presupposition of all His teaching about the love of the Heavenly Father for men, His children. 'The life after death, Lightfoot and I agreed, is the cardinal point of Christianity' (In Memoriam, Author's Notes, p. 227 n.). But Jesus, of His own impulse, only enunciates this truth at the end of His mission. And a practical need then impelled Him. His disciples needed consolation for the days after His death, and He left them the hope which would strengthen their faith and loyalty (Jn 14). With Jesus, the declaration of any truth depended wholly upon the needs of faith in the heart.

2. Jesus practised reserve as to His personal aims. The Jews came and asked Him, 'How long dost thou make us doubt: if thou be the Christ, tell us plainly' (Jn 10<sup>24</sup>). They were surprised at His silence about what seemed to them so important. And His blessing of Peter (Mt 16<sup>13-17</sup>) shows that He had been silent also in private, even among the inner circle of His disciples. His reserve is explained, not by the slow growth of His own conception of His Messiahship, but by the method of establishing the Kingdom of God which He had set before Him from the beginning. The weapons of His warfare were to be purely spiritual. His aim was to set up the Kingdom within men's hearts, to win their heart's love and trust in the Father. And for that end the appeal of all His activities, miracles of help and healing and words of teaching, was single. He aimed at the heart, the seat and source of faith, where the vision and the love of goodness, with their dynamic impulse, are. And Peter's confession was a joy to Him, because it came from his heart's assurance that Jesus had the words of eternal life (Jn 6°8, Mt 16¹7). It was faith in goodness asserting itself against the appearance of things. To this faith Jesus confessed His greatness and Divine mission. He did so, because then He was merely certifying the Divine supremacy of that goodness which had, in its lowliness and simplicity won the layer and trust of their heart. plicity, won the love and trust of their hearts. Through their faith they reached His authority. Jesus recognized no other path to faith in Him as Messiah, the revealer of the Father, and the founder of the Kingdom of God upon the earth. He sent the inquiring Jews back to this road (Jn 10<sup>25-27</sup>); He withdrew from the people who, from material ideas and expectations, would have made Him king (615); and He declined to answer the chief priests and elders, who came inquiring for His authority, because they were not simple-hearted or honest inquirers (Mt 21<sup>23-27</sup>). This single regard for the interests of faith in the heart explains also His reserve with the messengers of John (112-6). John belonged to the old economy (11<sup>11</sup>); his prophecy of the Messiah's coming had been a prophecy of judgment (3<sup>12</sup>). The simple acknowledgment by Jesus that He was the Messiah could never have brought to him enlightenment and faith as to that Kingdom of heaven whose least disciple was greater than he. Its inevitable consequence would have been to confirm him in his old expectations of judgment; it would have appeared to him a call to wait in patience the good time of the Messiah, when He would play the stern part John had foretold. Therefore Jesus gave no direct answer to John's question. He pointed rather to all the gracious activities which were partly the causes of John's doubting impatience. These were the signs of that Kingdom of love which Jesus was establishing; and if John were ever to gain the higher and richer conceptions of God and of man manifested there, he must see the Messiah through these quiet and lowly activities of loving helpfulness, and believe in Him as Him that should come, because of them and not despite them.

3. The sufferings of the Messiah.—It was immediately upon Peter's confession that Jesus began to teach the necessity of suffering and death for Him-self (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>). There are a precision and a fulness of detail in the account of this teaching, which are probably reflected back upon it from later experience. But the tragic note enters then and dominates the later teaching both in public and private. Its emergence at that time does not prove that Jesus entered then upon a new conception of His mission, taught by the progress of events. It is more probable that this tragic note was in His conception of the task of establishing the Kingdom from the beginning. His wilderness temptation argues that (Mt 4<sup>k</sup>); it is implicit in His Beatitudes upon the meek and the persecuted, and in His teaching of the earthly rewards of hypocrisy (6<sup>2-5-16</sup>); and the deeper spirit of the OT, with its history of religious growth through the sufferings of the saints and the long-suffering patience of Jehovah's love, could not be veiled from the insight of His meditation thereon in the years of His preparation. The joy of the early days does not contradict this. It was the natural answer of the heart to those new thoughts of the love of the Father which Jesus preached. And in Jesus' own thought this tragic element was not in contradiction with that instinctive, buoyant joy in His gospel, though then He had many things to say to them which they could not bear (Jn 16<sup>12</sup>). Peter's confession brought the opportunity of revealing further the depths of the riches of the wisdom and love of God.

Reserve, as practised by Jesus, was never a politic means of leading men's minds gradually to doctrines which might startle or offend them at first sight; it consisted only in seeking, with a single aim, the practical needs of faith in the heart—belief in that Divine Love whose outgoings are redemptive, and in whose fellowship and service stands eternal life.

REST.—1. There is in the Gospels frequent allusion to the value of rest as the purchase of preceding effort, the compensation that is provided for sore afflictions. The Sermon on the Mount, as the proclamation of the new Kingdom, guarantees such rest and peace to those who serve and suffer for the sake of that Kingdom (Mt 5<sup>1-12</sup>). Prosperity in the world can make no such promises (Lk 12<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>).

2. As rest, physical, social, and religious, is an organic necessity of life, and is protected by conditions of time and place, it should not be set aside for effort that is uncalled for, or that confuses the lower and higher forms of rest. Such was the lesson given in the home at Bethany (Lk 10<sup>42</sup>). Similarly, the lilies of the field, while developing to the full their own character in their own place, are content to remain lilies (Mt 6<sup>28, 29</sup>).

3. There is an ignoble state of rest that may slothfully or blindly oppose the call to a higher and truer contentment (Mt 11<sup>17, 22</sup>, Lk 19<sup>40</sup>). Christ's gift is life abundant (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>), but the bestowal involves asking, and faith's exertion of knocking is expected at the entrance into life (Mt 7<sup>7</sup>).

4. In the parable of the Sower, the recompense is in the abundant harvest. This increase is the way of nature where hindering things cease to operate. The list of obstacles typifies the things that impoverish or prevent altogether the fruit-fulness of discipleship. In the Kingdom of heaven the instinct of citizenship is to be rich toward God.

Its gratification is not toil but rest (Mt 1128; see art. REPOSE).

RESTORATION.—Round this word gather some of the most fascinating problems of our thought in regard to the possibilities of human destiny. Every lover of his kind, and everyone who has caught something of the spirit of the Lord Christ, is compelled, for his own mental and spiritual satisfaction, to ask, What is to be the issue of all this complex life of man, the beginnings of which we see on the earth, the final issue when the Divine purpose concerning the race is accomplished? And naturally the Scriptures of the NT are eagerly scanned to discover what declarations are there made, or hints given, respecting the issue. Above all, has the Master of Truth left us any definite teaching on which a fair and inspiring hope may be built? At first sight it must be confessed that to those who look for express statements of our Lord and His Apostles in regard to future destiny, the results of a restrained exegesis are disappointing. Isolated expressions and passages may be, and often have been, pressed into the service of preconceived hopes; but, on the whole, the statements of Scripture afford too slender a basis on which to raise a structure of dogmatic assertion, and do not throw light very far into the great mystery of the future. The disappointment, however, is modified by two considerations: (1) Many of the references to the future life are quite incidental, and occur in writings which are themselves obviously of the most occasional character, in which, therefore, the immediate doctrinal or ethical concern is paramount, and no intention of dealing with the problems of Eschatology was before the writer's mind. (2) The mysteriousness which everywhere surrounds our human existence is an essential part of life's discipline. If all the mystery concerning the future were dispelled, the race would be without one of its most refining and sanctifying influences, much of life's interest would vanish and its finest essence evaporate. The Evangelists, the Apostles, and even our Lord Himself in His earthly life, were required to vindicate to them-selves the Divine purpose in this mortal career without having all the future destiny of mankind revealed to them. Limitation of knowledge here seems to be essential to the very being of human nature.

In considering the Scripture intimations regarding the hope of a universal Restoration of humanity, it must be clearly seen that whatever hopes may, more or less distinctly, emerge in the expressed thought of the Apostles, are all clearly based upon, and inspired by, an enlarging thought concerning the Person of Jesus Christ, and the revelation given in Him and recorded in the Gospels.

The word 'restoration' (dmokardorages, AV 'restitution') is found only once in the Gospels, and in its verbal form, in Mt 1711, in connexion with a hope current in our Lord's time of a moral renovation of the nation under the leadership of Elijah (cf. Mal 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>3, 6</sup>), and declared by our Lord to be fulfilled in the great spiritual movement initiated by John the Baptist (Mt 17<sup>10-12</sup>). The noun is employed in Ac 3<sup>21</sup>, where it would be extremely interesting if we could believe that St. Peter, in his anticipation of the χρόνος dποκαταστάσεως πάντων, had in his mind any thought of the universal restoration of mankind, and its final up-raising to the life of fellowship with God. His need of mental enlargement, given later by means of the vision (Ac 10<sup>9-25</sup>), to enable him to believe in the possibility of Gentile salvation, is decisive against such an interpretation. We may well inquire, however, how far the expression, calculated to express so much, was due to the writer of the Acts, St. Luke, to whom such a pregnant phrase and such a large hope for humanity would naturally commend itself.

But the question remains, Does the larger idea of the restoration of humanity as a whole to obedience, and to the condition of blessedness for which it was created, receive a warrant from the words and thoughts of Scripture?

1. In examining, first, our Lord's own teaching, which we take as fundamental in the consideration of the question, it must be clearly understood what we are to ask concerning it. We desire to know if we have any evidence from the words of Jesus re-ported in the Gospels, that He Himself held the faith of the final restoration of all men. for Him included in the possibilities of the future? or have we any express declaration that in this life only is there a possibility of right moral decision being made, with the consequent attainment to a right and saving relation to God? The last question stands on the threshold of the inquiry; for if it be unmistakably answered in the affirmative, it must determine the whole problem for those who accept His authority as final; while, if no such declaration is found, the way is left open for a redeeming process beyond the bounds of this brief

Our Lord is reported to have spoken of everlasting or eternal punishment (κόλασιν αἰώνιον), apparently as the opposite of life everlasting or eternal (ζωήν αἰώνιον, Mt 25.4). The use of the same term alwros of both life and punishment has inclined many to regard the passage as decisive on this momentous question; but the majority of modern scholars consider that the æonian (literally 'agelong') life or suffering is to be understood as at least possibly terminable, and that the expression applied is qualitative rather than quantitative, referring to the relation of both life and death to God rather than to duration of time. 'Eternal' and not 'everlasting' is its true equivalent. It may also be said that even if the expressions are meant to refer to the endlessness of the punishment or of the blessedness, they may properly be understood as a very strong assertion of the undoubted fact that the suffering that comes of sin is eternally, endlessly bound up with the sin, even as the blessedness of the righteous is necessarily involved in their obedience. The hopelessness of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is summed up in the words 'he is guilty of eternal sin' (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>). The latter possibility, however, is nowhere asserted of all who 'die in their sins' (Jn 8<sup>24</sup>), and leave this world unrepentant. See ETERNAL SIN.

Similarly, the same fact of the eternal and necessary association of suffering with sin is expressed in Mk 943-46 'the worm that dieth not,' and 'the fire that never shall be quenched.' But in neither case is it declared that those who are sent away into that searching experience are doomed to abide there endlessly. The fire of the Divine wrath against sin is essential to the Divine Being, and while God is God it cannot but burn. Both passages convey a most solemn warning to men against being caught into that holy wrath, the fiery trial of suffering and remorse that inevitably waits upon all disobedience, against that dissolution of the life which elsewhere our Lord describes as the cutting of man asunder, and as that terrible portion of the unbeliever or hypocrite which is weeping and gnashing of teeth (Mt 24<sup>51</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>46</sup>).

Unspeakable horror of the world to come for the impenitent and disobedient reveals itself in all that He teaches us regarding it; in His sense of sin, and the mischief, corruption, and agony which it works; in His urging that it were 'profitable,' good for a man, to make the utmost sacrifice of all that makes life good to live, even to the plucking out of the eye or the cutting off of the hand, rather than to be cast into that loathly Gehenna which our Lord glances at, rather than depicts (Mt 5<sup>22, 20</sup>); but of the duration of that state of woe He gives no hint. Although it may with much force be maintained that the images He employs—the worm, the fire, the salting with fire—are all most naturally interpreted as purifying and cleansing agencies, yet it is wiser to see that He leaves the Divine purpose in all that mysterious process of retribution to be inferred from the whole revelation of God which He had given in His earthly life. See, further, ETERNAL FIRE, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Due weight must be assigned to the remarkable reticence maintained by Jesus regarding the world to come, both concerning the nature of the blessedness of heaven, and the future destiny of the unrepentant. In His incarnate condition, under the limitations necessarily involved in the taking of a veritable human nature, much of that future was hidden from His view as from ours. The discipline of mystery concerning the future world, which is so salutary for our nature, was not without its value in the perfecting of the Redeemer. And therefore, while He possessed absolute knowledge of the moral conditions of that life, kindred as they were with the moral conditions of life here, He was not privileged to see all that future unfolded. And it is surely most significant that of the course of events in that 'sequestered state,' in that world to which the sinful pass at death, He speaks no word. And He nowhere precludes the possibility of moral growth and betterment in that vast Unseen; the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>) speaks of 'a great gulf fixed' prohibiting a passage from either of the two contrasted states of being to the other, but it was not a gulf across which there could come no communication or redeeming influence, for Dives and Abraham can hold converse; and the parable hints not obscurely at some better-ment of the selfish rich man who begins to have a genuine concern for his brethren (unless it must be interpreted as a subtle form of self-excuse).

The Gospels contain no word of this life as being absolutely and finally decisive of all human destiny, and remembering the complexity of life not for the heathen only, and for nations chosen to play another part than a religious one, in the great purpose of God, but for men living in full gospel light, yet doomed from their birth and before it to an almost hopeless incapacity for truth and virtue, our moral nature shrinks irresistibly from such a thought. On the contrary, we have certain indications, not beyond question and yet full of hopeful suggestion, that the mind of Jesus reached out beyond all the complexity and travail to a glorious issue and consummation worthy of being called 'the glory of the Father.' He speaks in Mt 192 of a coming Regeneration (παλινγενεσία) in which those who have faithfully followed Him shall share His rule; but we have no clue as to whether His words are intended to reach beyond the definite establishment of His Kingdom as an actual fact among men. But in that Kingdom once established He placed His hope, and He taught us to pray for its coming as the equivalent of the Divine will being done on earth as it is in heaven.

In Jn 12<sup>32</sup> (cf. Jn 3<sup>14</sup>) He declares that His 'lifting up' shall be the means of 'drawing all men' to Himself, and His words are naturally interpreted as expressing His hope and expectation of a complete redemption of mankind, and can scarcely be satisfied by saying that though this is the natural effect, it may never be the actual effect of His supreme sacrifice.

On the whole, while it must be confessed that we have no certain statement from our Lord as to the final issue of things, we have yet much to encourage a hopeful attitude, in harmony as that attitude is with the intuitions of the human heart, and with the whole disclosure of God's love 'in the face of Jesus Christ.' The Son of Man and Son of God has 'thrown light' not only upon the intimations of immortality which existed in the heart of man, but also upon the problem as to future restoration, not so much by what He says as by His whole Personality, His revelation of and abiding relation to the unseen Father.

2. Upon that revelation in the actual Jesus of

2. Upon that revelation in the actual Jesus of Nazareth, and upon their increasing sense of the infinite importance of the Christ who ever liveth, the Apostles found their thought and speculation, so far as these find place in their writings, regarding the larger and ultimate issues of redemption. Whatever hopes they permit themselves to express, all centre in His Personality and power. The vagueness which characterizes most of the references to the question is due to the fact that the writings are all casual. In no case are the authors specifically or systematically dealing with the problem, being not theologians so much as practical Apostles, dealing with the ethical questions of the Churches and with individual salvation.

(α) In the Johannine writings are found many principles of truth on which far-reaching inferences may legitimately enough be founded, such as the assertion that 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>); but there is no evidence that the writer had apprehended these logical inferences.

(b) In the First Epistle of Peter two important passages are 1 P 316-20 and 46, which, in spite of a considerable weight of adverse exeges which forbids any dogmatic assertion based upon the words, may fairly be taken as suggesting that the scope of redemption is not limited to the present scene. The Apostle has the conception of an underworld from which a moral process is not excluded.

(c) In the Pauline writings the most conservative

exegesis reads a clear declaration of the Divine purpose that all men shall be saved, but denies that any certain hope as to the final issue can be built upon the fact. Here many will naturally diverge in judgment, and feel that they can raise their hope so securely nowhere else as upon the expressed purpose and will of God (Ro 11<sup>32</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>3</sup>. 4, cf. 2 1 3<sup>9</sup>). When once the holy will of the Father, in its might and energy and Divine persistence, is realized, the Christian man may at least 'rest in hope' of an issue beyond our farthest vision. Martensen (Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr. 474-484) is a type of those who regard Scripture as presenting two sides of the truth respecting future destiny which are at present unreconcilable; but the antinomy which no doubt exists will largely disappear if the process of development in Apostolic and especially in Pauline thought be allowed for. In his earlier Epistles (1 and 2 Thess.), St. Paul is largely influenced by the apocalyptic ideas of traditional Judaism (1 Th 4<sup>15-17</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>3-10</sup>). But in the later stages of his writing a larger conception of the Divine purpose begins to find expression. In Ro 8<sup>19</sup> he anticipates a glorious 'revelation of the sons of God'—and in 11<sup>22</sup> he expresses the widest design in the Divine mind, determining all the mysterious process of redemption, as 'that he might have mercy upon all.' And, as his thought matures, his hope expands under an enlarged sense of the central position of the ever-living Christ in this world and in all worlds, and under has feeling of the larger spaces in the Divine purpose and working—the 'ages upon ages' (Eph 2' 3-'). In Col 1<sup>18-17</sup> the Son is declared to be the creator of all things visible and invisible. All things (ra rara) find their cohesive principle in Him (awelorysee), and their final consummation (see airio). In Eph 1th He is the Head of all, in which the whole creative and redeeming process is to be summed up(drazepakai śrastła i drza tr rū Xpisrū), and in Ph 2.0 His is the Name at which the whole created universe is to bow with undivided acclamation. In Col 12 the blessings of redemption are extended to the whole system of things (of. Eph in the white hydram and Christianty, pp. 407-408 mays: If we are to see here the conception of a final reconciliation between God and His creatures, a blotting out of evil in the sense that it shall be transformed into good, a complete harmonizing of the universe so that neither angel nor man shall be found to set himself against the Divine ethical order, then we must hold this view to apring out of a philosophical thought which does not find support elsewhere in the NT, and which did not afterward meet with wide approval in the Church.' And though this may be conceded, and though we must not be blind to the fact that the issues thus gloriously expressed were not fully thought out by the Apostle or applied to the question of Restoration, yet, based as they are upon the Person of Christ and supplemented by the principles of His teaching and revelation, they may be taken to express a sober and restrained hope-fulness for the ultimate issue, which shall never for a moment be suffered to lessen the evangelic urgency that 'Now is the accepted time; now is

The hope of a final completion of the Divine purpose in the restoration from sin's dominion of all mankind must derive much of its force from a contemplation of the alternatives; from the difficulty of supposing a Divine purpose and will eternally active yet never attaining to its desire, or of conceiving of any human soul as eternally incapable of responding to the all-pervasive Love of God, or of thinking of any eternal felicity of the blessed which can be undisturbed by the knowledge of living souls abiding in a hopeless doom. Alleviations of the idea of eternal punishment such as that of 'Conditional Immortality' offend almost equally against the fundamental instincts of the human heart, which cannot think that the All-wise and All-loving has created any soul in His own image to prove but a waste and an abortion.

Which else He made in value which must not be "

Such thoughts are in the human intuition, and they are based upon the nature of God as made known to us in Christ Jesus, and upon the eternal Personality of Him 'who was dead, and is alive for evermore; and hath the keys of death and the unseen world' (Rev 118). They are reinforced by the human love for its own kind, which at its highest finds voice in Browning (Saul).

'Would I fain in my impotent yearning do all for this man, And dare doubt He alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?'

And on these rests the conviction that 'faith in the exceeding grandeur of reality shall never be confounded (Sir O. Lodge, Life and Matter).

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. 1. St. Paul's summary of the Resurrection appearances (I Co 15) is, says Godet (Com. ii 435), the most ancient and most official of the records we possess. If Harnack's chronology be made our basis (Gesch. der Altehriett. Lit. vol. ii. (1) 236 ff.), our Lord's death was in A.D. 29 or 30; St. Paul's conversion in 30; his correspondence with Corinth, 53. His visit to St. Peter at Jerusalem would be in 33. Thus he had known this tradition for nearly 20 years, and recorded it within 23 years of the Resurrec-tion. On St. Paul's list of the witnesses we note: -(1) That it is a list and not a narrative. It is the -(1) that it is a list and not a narrative. It is the barest summary, expressed with the namost conciseness (cf. Cambr. Theol. Essays, p. 331). (2) It is derived and not original (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup> 'I received' [waρλαβον]. 'I delivered unto you' [waρλωκα]). If we here possess a primitive tradition orally communicated to St. Paul by the older Apostles, then it would be uncritical to infer that St. Paul 'knows nothing' of any appearance which he does not record. (3) The order of the list is chronological. This is shown by the use of efra, fuerra: 'then to James; then to all the apostles. (4) The purpose is not primarily apologetic (cf. Cambridge Theol. Essays, 306, 329, 330). The Resurrection of Christ was not disputed at Corinth. duction of the list here is due to that instinct for systematic completeness, that determination to go down to first principles, which is eminently char-acteristic of St. Paul, rather than to any apolo-gist's desire to convince men who do not believe that Christ is risen. (5) The selection is evidently official (cf. Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul, p. 301)—St. Peter as the first of the Apostles, St. James head of the Church at Jerusalem. 'Peter and James were at the time of writing the two most prominent persons in the Christian Society, Rev., Jan. 1906, p. 330) The same applies to the Apostles in a body. The other appearance is recorded for its numerical importance. Thus the omission of the Women from this official list is not surprising. It is noticeable that the Fourth Gospel, although recording the appearance to Mary Magdalene, yet omits it from the official enumera-tion (Jn 2114). Thus the Fourth Gospel supports St. Paul's procedure, and demonstrates that onission is not necessarily due to ignorance.

On St. Paul's list of the witnesses, see, further, Ch. Quart, Rev., Jan. 1906, 327-331, Knowling, Testenony of St. Paul; Gent, Das Dogma con Christi Person and Werk, xxli

2. The personal testimony of St. Paul to Christ's Resurrection.—A comparison of the three accounts of St. Paul's conversion in Ac 9. 22. 26, which may be respectively denoted A, B, and C, shows certain variations.

(3) The intervention of Ananias, contained in A and B, is omitted in C; the instruction given by him being in substance transferred in C to Christ. It may be, as Blass considers (Act. Apost ix ), that the historic order is maintained in A and B ather time in C, since such instruction as to the Apostle is duty would come more naturally under calmer circumstances and at a later time. It should also be noted that of these three accounts the first is the historian's narrative in the course of the events, where Ananias would be casarily be mentioned. The second was upoken to the Jewish throng on the ascent to the Printorium, where the mention of Ananias and his orthodoxy would be reassuring to the heavers (cf. Knowling, op. cil.). The third, spoken before the magistrates, omits him, because the reference would not in any degree strengthen the Apostle's case, age be desirable as Ananias' account. Again, it is noteworthy that the incident of Ananias is, as Blass says, separable from the main event. Its omission by St. Paul in 1 Cor. shows this. It does, however, entail the important loss of reference to St. Paul's baptism given in A and B. It may be psychologically difficult to separate Ananias' instructions from St. Paul's own reflexions. But this again is distinct from the momentous issue.

(2) The effect upon the attendants is recorded with variations. In A they are described as ανώντας μεν τῆς φωτῆς μποδικα διθωρούντας. In Β, τῆν δι φωτῆς καὶ πακοικα ναῦ λαλούντάς μει. In C the attendants are not mentioned. It is usually said that the distinction of case after ἀκούιν implies that the attendants heard the sound (genitive) but could not distinguish the substance (accusative) of the message (cf. Grimm-Thayer, Lex.).

stance (accusative) of the message (cf. Grimm-Thayer, Lex.).

But, taking the extreme case that these details cannot be reconciled, do they vitally alter the central affirmation? Is not some confusion between the effect on St. Paul and that upon the attendants very readily accounted for on the religious principle that receptiveness varies with spirituality? Zeller (followed by Pfleiderer, Urchristentum, i. 61) has, indeed, made the most of these differences (Acts, vol. i. p. 287), on the ground that for the objective character of the appearance great importance must attach to the testimony of St. Paul's companions. But the essential points are perfectly clear; that the attendants were bewildered and confused by an external incident whose nature they evidently took for incident whose nature they evidently took for supernatural but could not further explain.

On the three narratives in Acts, see, further, Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul; Sabatier, L'apôtre Paul; Goguel, L'apôtre Paul et Jésus Christ; Chase, Credibility of Acts; Rackham, Acts.

So far as to St. Paul's personal testimony recorded in Acts. To this must be added the references in his Epistles. It is certainly remarkable that amid his courageous self-revelation no account of his own conversion is given in the Epistles. And yet any such account would obviously be necessary for his opponents rather than for his converts, who must have heard the story orally; and this is precisely what the allusions and in-ferences in the Epistles suggest. There are here three points to be remembered: (1) The external or objective character of the appearance outside Damascus; (2) the fact that this external appearance is not incompatible with intellectual preparation for the change; nor (3) with an inner revelation in the department of the intellect as to the significance and far-reaching character of the external revelation bestowed (cf. Maurice Goguel, L'apôtre Paul et Jésus Christ).

(a) Theologians were formerly disposed to confine the intellectual change in St. Paul to the ine the intellectual change in St. Paul to the period of reflexion subsequent to conversion. Modern writers place it chiefly in the period before. It may well have been in both. Consciousness of the impossibility of unaided compliance with the requirement of the moral ideal (Ro 7) may well have prepared the way for the acceptance of Christianity, although by no means necessarily even suggesting, still less involving, its truth. On this point the greatest caution is essential On this point the greatest caution is essential.

We have no information. The elaborated hypotheses whereby St. Paul is supposed to have made the transition to Christianity in purely subjective ways are wonderful feets of critical in jective ways are wonderful feats of critical in-genuity, but they have no necessary relation to history. What is certain is that he believed the transition to have been suddenly effected by the manifestation of the Risen Christ.

(b) Similarly with the question of the inner revelation of Christ within the mind of St. Paul (Gal 1<sup>15, 16</sup> 'to reveal his Son in me'). Because St. Paul received a mental enlightenment, it cannot possibly follow that he did not see an outward vision or hear a voice. Rather that which he heard and saw formed the external data of his inward thoughts and convictions. The careful distinction drawn by St. Paul between inner visions of the Lord (2 Co 12), as to which he cannot tell whether they were in the body or out of the body, and the event appealed to in 1 Co 91 as the certificate of his Apostleship, show how vividly conscious he was of the external objective nature of that vision of the Risen Christ (see Goguel, p. 82). But that there was an inner revelation also as the result of the external vision is, of course, essential to the value of the vision. Indeed, it would not be easy to exaggerate the vastness of this inner revelation to St. Paul, provided always that space is left for the external circumstance which created it.

As to the external, objective character of St. Paul's vision of the Risen Christ, this and nothing less is required by the Apostle's language. 'The metaphor of an untimely birth, which he employs in regard to himself (1 Co 15<sup>8</sup>), implies a sudden, violent, abnormal change which brought him weak ordinity and immature into a new spiritual world' (Chase, Credibility, p. 72). Moreover, St. Paul places the appearance to himself in the same category with those to the Apostles in general (1 Co 15; cf. Gal those to the Apostles in general (I Co 15; cf. Gal 113. 14 and Lightfoot's paraphrase).

3. Evidence of the Evangelists.—The Synoptic problem must, of course, be studied elsewhere. Nor do our limits allow an analysis of the various documents. (1) The original of Mk., so far as we possess it, ends with the vacant grave, but no appearance of the Risen Master. [On the question of the last twelve verses of the present Mk. see above, p. 131 ff.]. (2. 3) But what the original Mk. no longer gives us is supplied by Mt. and Lk., who almost certainly wrote with Mk. before them; and whose agreements may partially supply the missing conclusion of the earliest narrative. To do full justice to the documents would require To do full justice to the documents would require a careful analysis and comparison of the appearances given by Mt., Lk., and Jn., together with the existing conclusion to Mark.

From what source the distinctive features of the Resurrection narratives in Mt. and Lk. were derived is not known. Attention has often been drawn to their diversities. They are certainly difficult to harmonize. But the substantial identity as to the central fact is not less impressive because of the diversities. The peculiar difficulties as to locality will be considered presently. presently.

(4) The existing conclusion of Mark.—'We may say with confidence,' writes Dr. Sanday (Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, p. 241), 'that its date is earlier than the year 140—whether we argue from the chronology of Aristion, its presumable author, or from its presence in the archetype of almost all extant MSS, or from the traces of it in writers so early as Justin and Irenæus.' 'It belongs at the latest,' says Dr. Swete, 'to the earlier sub-Apostolic age' (Apostles' Creed, p. 66). (See, further, Chase, Syriac Element in Codex Bezze, 1893, pp. 153-157).

(5) The Fourth Gospel.—The value set on this evidence will vary with critical estimates of the Fourth Gospel, into which it is impossible to enter here. Suffice it to say that a very marked tendency exists in more recent writers to return to older views. So advanced a critic as Jülicher, for instance, dates the Gospel between A.D 100 and 110 (Introd. N.T. p. 401). In no case is reception or rejection more influenced by philosophic and theological presuppositions than here.

We note then that the documentary evidence, while certainly less than we might desire, is adequate for its purpose. Partial discrepancies are not only compatible with, they may be confirmatory of, substantial veracity (cf. Gwatkin, Gifford Lect. ii. 48).

4. Canonical as contrasted with Apocryphal Gospels.—The Canonical narratives form but a small portion of the early accounts of Jesus Christ. And it is important to consider why we lay exclusive stress upon the Four. The Canonical Gospels, as their name implies, cannot be regarded merely as documents; they are the property, and indeed the product, of a community, the Christian Church. The documentary evidence for the Resurrection requires to be supplemented by the evidence of the existence of the institution and its principles. The Church gave its recognition to certain Gospels, and refused it to others.

'It was not the prestige of an Apostolic name that made it canonical, for the "Gospel of Peter" was rejected. Great antiquity and respectful quotation by learned Church writers did not avail to include the "Gospel acc. to the Hebrews," nor did philosophical thought avail the document commonly called the "Oxyrhynchus Logia" (Burkitt, Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 230).

What was the principle which led to their exclusion? What was it that the Four Gospels had which these had not? The answer manifestly is, that the contents of the Gospels called Canonical were in harmony with the principles of the Christian community which received them. The Church recognized the Four as possessing characteristics in which the others were more or less defective. 'And,' says Prof. Burkitt, 'it should not be forgotten that those of the non-canonical Gospels which we know enough of to pass judgment upon, show a sensible inferiority' (p. 259). 'Marcion's Gospel is in every way inferior to Luke, and the Gospel of Peter to either of the Synoptic accounts of the Passion' (ib.). Their extravagant wonder-workings and obviously fictitious character impress readers of any school of thought (cf. Pfleiderer, Urchristentum, ii. 121).

of thought (cf. Pfieiderer, Urchristentum, ii. 121).

5. The empty grave.—This is witnessed to by (1) the Evangelists; cf. the original narrative of Mk. (161-8). 'There is no reason to doubt,' says O. Holtzmann, 'that the women could not carry out their purpose [of embalming the body], simply because they found the grave empty' (Life of Jesus, p. 497). According to the tradition accepted by St. Paul, the first manifestation was on the third day, and therefore in Jerusalem. This agrees with the Apostles' visit to the grave, which should be contrasted with their visit with our Lord to the grave of Lazarus. That the grave was empty, would also seem to be required by Jewish contemporary ideas on resurrection (cf. Dn 12°).

Considerable thought has of recent years been bestowed on St. John's description of the manner in which the grave-clothes were lying. As far back as Chrysostom's time, attention was called to the fact that myrrh was a drug which adheres so closely to the body that the grave-clothes would not easily be removed (in. Joan. Hom. Exxx). Cyril of Alexandria suggested that, from the manner in which the grave-clothes lay folded, the Apostles were led to the idea of resurrection: Ex involutis linteaminibus resurrectionem colligunt, as the Latin version renders it (Migne, vii 683). Latham's theory is that the word inversity pairs implies that the napkin which had been wrapped around the sacred head still partially retained the annular form thus given it (The Risen Master, p. 43). The grave-clothes still marked the spot where the body had rested, and still retained the general outline of the human form (cf. p. 50). If this interpretation be correct, that St. John saw the napkin which had been about the head of Jesus, not lying with the linen clothes, but apart, twisted round, away by itself, then the suggestion would be not only the emptiness of the grave, but that 'that which died had passed away into that which lived' (Richmond, Gospel of the Rejection, p. 109).

On the evidence, so far, to the empty grave, we

On the evidence, so far, to the empty grave, we are constrained to say that the weight of the Evangelists' united testimony is so strong that it cannot with any justice be rejected. (For critical acknowledgment of this see Our Lord's Resurrection in Oxf. Libr. Pract. Theol. p. 87 f.).

(2) But it has been asserted that, whatever the Evangelists might think, at any rate St. Paul's theory of the Resurrection was independent of all interest in the empty grave (O. Holtzmann, Life of Jesus). His theory of the spiritual body, so it is said, does not require the resurrection of the material elements of the buried corpse. And it is further remarked that St. Paul, in his evidences of the Resurrection, not only makes no appeal to the emptiness of the grave, but actually makes no reference to the subject at all in his teaching. This supposed indifference of St. Paul to the question of the empty sepulchre is based partly on the character of his theology, and partly on his omission of any reference to the fact. But here we must remember St. Paul's antecedents. He was educated in the principles of the Pharisees, and doubtless held the prevalent theory of physical resurrection. As Schmiedel truly says, 'His theology came into being only after his conversion to Christianity. When he first came to know of Jesus as risen, he was still a Jew, and therefore conceived of resurrection at all in no other way than as reanimation of the body' (EBi iv. 4059); cf. 1 Co 15<sup>5.4</sup>. The suggestion in the term 'rose' (èyelpeu) as applied to the dead is that death is compared with sleep, and the resurrection out of the former to the awakening out of the latter. Moreover, the fact of the burial implies that the Resurrection was not merely of one who died, but also of one who was buried. Thus resurrection refers to an experience affecting the body, and not to an isolated experience of the soul; cf. Ro 8<sup>11</sup>, where resurrection is described as quickening our mortal bodies. Thus the grave of Jesus cannot be considered by St. Paul otherwise than as empty (see Schmöller in SK, 1894, p. 669). St. Paul believed in 'a highly objective resurrection, including a bodily somewhat, though of a non-fleshly order' (V. Bartlet, Apost. Age, p. 4; Riggenbach, p. 7).

Riggenbach, p. 7).
(3) There is the further evidence of the application to Jesus Christ of the passage in the sixteenth Psalm (1610): 'Neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption' (Ac 227). St. Peter sees an exact parallel between this language of the Psalm and the physical experience of the dead Christ. It is a reference to the Resurrection. 'He [David] seeing this before applies of the resurrection of Christ that this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption' (v. 31). No contrast could be greater than between this and the ordinary experience as exemplified in David. David manifestly saw corruption. 'He is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day' (v.2). Corruption its sad work had done. The foul engendered worm had fed on the flesh of 'the anointed one.' But St. Peter's contention is that, in the case of Christ, the physical frame saw no corruption. The fact of the empty grave is here involved, and is, moreover, thrown out as a challenge in the very city where our Lord was buried; and that within six weeks of the burial! It has well been asked: Was not St. Peter disturbed by the misgiving that the hearers might interrupt him with the crushing remark—We know where he was buried, and that corruption has begun its task (Ihmels, Die Auferstehung Jesu Christi, 1906, p. 26). The whole argument of St. Peter would be absolutely worthless, if any could refute the major premiss of the empty grave.

(4) The emptiness of the grave is acknowledged by opponents as well as affirmed by disciples. The narrative of the guards attempts to account for the fact as a fraudulent transaction (Mt 28<sup>11-18</sup>). 'But this Jewish accusation against the Apostles takes for granted that the grave was empty. What was certain was that the grave was empty. What was needed was an explanation.' So far as the present writer is aware, this acknowledgment by the Jews that the grave was vacated extends to all subsequent Jewish comments on the point.

Here, for instance, is a 12th cent. version of the empty grave circulated by the Jewish anti-Christian propaganda. The story is that when the queen heard that the elders had slain Jesus and had buried Him, and that He was risen again, she ordered them within three days to produce the body or forfeit their lives. 'Then spake Judas, 'Come and I will show you the man whom ye seek: for it was I who took the fatherless from his grave. For I feared lest his disciples should steal him away, and I have hidden him in my garden and led a waterbrook over the place."' And the story explains how the body was produced (Toledoth Jesu; see Baring Gould, Lost and Hostile Gospels, p. 88). It is needless to remark that this daring assertion of the actual production of the body is a mediaval fabrication, but it is an assertion very necessary to account for facts, when the emptiness of the grave was admitted and yet the Resurrection

Substantially, then, St. Matthew's narrative is corroborated by the admissions made by opponents of Christ. That the disciples removed the body was a saying commonly reported among the Jews 'until this day' (Mt 28<sup>15</sup>). And this admission by opponents is enough to show that the evidence for the empty grave was 'too notorious to be denied' (Cambr. Theol. Essays, p. 336).

(5) The grave, then, was assuredly empty. But the emptiness of the grave does not demonstrate resurrection. The alternatives are that this was a human work or a Divine. Either somebody removed the corpse, or the Almighty raised the dead. The momentousness of the alternative it is scarcely possible to exaggerate. The ultimate decision must be largely influenced by the entire range of a man's presuppositions. Two antagon-istic conceptions of God and the world and man-kind meet at the grave of Christ. It will always be possible to construct naturalistic hypotheses to account for the vacant grave, but it is impossible to conceal the rationalistic assumptions upon which such constructions are based. We may here quote a recent and extremely independent critic.

'It is admitted that with the Resurrection the body of Jesus also had vanished from the grave, and it will be impossible to account for this on natural grounds' (Wellhausen, Das Ev. Matt. p. 150).

(6) If we keep to the evidence, it is certain that the empty grave was not the cause of the disciples' faith. According to the Evangelists, the fact of the empty grave created no belief in the Resurrection in the case either of Mary Magdalene, or of the women, or of St. Peter. The only exception, and that under conditions of peculiar reticence and reserve, was St. John.

'Thus the oft repeated expression that the faith of the Christian Church is founded on an empty grave is one which requires explanation. The Easter faith did not really spring from the empty grave, but from the self-manifestation of the risen Lord' (S. Simpson, Our Lord's Resurrection, p. 103).

- 6. The locality of the appearances.—The narratives present us with a double series of manifestations of the Risen Lord, distinguished by locality: the Judæan series and the Galilean
- (1) Any true criticism should start from the data of the original Mark. According to this (16°), not only did the women visit the grave on Easter Day and therefore were still present in Jerusalem, but the message sent to the disciples, 'He goeth before you into Galilee,' implies the presence of the disciples also in Jerusalem on that day. Accordingly the theory that 'they all for-sook him and fled' (1450) means fled direct home to Galilee, is refuted by the implications of the same Evangelist (cf. Rördam, Hibbert Journ., July 1905, p. 781). On the other hand, the direction 'he goeth before you into Galilee' would seem to indicate that the lost conclusion of this Gospel must have contained a description of an appearance in Galilee. This may be true. But what we cannot determine is whether any Judwan appearance was also recorded.

(2) Mt. (289) relates that the first appearance took place to the women near Jerusalem, and then adds a manifestation to the Eleven in Galilee.

(3) Lk. contains an exclusively Judgean series of manifestations. He 'knows nothing' of appearances in Galilee. The significance of this must depend on St. Luke's worth as a historian. Harnack has recently exhibited a profound mistrust of the Lukan account (Luke the Physician). St.

Mark, who is assumed to have recorded nothing but a Galilæan series, is endorsed as correct. On the other hand, the high value of St. Luke as a historian is vigorously asserted by so critical a scholar as Ramsay, who came to the study greatly prejudiced against him. He places the author of the Acts 'among historians of the first rank' (Paul the Traveller, pp. 4 ff., 8, 14). Then, further, St. Luke cannot possibly, as St. Paul's companion, have been ignorant of the Jerusalem tradition. How could he conceivably have written a version of the Resurrection manifestation which the Jerusalem Church could not receive? It is quite possible that he derived his information as to the 40 days at Jerusalem itself. St. Paul gives no locality, but the natural view is that he considered the first manifestation to have occurred in Jerusalem. Is it possible that St. Luke's exclusive interest in the Judæan series is due to the purpose for which his Gospel was written? Writing for Greek believers, it would be natural that he should concentrate attention upon the Holy City. Is it not possible conversely that St. Matthew, as Pales-tinian and Jerusalemite, gives for that very reason the more distant and less known manifestations in Galilee?

Harnack seems reduced to the singular position that the only evidence for the Galilson series is St. Mark's conclusion, and that does not exist. For he lays all stress, for St. Mark's value, on St. Matthew as his copyist. He depreciates the independence of St. Luke and refects the authority of St. John. Thus, after all, the testimony to a Galilson series is reduced to a solitary witness whose testimony is lost.

The first impression derived from Lk.—that the Ascension took place on the same day as the Resurrection—is partly corrected on further consideration of the Gospel itself. For there does not seem sufficient time to crowd all these events into a single day. Emmaus is reached towards evening when the day was far spent (24<sup>29</sup>). The meal in the town must have taken some little time. And Emmaus is threescore furlongs (v.13)=7 miles from Jerusalem. The whole journey would take the greater part of two hours. Then follows the conversation with the two and the Eleven. Afterconversation with the two and the Eleven. Afterwards, Christ Himself appears and gives them an instruction in the Scriptures—the Law and Prophets and the Psalms (v. **). This must have taken a considerable time. Finally is placed the journey to Bethany and the Ascension. This could scarcely be before midnight. Yet certainly (as Rigdam says) the account gives the improvious Rördam says) the account gives the impression that the event was conceived as happening in the daytime (Hibbert Journ., July 1905, p. 774). If the incident has suffered condensation, the difficulty is at once explained culty is at once explained.

In this connexion it is worth noting that Ramsay describes St. Luke as deficient in the sense of time. 'It would be quite impossible from Acts alone to acquire any idea of the lapse of time 'Paul the Trac. p. 18). And the fault is not individual it is the fault of his age. St. Luke 'had studied the sequence of events carefully, and observes it in his arrangement minutely,' but 'he gives no measure of the lapse of time implied in a sentence, a clause, or even a word. He dismisses ten years in a breath, and devotes a chapter to a single incident.' Thus 'Luke's style is compressed to the highest degree; and he expects a great deal from the reader. He does not attempt to sketch the surroundings and set the whole scene like a picture before the reader; he states the bare facts that seem to him important, and leaves the reader to imagine the situation '(p. 17). These are said to be characteristics of the writer of the Acts. And they will explain some of the difficulties in his narrative of the Resurrection.

Rut it is asked. Since our Lord's prediction was

But it is asked, Since our Lord's prediction was that He would meet the disciples in Galilee and the angel's direction was in accordance with the same, is it not contrary to the logic of the situation, as well as to the original command, that appearances should occur in Jerusalem?—To this difficulty Rördam's reply is:

'This apparently insoluble difficulty is very easily explained. We learn (2411-24) that nobody believed the women's tale, and even those who had listened must to their words returned disappointed after having seen the empty grave. This fully explains why appearances followed in Jerusalem. For that such sceptics would not go to Galilee to meet Christ is obvious. Therefore, just as the original story was that Christ appeared to the women, because they doubted the angel's words, so the narrative goes on to relate how Christ had to appear to the aposities and the disciples together with them, as they did not believe the icomen's words '(p. 778).

7. The nature of Christ's resurrection body. (1) The statements of the Evangelists are commonly classifed as of two kinds: (a) Those which exhibit a purely materialistic view, the most impressive instance being Lk 240 'Bandle me and see for a apirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have.

(b) An immaterial series, illustrated in His vanishing and reappearing, in the difficulty of recognition and the alterations of form.

One school of criticism here endeavours to impose a dilemma, bidding us select between the two views, on the ground that it is impossible to accept both. Kelm, for instance, mays. There is a capricious alternating between a subtle and a gross corporelty, which is self-contradictory. (Jenus of Nazaro, vi. 340). We may, however, decline the dilemma, and declare ourselves propered to accept both series of statements, as forming parts of a perfectly conceivable and intelligible conception. This alternating between a subtle and gross corporatily, to adopt Kelm's expression, is, to begin with, protoundly original. The contemporary Phariasic idea of resurrection had no subtlety about it. It was grossly and even repulsively animal. The marty red Maccabees expect to repossess the same physical organs and limbs in the same condition as on earth. This is expressed with a coarseness which cannot be mistaken in 2 Maryll and 14% (see also Grobler in SK, 1879, p. 682ff.). It is resuscitation of the same body to the same estate as before. The Book of Enoch, it is true, speaks of the resurrection state as resembling that of the angels, but it describes the latter in such physical and animal terms as to deprive the resemblance of much value (cf. Enoch 514 with 151). The description of 'revealing every thing that is hidden in the depths of the earth, and those who have been devoured by the fish of the sea and by the beauts, that they may return and stay themselves on the day of the Elect One (612, ed. Charles, p. 160), is equally suggestive of a grossly material view.

The exact antithesis to the Pharisalc conception, which was prevalent in the Apostolic age, was the Greek conception of emancipation from the body and continued existence as pure spirit. See preceding article.

The view given by the Evangelists is independent of both of the above conceptions. It certainly possesses a strongly materialistic side. Yet with equal certainty it is no mere resuscitation of the animal frame. It is anything rather than a return to life under the same conditions. The broadest distinction is drawn by the Evangelists between the revivilication of Lazarus and the Resurrection of Christ. Lazarus is obviously represented as granted a re-entrance into earthly life under the same conditions as before, to become again the possessor of a corruptible organism, subject to the same fleshly necessities, and destined again to expire in a second experience of physical death (cf.

expire in a second experience of physical death (cf. Kruger, Auferstehung, p. 21 f.).

(2) The Pauline conception of the risen body.—St. Paul's dectrine is condensed into the two crucial phrases, a 'psychical' body and a 'pneumatical' body. The psychical body is the organ and instrument of the animal force; the pneumatical body is the organ and instrument whose vitalizing principle is the spiritual personality. The psychical body is that which discharges the functions of animal self-maintenance and reproduction. It is the organ adapted to life under terrestrial condithe organ adapted to life under terrestrial condi-The pneumatical is the organ adapted to life under non-terrestrial conditions. It is the best self-expression of spirit (Our Lord's Resurrection, p. 164 i.). Now, St. Paul's doctrine firmly maintains two points, of which the first is identity between the body which died and the body which rose. This is implied in all that we have seen of St. Paul's interest in the empty grave; in his illustration of the relation between the two states of the bedy are aligned to that he was taken. of the body as akin to that between the seed and body require the disappearance of the psychical? the perfected plant. It is further taught by his or can they coexist? Can the one remain intact description of his vision of Christ under the idea of Christ's Resurrection.

But if, on the one hand, St. Paul affirms identity, he no less emphatically affirms a distinction be-tween the characteristics and qualities of the body on earth and beyond it. 'Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God' (1 Co 15<sup>40</sup>). 'Thou sowest not that body that shall be' (v. <sup>17</sup>). The vastness of that body that shall be '(v."). The vastness of the distinction is so strongly asserted in the term the 'spiritual body,' that the identity might almost seem to be, what it never is, really obliterated. But the risen body of Christ was spiritual, 'not because it was less than before material, but because in it matter was wholly and finally shippered to the same than the same transfer than the same that the same than the same than the same than the same than the finally subjugated to spirit, and not to the exigen-cies of physical life. Matter no longer restricted Him or hindered. It had become the pure and transparent vahicle of spiritual purpose' (Gore, transparent vahicle of spiritual purpose' (Gore, Body of Christ, p. 127).

(3) A comparison of the Pauline doctrine with the Evangelists' statements does not lead, then, to the conclusion that their principles diverge. There is an extreme improbability that St. Luke, for instance, considering his relation to St. Paul, should be in hopeless contradiction with the Apostle's principles. But there is no manner of contradiction. The Evangelists are concerned with the historic manifestations of the Risen Christ, St. Paul with the intrinsic nature of the resurrections. Paul with the intrinsic nature of the resurrection body. The former describe the body of Christ during the temporary periods in which its presence was ascertainable by the senses; the latter con-siders the body as it is in itself. The former say, This is what we touched and saw, and our hands have handled; the latter is concerned with the profound inquiry as to what constitutes the nature of the risen body. Thus the aspects are comple-mentary not antagonistic.

(4) If we attempt, then, to formulate the Christian conception of the nature of Christ's risen tian conception of the nature of Christ's risen body, we shall affirm that, according to Christian doctrine, man consists of the personality or self together with a vehicle of self-manifestation. This vehicle is material. Under terrestrial conditions this vehicle must possess characteristics, properties, organs, adapted to such conditions. Otherwise it would be no self-expression at all. Such was the psychical body of Christ. But at death the self passed out of terrestrial conditions, leaving the fleshly condition of the body behind, but by no means continuing bodiless. The self is re-endowed with a vehicle of self-expression which is still with a vehicle of self-expression which is still material, only under the complete dominion of spirit. The self now exists under heavenly condispirit. The self now exists under heavenly conditions. The fleshly organism would be impossible there, because hopelessly unsdaptable to such continue to the such as a such as ditions. Its whole system, construction, solidity, its parts' and organs, its methods of self-maintenance, would be worse than meaningless under nonterrestrial conditions. We should suppose that the pneumatical or risen body of Christ was, in its normal state, as an ideally perfect utterance of spirit, imperceptible to the human senses as we now possess them. But the capacities of this ideally perfect self-expression are so great that it can manifest itself to persons living under terrestrial conditions. And we believe that this pneumatical body of Christ did temporarily assume such conditions of tangibility and visibility as to bring His 'subtle corporeity,' for evidential and instructive purposes, within range of our 'grosser corporeity.'

This leads to the difficult subject of the relation between the psychical and the pneumatical body of Christ. That they are related, in the Apostolic conception, is clear. But the question is, To what extent? Does the existence of the pneumatical within the grave while the other is declared to have risen? Is the emptiness of the grave in Joseph's garden essential to belief in Christ's transition into the pneumatical estate? Since it is impossible for us to determine the precise relation between these two conditions of the bodily life, we must be prepared for the possibility of the coexistence of the psychical and the pneumatical body. Would it therefore follow that the emptiness of the grave in Joseph's garden is indifferent to Christian thought? No, not in the very least. We must surely here distinguish between the Resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of mankind. It was clearly necessary for evidential purposes that the risen Lord should reappear within a terrestrial environment, and that for the same reason His grave should be vacated. Belief in the reality of His Resurrection in presence of the corpse was to that are absolutely impossible. that age absolutely impossible.

grave should be veacated. Belief in the reality of His Resurrection in presence of the corpse was to that age absolutely impossible.

Max Müller expressed years ago a regret that the Jews buried and did not burn their dead. For in that case, he thought, the Christian idea of the Resurrection would have remained far more spiritual. And the question has been quite recently saked, What kind of Resurrection would your gospel have exhibited if the body of Jesus had been cremated? Max Müller's regret is more than justified by the deeply materialistic conceptions which have heavily burdened the Christian mind. But has no weight whatever in view of the teaching of St. Paul. The suggested cremation of the body of Jesus would not in the slightest degree have affected the Pauline conception of the pneumatical body. Nor would it have removed the necessity for visible and tangible manifestations under terrestrial conditions. Christ must in any case have reappeared with features and form as of old, whether His body had been buried or burned. The scars must have reappeared upon it. The facts of dissolution of ordinary human bodies have not altered the ordinary belief in their physical reappearance in the Resurrection. The disintegration of the body and its return to dust, the cremation of the martyrs, did not prevent mediaval discussions whether one who lied in childhood would appear full-grown in the future life. The Maccabees, at any rate, knew nothing of the Resurrection of Christ, but that did not prevent their holding the grossest ideas of a resurrection state. 'As for cremation, Christian reverence shrinks from discussing the cremation of our lord's sacred body,' says Dr. Liddon; 'but cremation of our lord's sacred body,' says Dr. Liddon,' but cremation of our lord's sacred body,' and its remained to the contemporary thought ought not to have much difficulty in accepting the Pauline doctrine of the resurrection body. The facts of the existence of spiritual activity is the manifestation 'Childhous Raster Sermons, I. 111)

8. The sayings of the Risen Master are most significant. Their manner is perfectly distinct from that of the ministry. What Keim (Jcsus of Nazara, vi. 354) describes as the 'simple, solemn, almost lifeless, cold, unfamiliar character of the manifesta-tions, calls attention to the striking aloofness and unearthliness of the Easter tone. Familiarity is altered into distance and awful dignity. Yet with this difference, which is inevitable, if the circumstances are historic, the Personality is just the same. And as with their manner, so with their substance. They occupy, very marvellously, an intermediate position between the teaching of the ministry which they presuppose, and the teaching of the Apostles which they account for and explain.

9. Christ's Resurrection and modern thought.— Non-Christian explanations of Christ's Resurrec-tion.—There are only two ultimate explanations possible: either the event was the action of God, which is the Christian explanation; or else it must be accounted for within purely earthly and human limits. Rejection of the Christian or supernatural account leaves the necessity of providing a naturalistic explanation; otherwise there would always be a danger that the supernatural, although cast out on principle, would nevertheless return again. Non-Christian theories of Christ's Resurrection form a series. No one has summarized them better than Kein (vi. 327 ff.).

(1) There was the theory, now quite obsolete, which denied Christ's death. He fainted away on the cross, and recovered in the grave. The valuable point in this theory is its recognition that the Apostles did really see their Lord alive again as a solid objective fact confronting them. Its monstrously irrational character lies in its impossible assumption that a half-dead form, with difficulty brought back to life, leading an exhausted existence, and finally dying over again, could ever have inspired in His adherents triumphant faith in Him as a risen conqueror and Son of God. The well-known sentences of Strauss have effectually disposed of this miserable fabrication, with all the wretched immoralities which it included. It is, says Réville, 'un tissu d'invraisemblances matérielles et morales' (ii. 455).

(2) Another theory was that the body was secretly removed from the grave-either by opponents or by friends. Imagination hovers between Pilate, or the Sanhedrists, or Joseph of Arimathæa, or the gardener, or Mary Magdalene. Of the attempt to account for the empty grave as an imposture, Keim justly remarks: 'All these assumptions are repellent and disgraceful; they show that the holy conviction of the apostles and the first Christians . . . has not in the slightest degree influenced the hardened minds of such critics' (p. 325). This theory also has passed away. Critics, says Keim, have left off seeking an explanation from external facts.

(3) But there is still a world of mental facts. The naturalistic explanations of to-day are sought through psychology. There is the Vision hypothesis—a self-generated appearance, the product of reflexion on the uniqueness of the Personality. Jesus' followers, studying the Scriptures, came to the conclusion that it belonged to the vocation of the Messiah to pass through suffering to glory. From the principle, 'He must live,' they passed involuntarily to the assertion, 'He does live,' and to the further assertion, 'We have seen Him'! Thus they took a leap from a conclusion of the intellect to a fact of history. Keim's criticism is that reflexion requires time. Its advocates postulate a year—ten years. But the Apostolic evidence concurs in asserting that the interval between the death and the belief in the Resurrection was exceedingly brief. Strauss himself gave up the theory, and adopted another. 'Not so much by way of reflexion, it is now said, as by the quicker road of renexion, it is now and, as by the quicker road of the heart, of the force of imagination, and of strong nervous excitement, the disciples attained to belief in the living Messah' (p. 334). The invincible Jesus hovered before their minds (p. 343). When Mohammed died, his adherents swore to decapitate any one who dared to say that the Prophet had expired (p. 344). In reality Jesus was not dead to the disciples, since they had witnessed neither His Passion nor death nor burnal Back in Galilee the old associations revived, far from the disasters and the graves of Jerusalem - unbounded excitement, in tensified by abstinence from food and by the feverish moods of the evening, caused the limits of the outer and inner world to disappear. They thought they saw and heard externally, while they only saw and heard within. Martinean subspeed something of this subjective theory of emotion and reflaxion combined. It is the most popular non Christian explanation of the day. But Kenn deliberately rejects it.

explanation of the day. But Keam deliberately rejects it.

Kein admits that the Apostolic are was full of more or less sale in the serious had been the asses in kind as the appearances of the Ruen Christ, 68. Paul would certainly not have closed his his with the fifth or sixth manifestation. Why does the Apostic consider the manifestation to himself as last of a series (regree, 100 16%, obviously last of its hind, rarefully differentiating it from the visions which may have come either to himself or to others. 'Having made such a sharp and clean division, it is to be taken as proved that there is a between the first 5 or 6 appearances and the later often repeated visions such a great and broad guilf of time, and indeed of character, as rendered it timposible to review the latter appearances with the former (p. 53).

A vision of departed persons does not necessarily imply their resurrection. If Moses and Elljah were seen at the Transfiguration of Christ, did the disciples infer their resurrection. 'Continuous did not involve belief in their resurrection. In sitons were perfectly compatible with the continuance of the dead body in the grave, and no belief in their resurrection would ensue. Why then did the Apostle, having seen Christ after His death, affirm His Resurrection (cf. Schnüder in S. 184), p. 889? 'Mas it not because this 'areing Him was consciously different from the meeting then, the ordinary visions of the Apostolic are from the meeting then, the ordinary visions of the Apostolic are from the meeting then, the ordinary visions of the Apostolic are from the meeting on a dressin, or brown any kind of seeing except one involving physical identity. The idea of resurrection introduces an after death experience as it concerns the body. It affirms that that which evidence is also, however altered that which died. Separating then, the ordinary visions of the Apostolic are from the meeting too travel of a happy, were, performed recover involving physical dentity. The idea of the hisporters are reserve and ret

(4) Keim then comes to his own explanation. *I( the visions are not something humanly generated or self-generated, if they are not blossom and fruit of an illusion-producing over-excitement, if they are not something strange and mysterious, if they are directly accompanied by astonishingly clear perceptions and resolves, then there still remains one originating source, hitherto unmentioned, namely, God and the glorified Christ (p. 361). Keim accordingly propounds a theory of objective Vision created by Christ Himself. 'If the power that produces the vision comes, as according to our view it does, entirely from without, and the subjective seeing is merely the reflex form of what is objective, the immediate cessation of the seeing and of the will to see, as soon as the operating nower coases to operate, becomes perfectly intelligible. 'Even the corporeal appearance may be granted to those who are afraid of losing everything unless they have this plastic representation for their thought and their faith' (p. 362). Thus, according to this view, the Resurrection manifestations are a God created message of victory. To quote Keim's oft-quoted expression, they are 'a telegram from heaven,' an evidence given by Christ Himself and by the power of God.

This objective Vision theory, although far be-neath the Christian conviction, is nevertheless a very remarkable approximation towards it. It is a most significant recognition of the inadequate character of all purely subjective explanations of the Apostles' belief. It acknowledges a God-created reality in the Easter faith. The theories of fraud and fiction and self-delusion are hereby deliberately set aside. The Almighty produced the Apostles'

On the objective Vision theory see, further, Steude, Auferstaliung, p. 90, Latue, Microsomou, it. 680 (Eng. tr.).

The ultimate reasons for rejecting the Resurrection evidence are not historical. As Sabater truly says, 'Even if the differences were perfectly reconciled, or even did not exist at all, men who will not admit the miraculous would none the less decisively reject the witness. As Zeller frankly acknowledges, their rejection is based on a philosophic theory, and not on historic considerations' (L'Apôtre Past, p. 42) Strauss long ago fully admitted that 'the origin of that faith in the disciples is fully accounted for if we look upon the Resurrection of Jesus, as the Evangelists describe it, as an external auraculous occurrence ' (New Life, i. 399). Nothing can be more genuine than Strauss acknowledgment that he was controlled by a priori considerations, to which the fact of a resurrection was madmissible; cf. p. 397.

'Here, then, we stand on that decisive point where, in the presence of the accounts of the infraudous Resurrection of Jesus we either acknowledge the inadmissibility of the natural and historical siew of the life of Jesus, and must consequently retract all that precedes and give up our whole undertaking, or pledge ourselves to make out the possibility of the results of these accounts, i.e. the origin of the lebel in the Resurrection of Jesus without any correspondingly miraculous fact.'

This is his conscious, deliberate undertaking—to give an explanation of the evidence on the presupposition of a certain view of the universe. variably amounts to this. At the grave in Joseph's garden two antagonistic world-theories confront each other (cf. Ihmels, Auferstehung, p. 27; Luthardt, Glaubenslehre). Spinoza, it has been said, could not believe in the actual Resurrection of Jesus, because such belief would have compelled him to abandon his theory of the universe. Obviously the pantheiat must account for the manifestation on naturalistic principles.

Those who are anxious to dissociate religion from facts will naturally resent the position which Christianity ascribes to Christ's Resurrection. The relation between eternal truth and historic incidents cannot, of course, be treated in the limits at our disposal. But it must be remembered that a religion of Incarnation cannot possibly be dissociated from the facts of history. The objection, therefore, to the connexion between doctrine and history is fundamentally an objection to the whole principle of an external and specialized revelation, or to a progressive revelation which culminates in Divine personal entrance into history and self-manifestation within its limits (see Gwatkin's Gifford Lectures).

Similarly, the attitude of individuals towards the evidence is affected by their conception of the relation of body and soul. There are, says Grützmacher (l.c. inf. p. 120), ultimately three conceptions. Either body and soul are both integral portions of a complete humanity; or man is only body, of which the soul is nothing but a transient function; or man is only soul, and the body is its entanglement and its prison. Of these three theories, says the same writer, the last is the least congenial to modern thought. Psychology is strenuous in its insistence on the intimate and necessary relationship of soul and body (p. 121). The second theory is materialism pure and simple; but its unsatisfying character is to modern thought sufficiently obvious. There remains, in the long run, only the first conception, which places upon the body a very high value indeed. Immortality without embodiment is not a theory which harmonizes with the deepest reflexions of the day.

10. The Apostolic teaching on the meaning of Christ's Resurrection.—(1) Evidential as to His Messiahship.—According to the prevalent interpretation of Dt 21<sup>23</sup>, adopted by the LXX, 'cursed of God is every one that is hanged upon a tree' (cf. Jos. Ant. IV. viii. 6), the crucifixion of Jesus had, in Jewish contemporary thought, finally condemned Him in the sight of God and man. 'To a Jew the cross was infinitely more than an earthly punishment of unutterable suffering and shame; it was a revelation that on the crucified there rested the extreme malediction of the wrath of God. idea was no theological refinement. It could not but be present to the mind of every Jew who knew the Law. Within a few years (1 Co 12°) it was formulated in a creed of unbelief—Δνάθεμα Ίησοῦς. It found expression in the name by which in later days the Lord was known among the Jews—ver, "the hanged one" (Chase, Credibility of Acts, p. 149). "Whom ye slew, hanging him on a tree" (Ac 5<sup>30</sup>). Here was a public, an impressive, a final attestation of what Jesus of Nazareth was in the sight of God. Here was an end' (p. 150). There could be but one conclusion. Now here are appreciated the force and the meaning of the Resurrection. If 'the God of our fathers raised up Jesus' (Ac 530), then it was clear that the estimate inevitable from the hanging upon a tree had been mistaken, and must be reversed; that earth's rejected was God's accepted; then it was possible to believe of this Crucified One, 'Him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour' (Ac 5<sup>31</sup>).

Thus, on the basis of the Resurrection, St. Peter

Thus, on the basis of the Resurrection, St. Peter describes Jesus of Nazareth as Lord and Christ (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>), Prince of Life (3<sup>15</sup>), only source of salvation (4<sup>12</sup>), ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead (10<sup>42</sup>; cf. 17<sup>31</sup>).

'It is the expression,' says B. Weiss (Bibl. Theol. NT, i. 239), 'of the most immediate living experience, when Peter says that they were begotten again unto a living hope by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 P 13). Not till it took place was the dead Jesus manifested with absolute certainty as the Messiah.'

(2) Evidential as certifying the redemptive character of His death.—It required a new interpretation to be placed upon His death. The Resurrection showed the death to possess a Godward validity, affecting the Divine relations with mankind. It was the Divine response to the death, and the explanation to mankind of its meaning (see Gloatz in SK, 1895, p. 798; cf. Ro 64 10). The Resurrection, says Horn in a striking phrase, is the 'Amen' of the Father to the 'It is finished' of the Son (NK Ztschr. 1902, p. 548).

(3) Christ's Resurrection is evidential of His Divinity.—St. Paul begins the letter to the Romans with this thought: 12.4... the gospel of God...

concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, who was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead.' Here the essence of the gospel, that is, of Christianity, is said to be concerning God's Son. And the expression 'God's Son' is, says Meyer, not by any means to be taken merely as a designation of Messiah; it is in St. Paul a Son who has preexisted, and proceeded out of the essence of the Father, like Him in substance (cf. Liddon, Analysis, p. 4). The gospel of God concerning His Son is concerned with Sonship in the highest of all senses. It designates neither adoption nor official place, but personal equality.

God's Son, then, is viewed by the Apostle in two aspects, which both represent constituent elements of His nature,—according to the flesh, and according to the spirit of holiness. The former describes His humanity, the latter His higher Self. Regarded in the former aspect, He was born of the dynasty of David; regarded in the latter, He was declared to be the Son of God. The term translated 'declared to be ' (δραθέντο) might refer either to an actual appointment or to the declaration of a fact. If our exposition of the title 'Son of God' be correct, it is the second that is intended here. Jesus is, then, here declared to be the Son of God with power by the Resurrection. A powerful demonstration of His higher Self has been made in the sphere of resurrection (cf. Liddon, Easter Sermons, vi. 94, iv. 58; Gifford on Romans; contrast Du Bose, Gospel acc. to St. Paul, p. 31).

(4) Instrumental in effecting Christ's Exaltation.

(4) Instrumental in effecting Christ's Exaltation. The Resurrection is in Apostolic theology by no means merely evidential. It is no mere certificate of acceptance. It is not merely an indirect means through which men have become believers, a matter which can be dispensed with so soon as faith is gained, or is unnecessary if faith is obtained some other way. It is also instrumental, and produces its own necessary and indispensable effects. It has primarily its own effect on Christ Himself. Obviously it does not only certify Him to be the Christ. It is instrumental in effecting His Exaltation. It is through the Resurrection that Christ 'enters into his glory' (Lk 242; cf. Ac 22, Ro 62). St. Paul (Ac 132) applies to the Resurrection the Psalm, 'Thou art my Son, this day (i.e. Easter Day) have I begotten thee.' The primary reference (? to the coronation of Solomon) is here, accordingly, mystically transferred to the Exaltation of Jesus. Not that the Resurrection constituted Him God's Son (which He was throughout), but that it effected the transition into a glorified state. Jesus, as having expired on the cross, would be conceived by the Jews as transferred to the gloom of Hades. Jesus, as risen, was thereby exalted to a? condition hitherto unprecedented among the occupants of the other world (cf. Rev 118). As the result of the Resurrection, Jesus 'is at the right hand of God,' 'making intercession for us' (Ro 824).

(5) The Resurrection is also instrumental in effecting justification. The great passage is Ro 4th 'Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.' The two clauses are by no means identical—an antithesis of phrases without antithesis of meaning—as an attempt to transpose them ought to show. St. Paul could not conceivably have said, 'Who died for our justification, and rose again for our sins.' There is an intimate connexion between the categories of death and sin, and those of resurrection and justification. Moreover, both Death and Resurrection have their functions to discharge in completing the work of redemption. In the first place, Christ was delivered over to death as a Sacrifice on account of our offences. Thereby objectively reparation was made in behalf of humanity by its representative, and reconculation secured. But this, while conplete on the Divine side, leaves the earthward yet to be effected. The reconciliation must be subjectively appropriated by each individual. Accordingly Christ was raised again on account of our justification. Our individual acceptance is said to be due to the Resurrection. This is for two reasons : (a) because we can appropriate justification only by belief in the saving significance of Christ's death. And we can attain to this belief only through the fact of the Resurrection (cf. B. Weiss, Bibl. Theol., i. 437). But it should be most clearly understood that this is only a partial statement of the truth. Our individual acceptance is also due to the Resurrection : (b) because it was only by His Risen Life that Christ became the new lifeprinciple for mankind. Justice will never be done to this great passage so long as the effect of Christ's Resurrection on our justification is restricted to its being a mere certificate of His acceptance with God (contrast Pfleiderer, Paulinum, i. 119, and Btevens, Pauline Theol. 254 f.).

The Resurrection becomes the medium through which the glorified life of Jesus is infused into the personality of the believer. Apostolic Christianity, we are profoundly persuaded, does not limit itself to the former of these two conceptions, but embraces the latter. It is not Christ outside us, but Christ within us that completes the Apostolic view. It is not the recorded Christ appealing to us across the centuries, but the Living Christ imparting His glorified strength, that is the ultimate Christian principle. This is the meaning of St. John's teaching on eating Christ (Jn 6). This assimilation of Christ becomes possible only through His Resur-rection. And St. Paul can mean no less when he writes, 'raised again for our justification.' Thus, as B. Weiss says, the relation between the Death of Christ and His Resurrection is, that 'the former was the means of procuring salvation, the latter the means of appropriating it' (Bibl. Theol. i.

On this most important passage see, further, Mayer on Ro 6th, Liddon's Analysis, Newman's Sermen, 'Christ's Resurrection the Source of Justification.'

(6) The Resurrection of Christ is also, according (8) The Resurrection of a new is according the to Apostolic teaching, instrumental in effecting the physical resurrection of all believers. As early as 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup> St Paul appeals to Christ's Resurrection as the ground of consolation to the mourner. Simi larly St. Peter is represented (Ac 47) as 'preaching through Jesus the resurrection from the dead' (cf. Ro 6° 8", and above all I Co 15).

Specially noteworthy is St. Paul's argument in Ro 810t. On the supposition that Christ or in usif Christ has really entered into the individual believer—if His power has taken possession then the result is (a) that although the body human body is dead because of sin its belongs to the category of dead things owing to the influ ence of moral evil—not merely mortal but dead—yet the spirit—the human spirit—is life because of (Christ's) righteousness. That is to say, a resurrection has taken place already on the spiritual side. We are already risen with Christ—in the region of personal renewal—because the righteous-ness of Christ is in us—imparted to us. (b) But if so (v.11)-if the resurrection has already taken place in the spiritual,-the new vitality shall in process of time extend itself into the physical: He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies."

The Christian doutrins proclaims both a moral and a physical resurrection. Attempts were made in the Apostolic age, under the influence of non-Christian presurppositions, to lay exclusive emphasis on the former and reject the latter. Men declared that the resurrection was past stready (2 Ti 2<sup>19</sup>). Death was to be understood in a moral sense, and resurrection was its moral antithesis, it was a restoration out of the death of groot ance, a giving of life to the morally dead. Attempts are also made in modern thought to maintain excitatively a moral resurrection. But nothing can be more paradoxical than endeavours to shelter this exclusiveness under the authority of 8t. Paul. To say that 'in 8t Paul's ideas the expression fresurrection from the dead has no essential connexion with physical death' (Matt. Arnold), is to say what is preposterous to any one who has the great words of 1 Co 15 ringing in his mind. It is, as has been accurately said, 'claiming the authority of 8t, Paul's spiritual teaching in order to discredit the historical faith without which he declared his preaching vain (Waggett, The Holy Eucharist, p. 200). All attempts to limit 8t. Paul's idea of resurrection to the moral sphere are worse than useless. The fact is that 8t I'suil did not gratuitously attach a relic of incongruous materialism to a spiritual theory complete and consistent with Itaelf. 'He believed, Indeed, in our Lord's bodily Basurrection, but not in spite of his spiritualism, rather became of the triumphant character of his spiritualism. (Waggett, p. 201). The severance of human life into two distinct departments, the one the spiritual and moral over which resurrection prevails, the other the physical over which resurrection because, the other the physical over which resurrection has no power, is not a true spirituality, but a false and timed swirtualists. The false and timed swirtualists through thurkers, and departments, the one the spiritual and moral over which resurrection prevails, the other the physical over which resurrection has no power, is not a true spirituality, but a false and timid spirituality. 'It is false precisely through thislaty, and the figure is not a true spirituality, but a false and timid spirituality.' It is false precisely through thislaty, and sensible experience (Waggett, p. 200). The intimate consistence of the two sphares, the moral and the physical is fundamental throughout the Christian revelation. Death in Christianity is physical, and death is also moral. And the two interperetrate Redemption involves an intimate association between the two. The Iseath of Christ is involve an interpered and physical experience. Beath physical is a wfully rest, as real is its province as is death in the moral sphere. It is therefore impossible, consistently with Christian principles of redemption, to separate sin and dissolution into two works having no commexion. The Christian conception is of a lifeguing force which pervades the moral sphere already, and is to pervade the material bereafter. It has done both these already in the case of Christ. And the Spirit of Christ already pervades the Christian bere in the present world. He is already morally risen with Christ. The force of the Resurrection of Christ is already at work in the sphere of fund and affection and sill. But there is a redemption of the body set to come. (On the relation of moral to physical resurrection, see also Du Bone, flooped in the Geopele; and Denney, Atomisma and the Resurrection.

(7) Consequently it is seen that the Resurrection of Christ is the foundation of Apostolic Christianity, and this for dogmatic just as truly as for evidential reasons. (a) Their consciousness of its basal character is shown in the position it occupies in their witness. An Apostle is ordained to be a witness of the Resurrection (Ac 123). The content of St. Paul's Christianity is thought at Athens to be 'Jesus and the resurrection' (1719). The early sections in the Acts reiterate the statement, 'This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses (2<sup>26</sup>). (b) Moreover, negatively, the consequences to Christianity of a denial of the Resurrection of Christ were drawn out with all the dialectic force of St. Paul. And it is surely sig-nificant every way that this acute and searching analysis of the doctrine was made by one of the first teachers of Christianity. The fearlessness with which he propounds his great dilemmas is in itself extremely valuable and reassuring. He saw, with a clearness never surpassed, what the Resurrection of Christ involved; and seeing that, was calmly prepared to risk everything upon it. It would seem indisputable that St. Paul's entire exposition proceeds on the assumption that the Resurrection of Christ was not in controvers in the Church of Corinth. The section of Corinthian churchmen whom St. Paul has in mind accepted the Resurrection of Christ, but rejected the future resurrection of the dead. Their philosophic antecedenta rendered such rejection entirely natural (see Heinrici, in loc.; Kennedy, St. Paul's Conception of the Last Things, 225), while their Christianity constrained them to make a concession to faith in the altogether exceptional case of Jesus Christ. They were practically combining incompatible elementa from the Old and the New, and had not the clearness of thought to realize the incompatibility. There is certainly nothing abnormal to human religious experience in this. But to St. Paul's logical intellect it was intolerable. If there be no such thing as a resurrection of dead persons, then is not Christ risen (1 Co 15<sup>13</sup>). The denial of the general principle will not permit the affirmation of particular instances.

St. Paul then proceeds to show the effect of this denial of Christ's Resurrection: first, on the proclamation of Christianity, whose sum and substance become words lacking in contents and in truth, if Christ be not risen; secondly, on the believer's faith, which in that case becomes equally empty, being created by a baseless message; and thirdly, on the Apostolic proclaimers, who have delivered as fact what in reality is fiction, and have misrepresented God by affirming as His deed what He has not done. Thus in all three departments the denial of Christ's Resurrection evaporates everything. The substance of Christianity has gone, the believer's faith has gone, the Apostolic veracity has gone. To dwell on the second of these: The faith of a Christian depends on Christ's Resurrection, because forgiveness depends on the redemptive power of Christ's Death, and this is certified by the Resurrection. If the Resurrection is not historic fact, then the power of death remains unbroken, and with it the effect of sin; and the significance of Christ's Death remains uncertified, and accordingly believers are yet in their sins, precisely where they were before they heard of Jesus' name.

That St. Paul's estimate of the place of Christ's Resurrection in Christianity is profoundly true seems proved, conversely, by the invariable results which follow upon its denial. Without belief in the Resurrection there may easily exist a reverence for the moral sublimity of Christ's character, and a glad recognition of the religious value of His prophetic instruction. But these are widely different from faith in Him as understood by St. Paul. All distinctively Christian belief in Jesus has been founded on a knowledge of His Resurrection. It is this which has characterized and determined the nature of the faith which men have placed in Him. To their minds there has been a revelation which the Risen Christ has made, and which He could not have made otherwise than as having risen.

As a historic fact, it has been His Resurrection which has enabled men to believe in His official exaltation over humanity. It is not a mere question of the moral influence of His character, example, and teaching. It is that their present surrender to Him as their Redeemer has been promoted by this belief, and could not be justified without it. Indeed, those who deny His Resurrection consistently deny as a rule His Divinity and His redemptive work in any sense that St. Paul would have acknowledged. Pauline conceptions of Atonement are intimately bound up with Pauline conceptions of Easter Day. The former do not logically survive the rejection of the latter. Thus it comes naturally to pass that denial of the Resurrection issues ultimately in another religion, which, whatever may be said about it, is not Apostolic Christianity. The whole doctrine of reconciliation through the Word's assumption of the flesh, redemption by incarnation, moral death and rising again of the individual believer in and with Christ, are inseparable from Christ's own Resurrection.

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.—1. Jewish beliefs current in the time of our Lord.—The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, symbolically applied to the nation (Hos 6<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 37<sup>1-14</sup>), implicit as regards the individual in prophecy and psalm (Job 14<sup>13-15</sup> 19<sup>22-27</sup>, Is 65. 66, Pss 49. 73), has its first explicit expression in Is 26<sup>14-19</sup> as the hope of the righteous, based on conviction of God's power and faithfulness and on their persistent relation to Him. It appears in the Canon as formal prediction and definitely in Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, and became part of that 'consolation' which the devouter part of Judaism, in the absence of official prophecy, but upon the basis of past prophetic utterance and on the lines of prophetic indication, developed. 'The Pharisaic movement offered salvation to the Jewish race . . . partly by opening wider hopes to those who obeyed' (Swete, Apoc. of St. John, p. xxiii)—proximately the Messianic hope, and eschatologically the hope of the resurrection. The literature of the period preceding and following our Lord's appearance shows three views as to the future of the dead, viz. (1) the traditional doctrine of Sheol; (2) a doctrine, variously held, of resurrection; (3) a Platonic doctrine of immortality.

(1) Of these Sirach (17<sup>37-30</sup>) knows only the first unmodified, repeating the thought of Ps 6<sup>5</sup> and of Hezekiah's psalm (Is 38<sup>8-9</sup>)—the days of man are to the eternity of God as a drop to the sea,—wherefore the Divine pity (Sir 18<sup>8-11</sup>); the dead have lost the light and are at rest (22<sup>11</sup>); even of the righteous only the name and deed survive (44<sup>9-15</sup>); Samuel's death is 'his long sleep.' In Tobit death is dissolution (δπως ἀπολυθῶ) and permanent (τὸν αἰώνιον τόπον, 3<sup>6</sup>). As to the doctrine of 1 Mac. the evidence is negative; no future life is referred to. 'We fight for our lives and our laws' (3<sup>21</sup>). In Judith the enemies of God in the Day of Judgment shall meet His vengeance in putting fire and worms els σἀρκας αὐτῶν (Jg 16<sup>17</sup>), and shall feel the pain of it for ever; but in the absence of more, this scarcely implies a doctrine of physical immortality. This traditional eschatology had still its adherents in the Judæa of our Lord's lifetime (Mt 22<sup>23</sup>, Mk 12<sup>16</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27</sup>, Ac 23<sup>8</sup>).

(2) In 2 Mac. there is a clear statement of a developed doctrine of bodily resurrection for the righteous. God shall raise up those who have died for His laws the very members which have been

(2) In 2 Mac. there is a clear statement of a developed doctrine of bodily resurrection for the righteous. God shall raise up those who have died for His laws; the very members which have been stricken from the martyr being restored to him, and 'breath and life as at the first' 'unto an everlasting life' ( $7^{8.11.23}$  14%). The faith of such a restoration is felt as an ethical necessity. It is not so much a theory of human destinies as a conviction of the Divine justice and truth. The problem of martyrdom has compelled it—the problem whether supreme fidelity can issue in loss. That it should seem even for the present so to issue is realized as a difficulty, and is explained as a chastising, a temporal penalty  $(\beta \rho \alpha \chi \dot{\nu} \nu \dots \pi \delta \nu \rho \nu)$  for personal and national sins; the martyr's rôle being one of self-offering and explation for these ( $7^{18.37.38}$ ). Resurrection is God's reconciliation with His servants, and is implied in their persistent relation to Him—they are 'dead under God's covenant of everlasting life' ( $7^{33.38}$ ). But for the enemies of God there is no resurrection (vv. 14.36).

As to the extent of the resurrection, the case in 2 Mac. is that of the martyrs only; but the confidence expressed with regard to them is probably based on a wider hope, including Israel, or at least the faithful in Israel  $(\sigma \dot{\nu}\nu_{\nu}\tau \sigma \hat{s} + \delta \delta \epsilon \lambda \phi \sigma \hat{s} + \sigma \sigma \nu, 7^{23})$ , hardly implies this, the  $d\delta \epsilon \lambda \phi \sigma t$  are literal; but the tone of the whole passage [see v. 14] implies a faith for others than the actual speakers). In the apocalyptic literature, which did much to extend the doctrine of resurrection in Judaism, it is generally presented as limited to Israel. For the question with which the Apocalypses deal is one of fulfilment of promises to Israel, and the deeper question whether 'the righteous shall be as the wicked'—at what point and in what form the faithful in Israel are to be vindicated and the apostates meet Divine justice. The earlier section of Eth. Enoch seems to expect a resurrection universal to Israel, with the exception only of the absolutely evil: 'complete in their crimes' (2213). The second section excludes none—all Israel is ne second section excludes none—all Israel is raised, but the righteous and holy are chosen from the rest for reward (51. 6145). In the third section 'the judgment appears to be followed by the resurrection of righteous Israelites only' (Charles, Bk. of Enoch, p. 27). The conception of a resurrection general to manhind deep resurrection general to be followed by the resurrection general to be followed by the resurrection general to be successful to the second general to be followed by the resurrection general to be followed by the results of resurrection general to mankind does not occur in this literature until the close of the period under discussion, when the Apoc. of Baruch (1st cent. A.D.) expressly proposes the question of the number of those who shall rise (287 411, cf. Lk 1328), and teaches a first resurrection at the Advent of the Messiah, of 'all who have fallen asleep in hope of Him'; but also apparently a resurrection of good and evil, Gentiles and Israelites, for the purpose of judgment (50<sup>3. 4</sup> 51<sup>1-6</sup>). 2 Esdras teaches one general resurrection of the same character (7<sup>32-33</sup>).

with regard to this development, there seems no adequate reason for regarding it as introducing a mechanical and unspiritual conception of resurrection (Charles, Eschatology) as distinguished from a high and spiritual conception of resurrection limited to the just. This also rises from an ethical root. It is based in apprehension of the necessity of Divine justice, conceived as requiring not only the vindication of righteousness; a justice from which death itself affords no hiding. The doctrine of a general resurrection of good and evil alike follows from the apprehension of God as Judge of the whole earth, dealing with man and not with Israel only, and marks a widening of eschatological outlook from being an interest in the fulfilment of promise to Israel to become an interest in the assertion of God as fulfilling righteousness for the world.

As to the nature of the resurrection body, in 2 Mac. only the facts of restoration and identity are insisted on. In Enoch, while the resurrection are insisted on. In Enoch, while the resurrection body is one in which the righteous shall 'eat and lie down and rise up,' it is changed to be imperishable and glorious—'garments of glory... garments of life' (61<sup>14-16</sup>); they are 'clad in shining light,' and share the nature and rank of the angels (514 1046). In Apoc. of Baruch the dead are raised as they have died, in order that the living may know the verity of their resurrection (49<sup>2-4</sup>); but thereafter a judicial change passes upon both them and those who have been alive at the time (51<sup>1</sup>), the wicked 'becoming worse' than those who presently occupy Gehenna (52<sup>2</sup>, 18, 16), while the righteous are transfigured and are fitted for immortality and the eternal world (57<sup>2</sup> 4 9-14). We have here much more than a doctrine of physical resuscitation; resurrection is apprehended as advance to a new and higher plane of life.

(3) The doctrine of immortality without resurrection appears in two forms—Palestinian and Alexandrian. (a) In the Palestinian form the consummation of the soul's destiny is postponed to the end. There is an intermediate state, in which the righteous and wicked are already separated; and there is Final Judgment, after which the righteous pass to the heavenly world of glory and felicity, and the wicked to eternal woe. Thus and felicity, and the wicked to eternal woe. Thus the Book of Jubilees speaks of the 'Day of the Great Judgment,' and goes on to say of the right-eous: 'Their bones will rest in the earth and their spirits will have much joy' (23<sup>11.13</sup>); and this is probably the view of the Assumption of Moses as well (10<sup>3-10</sup>), and perhaps of the Slavonic Enoch. In the latter the translated Enoch does indeed receive a raiment of Divine glory instead of his 'earthly robe' (equivalent to the changed body, 'garments of glory,' of the Simil. of Enoch); but his case is exceptional, and he is destined for 'the highest heaven' (672). Nothing is said of any reclothing for those who have died. There is a place prepared for every soul of them (492), 'Many mansions . . . good for the good, evil for the evil' (612), 'their eternal habitation' (6510). With regard, however, to these two last-named writers, there is silence as to the resurrection rather than denial of it; and it is difficult to say, especially of the Assump of Moses, that they were conscious of divergence from current beliefs.

(b) Alexandrian Judaism, adopting a Hellenic philosophy, taught a doctrine of personal immor-tality of the individual soul, which it endeavoured more or less successfully to disentangle from the questions of the corporate destiny of the nation and of cosmic judgment. Accepting from Platonism the ideas of the eternity and evil of matter, it necessarily ignored that of resurrection; and accepting from the same source the ideas of the soul's pre-existence and of salvation by wisdom, it was compelled to regard each soul as working out its own fate in this life, and as reaching that fate at the point of severance from the flesh; immortality in its final form beginning from the moment of death. Thus in Wisdom the body is essentially subject to sin' (14); the soul is pre-existent and essentially good (8<sup>20</sup>), but is entangled in matter which weighs it down (9<sup>15</sup>); man is destined for immortality (2<sup>20</sup>), which the wise attain (8<sup>13, 17</sup>), and find it in all blessedness as they depart from our sphere of knowledge (3<sup>1-5</sup> 4<sup>7-14</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). The despisers of wisdom on the other hand have neither hand of wisdom, on the other hand, have neither hope nor comfort in death; it is for them an immediate passage to judgment and retribution (3<sup>16-19</sup> 4<sup>18-30</sup> 5<sup>14</sup>). The Hebrew idea of death as unnatural and punitive is nevertheless, however inconsistently, also present to the mind of the writer. God made not death, but the impious called it in (1<sup>13-16</sup>); death entered by envy of the devil, and is the portion of his servants (2<sup>24</sup>). The idea of a future Judgment, a 'day of decision,' also keeps its place in the writer's thought (3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>20</sup>). Nor is his concrown; they shall judge the nation and have dominion over the people, sharing their Lord's king-dom (28). He has not received a palace and royal crown; they shall judge the nation and have dominion over the people, sharing their Lord's king-dom (28). He has not receive the people of the people o dom (38). He has not successfully assimilated his Hellenism, but requires the Hebraic eschatology to supplement it. The teaching of Wisdom on this subject is substantially that of Philo as well:
'Apparently he did not look forward to a general and final judgment. All enter after death into their final abode' (Charles, Eschatol. p. 260). The philosophy of 4 Mac. is Stoical, not Platonic; but it agrees with Wisdom and Philo in ignoring the ideas of an intermediate state and of resurrection, and in teaching an immortality of the spirit only, commencing when this life ends.

2. The teaching of Jesus.—Our Lord found Himself in an atmosphere of thought in which ideas representative of these various forms of doctrine were more or less current. The Rabbinic teaching on the whole held the field as a popular orthodoxy, identified in the common mind with devoutness and earnest religion: and it asserted the resurrection of the dead. This was generally conceived of as twofold—a resurrection of the just, and a general resurrection preparatory to universal judgment (Muirhead, Eschatol. of Jesus, p. 91); the anticipation of resurrection was a commonplace of piety (Jn 11<sup>24</sup>). At the same time, the Sadducaic party adhered to an unmodified Sheol doctrine and contended aggressively for it. No allusion to the Alexandrian doctrine of an immortality without resurrection appears in the NT; but the Palestinian schools cannot have been unaware of its existence. Throughout His teaching Christ puts aside the second and third of these doctrines, and sets His seal to the first. He teaches a resurrection of the dead.

The teaching of Christ as to resurrection is widely scattered through the Gospels. The capital passages are Mt 22<sup>23-38</sup> (Mk 1218-27, Lk 2027-38) and Jn 519-31 622-56. The term used is commonly πάστασεις; once (Mt 2753) it is τρερεις. Verhal forms of άνιστάναι and τράριον seem used interchangeably, occurring consecutively in the same passages (as in Mk 1226-26, Lk 1131-32), or in parallel passages (cf. Mt 1621 1728 with 1729), without apparent distinction of sense. ἐναστάσιον τῶν νευρῶν occurs in Mt 2231, but in the parallel Mk 1226 ἀν. ἐν νευρῶν, and in Lk 2028 σῶν ἀντρῶν τῆς ἐν νευρῶν (cf. Ac 221). ἐν νευρῶν is the phrase used of Christ's resurrection of the Baptist (Mt 1479, Mk 97-10); of the supposed resurrection of the Baptist (Mt 1429, and of the case of one rising from the dead (Lk 1621). In the Epp. ἐκ is used of Christ's resurrection, ἐν. τῶν νευρῶν of resurrection generally. A distinction of usage seems to exist, ἐx implying an individual or a non-universal resurrection. ζωστειῶν occurs in Jn 521 623 (cf. Ro 417 811, 1 Co 1622-38 45), but is more than a synonym for ἐνστάνειο οτ ἰγτύριο. for energyas or intigue.

'To Jesus the OT Scriptures as a whole conveyed the pledge of the will and power of God to raise the dead who had lived unto Him' (Muirhead). In His reply to the Sadducees He does not instance the more precise predictions of the prophets, but argues from the broad relation of God to His servants, not as a covenant but as a vital relation. Their resurrection is so involved in the nature of the case that it requires no other demonstration than that God lives and that God is their God. He appeals to the common usage which called God 'the God of their fathers,' of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob' (men who were dead), and to its authority in the oracle of the Bush; and needs no more than the admission that such language conveyed a truth. As touching the dead that they rise, has not God confessed that He is theirs? recognized that in this life they had already entered into possession of Him? Such possession, once established, cannot be lost. God is theirs how can their life (for surely they live to Him) remain permanently mutilated? Surely it shall again be for them life in fulness of their nature. They have fallen; death is death: Christ does not minimize the penal and privative character of what was to Himself a great horror; but they shall rise again—for God is theirs: they have a hold and right in God, who has life in Himself and is essentially the Circu of Life. tially the Giver of Life.

tially the Giver of Life.

The argument appears excessive in simplicity, but involves more than it expresses. If man is capable of possessing God, then man is potentially akin to God; if man has known and loved God (as man must, if God has in any sense become his), then God must have laid hold on him and must have given Himself to man. God is their God: they have then even in this life attained an interior contact with the Divine, and have so far entered the sphere of the imperishable; they have gained an inheritance which is essentially eternal. In possessing God they have secured a place in God's future, and in whatever God will reveal or accomplish. Our Lord thus moves the question to a higher ground than that of promise or covenant or even of ethical necessity, and grounds upon a concrete relation which is recognized as vital and dynamic. The argument involves whatever is involved in the nature of human personality; its reflexion of the Divine unity, its indestructibility and capacity to resist and survive the shock of physical dissolution, and its necessity of full self-realization in God. It is impossible to deny to it completeness of development along the lines of initial character. Death interrupts but cannot ultimately bar that development. As touching the dead, that they rise again—that life shall be for them reconstituted and perfected—have we not read that God calls Himself their God?

The discussion in this case was with those who 'deny that there is any resurrection of the dead (Lk 2021), and it was enough for its purpose to consider the case of those who in life have possessed God. On the face of it the argument might seem to apply to these only. On the other hand, it seems to identify (at least for man) immortality with resurrection. What it proves is that the with resurrection. What it proves is that the dead are living (οὐκ ἐστι θεὸς νεκρῶν ἀλλὰ ζώντων); what it assumes is that, if they live, they will rise again. Christ does not contemplate that they may be immortal apart from that destiny, or discuss the alternative conception (which cannot have been unfamiliar to his interlocutors) that the patriarchs might live in God for a merely ghostly eternity. The alternatives which He

(in any effective sense) or that they shall live completely—there shall be an dνάστασιs, a reconstitu-tion of that duplex life of spirit and organism which is characteristically human. The question whether the finitely spiritual can be conceived of as self-conscious, apprehensive or active apart from organism, or whether the fact of its limitations local and temporal and of relations to other tions local and temporal and of relations to other finite existence does not imply organism, is involved, but is not the whole question. The question is of man, who is distinctively the meeting-point of two worlds, the spiritual and the material, at which the Creator has 'breathed into the dust,' and at which the creation becomes conscious of God. The differentia of humanity is this incorrection, making possible the ultimate this incarnation, making possible the ultimate Incarnation in which the Word became flesh. In virtue of this duplex nature man is essentially the priest of the material creation, interpreting its testimony to God, and capable of furnishing the medium in which Creator and creature reach an absolute unity in Him who is Head over all things and in whom all things consist. By death this dual constitution is broken—resurrection is its recovery; reconstitution in the totality of the elements of our nature which condition fulfilment of man's distinctive vocation in the cosmos. The redemption which is to redeem man must reach his being in its completeness—the organism of the spirit as well as the spirit itself. It must reach even the body which has been 'the entrenchment of sin' (Gore). Not as resuscitation, but as 'change'; so that on a new plane of life, unexplored by us and therefore meantime indescribable to us, it may be the adequate organism of a spirit perfectly correspondent with the Divine Spirit, and death be swallowed up 'not in life, but in victory.' The norm of Christ's personal resurrection may seem to imply this: His work in redemption is not completed by a sacrificial death, but must go on in a triumphant rescue of the body from death. It is not left as an 'outworn tool,' but is brought again, quickened and transformed, to be the instrument of a universal mediation; its reassumption is for Him entrance upon an eternal priesthood. Incarnation is not a passing phase of Deity; it is the realization of the Divine purpose in humanity. Death is privative; disembodiment is incompleteness. Our salvation implies our re-constitution, not only in the spiritual which places us in correspondence with God, but in the organic which places us in correspondence with God's creation. God will not leave us 'hopelessly stunted and imperfect' (Milligan, Res. of the Dead, p. 161), but will 'give a body.' With regard to the scope of the resurrection, the question is not touched in the discussion with the Sadducees, unless in so far as the argument used may seem to identify immortality with resurrection. (St. Paul in 1 Co 15 has the same alternatives: 'if the dead are not raised . . . then they also which sleep in Christ have perished. He recognizes no third possibility, of a merely spiritual immortality). Elsewhere, however, Christ teaches a general resurrection (Jn 5<sup>29-29</sup>) of 'all that are in the graves'; not only an elect of them, but they who have 'done evil' as well as they who have 'wrought good'—and distinguishes 'the resurrection of life' from 'the resurrection'. from 'the resurrection of condemnation.' The rejection of these verses as an interpolation, on the ground that their teaching is not found elsewhere in the Synoptics or in Jn. itself, is not justified. A general resurrection of just and unjust forms at Repeat resurrection of just and unjust forms at least the background of the thought in  $Mt 5^{29.30} (\mu \eta$  δλον το σῶμά σου βληθη είς γέενναν)  $10^{28}$  (καὶ ψυχήν καὶ σῶμα ἀπολέσαι ζν γεέννη)  $12^{41.42}$ . Lk  $11^{32}$  (ἀνδρες Νινευίται ἀναστήσονται κ.τ.λ.), and in  $Mt 25^{31.46}$ . seems to oppose are that either they no longer live. It is implied in the sequence to the statement that God is not the God of the dead but of the living, reported by Lk. (2038), 'for all live unto him'—the thought of which would seem to be that not such only as the patriarchs were have a link to God, but that men as men 'live to Him,' and that this must have its inference for all. The absence of bias on St. Luke's part towards a doctrine of general resurrection, peculiar to himself among the Evangelists, is evident from the extended form in his account (v. 50) of the saying more briefly reported in Mt 22 00, Mk 12 00. As reported by St. Luke ('they which shall be accounted worthy,' etc.), the saying would seem to contemplate a particular resurrection only. Nor can bias on St. Luke's part be argued from the fact that (Ac 24 15) he reports St. Paul as preaching to Felix a resurrection of the just and of the unjust, while St. Paul himself in his Epp. deals only with the believer's hope in Christ; the one concerned Felix, the other did not. A doctrine of general resurreconly as the patriarchs were have a link to God, the other did not. A doctrine of general resurrection does appear in the reports of the Synoptists. And in Jn 6<sup>29.40.44.54</sup> the emphasis laid upon a resurrection which is by Christ Himself (έγω ἀναστήσω αὐτὸν) seems to imply that there is also resurrection of another character, and to be consecutive with the teaching of 528.29

The salvation constituted and offered in Christ is a positive salvation, to be realized and possessed in Himself. With that salvation the gospel is occupied. Our concern is with that—with the hope which is declared to us and with the Kingdom which He has opened to believers. We know the end, for we know the way. There is an alternative—a way that is not to life and an end that is not with Christ. It is named only, for our fear. It is the background of outer darkness against which the glory in Christ is thrown up into splendour. But it is in no sense the subject-matter of revelation. That which is revealed is life and incorruption (2 Ti 110). This is the general principle of Christian teaching. Two aspects of resurrection are accordingly discoverable in that teaching, and first in the teaching of our Lord. Of these the one belongs to the essence of positive gospel; the resurrection of Christ Himself is already its beginning and pattern, and the root for us of its power; it is matter of assurance and exposition; our present life in Christ is full of experiences referable to it, and is explicable only in its terms; it is dynamically identified with whatever we are in Christ now or hope to be in Him hereafter. The other, resurrection of condemnation, is only indicated as in some sense an element of final adjustment of the issues of life. It remains in the sphere of apocalyptic, out of which the resurrection of life has been brought into the historic present by the resurrection of Christ which already demonstrates and illustrates it. This resurrection, in which He is our forerunner, of which His victory over death is the operative force, which shall result in us as the effect of our vital union with Him, and is the extension to us of the life from death to which He has attained, is the subject of our faith and the topic of Christian doctrine. See preceding art. § 10 (6) (7).

RETALIATION (Mt 5<sup>38-48</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-45</sup>). — 1. The lex talionis must have been part of the most primitive Semitic law, as it was current in almost identical words in Babylon and Canaan. The Code of Hammurabi prescribes (§§ 196, 200): 'If a man has caused the loss of a gentleman's eye, his eye shall one cause to be lost; 'if a man has made the tooth of a man that is his equal to fall out, one shall make his tooth fall out.' The verse Ex 21<sup>24</sup>, which Christ quotes (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>), belongs to the Book of the Covenant, the oldest stratum of Hebrew law.

2. In various ways the later Hebrew legislation mitigated the severity of the lex talionis. That law could be, at best, but a very rough-and-ready method of dispensing justice. The man who had only one eye, and who destroyed the eye of another, would suffer, by the loss of his remaining eye, a penalty infinitely greater than the damage he had inflicted. And, apart from actual difficulties in the working of this law as a hard-and-fast rule, difficulties which were, in point of fact, settled by the judge as they arose (Ex 21<sup>22ff</sup>, Lv 24<sup>19-22</sup>),—there was a growing feeling that the exaction of the full letter of the Law was out of harmony with what was known of the will of God (Lv 1918): 'Thou to allow the children to suffer for the sins of the parents, and vice versa (Dt 2418); but this alleviation of the penalty was an innovation (1 K 2121,

3. When Christ came to deal with the Pharisees, He found that this broader interpretation of the Law was lacking. The interest of the scribes lay not in the effort to do the will of God as between man and man, but in the academic discussion of the compensation to be awarded, in soulless casuistry instead of in the effort to make straight the way in the practical business of life (Mk 711). In nothing was His teaching more utterly at variance with the received traditions of His day than here. The law of the Kingdom was love. Men were to be moved not by the spirit which was always seeking its own, but by the spirit which desired the welfare of the other. Christ put forward a principle instead of insisting upon the observance of a multitude of details. The whole question of the treatment of the adversary was lifted into another sphere. And what Christ counselled in the Sermon on the Mount He practised in His own life and death. The disciples who wished to call down fire from heaven upon the inhospitable village were rebuked (Lk 9<sup>34</sup>); the disciple who began to meet armed force by arms was told to put up his sword into its sheath (Jn 18<sup>11</sup>); the false accusers were met by silence (Mk 1461).

The lesson that Christ taught was well learned by the Apostles. St. Paul, in his earliest letter, warns his readers to 'see that none render evil for evil unto any man' (1 Th 5<sup>15</sup>, cf. 1 P 3<sup>5</sup>). Again, he points out that men should not seek their own vindication, but should leave that to God (Ro 12<sup>17,19</sup>). Lawsuits of Christians between themselves are frowned upon by this same broad reading of Christ's teaching. When Christians are more concerned with gaining a personal victory than with seeking the honour of God, Christ's cause suffers (1 Co 6<sup>1,7</sup>).

4. Is Christ's teaching a new law? — Literal obedience to Christ's teaching on this subject would destroy the structure of society. If no man were, in the strictest sense, to count as his own that which he had, there could be no such thing as private property; the home would disappear; the State would lapse into a condition of anarchy. And while a believer might, in his desire to obey his Lord, give to any one who took away his coat his cloak also, he might be doing the robber and society a very ill turn. The beggar is best helped not by indiscriminate charity, which does not attempt to get at the root of the trouble, but by being put in the way of earning a living for him-

The robber has information laid against him and is punished, not to satisfy a personal grudge, but to force him to amend his ways and to protect the fabric of civil life. It is clear that what Christ lays down in these particular verses, and in the Sermon on the Mount generally, is not a new code of law, but a broad principle of action. As much of the discourse is aimed at the Pharisees, who had made an idol of the minutue of the Law, it is wholly improbable that Christ meant to lay down a new set of rules, which could be worthly observed only by adhering to their letter. It was necessary, in order that men should remember His teaching, that He should put the truth He had to propound in vivid and concrete form. St. Matthew, the most Judaistic of all the Evangelists, does apparently read the new principles as being legal directions; but the version of the Sermon given by St. Luke shows that this was not how the Apostles, whose outlook was towards the Gentiles, understood them. The injunction to turn the other cheek is thus not an injunction to be fulfilled to the letter, but an illustration of the principle that is to guide a man in disputes. He is not in passion to smite the wrong-doer, and to requite one wrong by another; he is to try to win the offender by love. He is to consider the other.

'So far as our personal feeling goes, we ought to be ready to effect the other check, and to give, without desire of recovery, whatever is demanded or taken from us. Love knows no limits but those which love itself imposes. When love resists or refuses, it is because compliance would be a violation of love, too because it would involve loss or suffering' (Gore, Sermon on the Monat, p. 103).

8. Modern theories of non-residence. —George Fox took the Sermon on the Mount as another law; and as he fulfilled the injunction to take no thought for clothing, by wearing a leather suit, so he practised to the letter the injunction with regard to non resistance. 'Did we over resist them? Did we not give them our backs to beat, and our cheeks to pull off the hair, and our faces to spit on?' is a familiar phrase in his Journal. But his followers have got below the letter into the spirit. With all their charity, they have not given indiscriminately. They have made their place in philanthropic work by their insistence on searching into the causes of social evils, and, while helping others, have themselves accumulated wealth.

The great modern representative of the nonresistance view is Tolstoi, who carries his adherence to the letter of Scripture to a point which involves a return to anarchy. He takes the case (Letter on Non Resistance) of a robber found killing or out-raging a child. The child can be saved only by killing the robber. Should the robber be killed? Tolstoi answers in the negative. Even the non-Christian should not kill the man, Tolstoi argues, because he cannot say whether the child's life is more needed or is better than the robber's life. He, therefore, has no sufficient rational ground for action. But the Christian, who sees the meaning of life in fulfilling God's will, has no ground at all for killing the robber. 'He may plead with the robber, may interpose his own body between the robber and the victim; but there is one thing he cannot do-he cannot deliberately abandon the law he has received from God, the fulfilment of which alone gives meaning to his life.' The enswer, of course, is that the fulfilment of God's law may not mean the observance to the letter of one phrase. In this case, should it not be shown to the child who is innocent and helpless rather than to the man who is proving himself by his deed to be dangerous to his human kind?

RETRIBUTION.—We shall understand by this word the operation of the Divine justice, rewarding and punishing, in this world and the next. (For human justice see art. VENGEANCE).

1. The doctrine in our Lord's time.—As is well

1. The doctrine in our Lord's time.—As is well known, the primitive religious conscionsness of the Jews expected earthly happiness to correspond strictly to merit and demerit. Facts made it impossible to hold such a theory, and we have the problem of the Divine justice as it is raised in the l'salms, Job, etc. The remarkable thing is that the next life is not, at least with any consistency of belief, called in to redress the balance of this (see, e.g., Kirkpatrick, Psalms, p. xciv.). Later Jewish thought, developing the doctrine of immortality, found in it the natural answer to the problem, as in the opening chapters of the flook of Wisdom. But the conception of recompense moved mainly on external lines; the rewards and punishments which did not come in this life were expected in our Lord's day—

"The religious relation between God and His people was a legal one, upbeld by God as righteous Judge, in the way of service and counterwavice, reward and punishment." Plous Jews here and there might remember that torgoness and free grace were part of the character of Jahweh, 'but with most Jews this mode of view was overshad over by the legalistic conception, whereby every act of obedience was regarded as having an exact recompense, and every blessing to be obtained as requiring previous service.' Desirring to carn a Davice reward, and as great reward as possible, they sought to practice a strict legal righteousness, and, wherever possible, to exceed what the law demanded. But yet again, anxious to attain that reward on the castest possible terms, they wished to do no more than was absolutely necessary for attaining their purpose '(Wendt, Tesching of Jessa, I. p. 38 ff.).

The charges that religion is only an enlightened

The charge that religion is only an enlightened selfishness, is valid against this position and the popular conception of Christianity. The object of this article will be to show that it is not valid as against the teaching of Christ.

The clearest and most decisive proof of the truth we are considering is Christ's own death and the sufferings and persecutions promised to His followers. Suffering may be a mark of God's love no less than of His anger (cf. He 12); the grain of wheat must die to bring forth fruit (Jn 1221), therefore death and all that leads to it cannot be re-garded as retributive. The cup of suffering which the disciple drinks is the cup of Christ, not the wine of the wrath of God.

(2) Christ teaches equally decirrely the fact of retribution in the sact world, and uses freely the language of reward and punishment. The doctrine of personal responsibility is indeed fundamental to Christianity, and it is necessary to refer to only a the typical passages: Parables (Mt 13<sup>31</sup> 18<sup>21</sup> 22<sup>3</sup> 25, Lk 12<sup>31</sup> 16), Reverds (Mt 19<sup>31</sup>, Lk 14<sup>31</sup>), Passishments (Mt 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 9<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>31</sup>, Jn 5<sup>33</sup>).

(3) Retribution is to the character rather than to the act, and is automatic. Every act rewards itself, or, in other words, integrates itself, in a twofold manner; first, in the thing, or in real nature; and secondly, in the circumstance, or in apparent nature. Men call the circumstance the retribu-tion. The causal retribution is in the thing, and is seen by the soul' (Emerson, Essay on 'Compensa-tion'). The truth is seen most clearly in the Fourth Gospel. Life is the result of faith in Christ and of the knowledge of God (3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>34</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>). Judgment is immediate, the self-inflicted result of wilful blindness, and of the rejection of the message of life (316 834 1246). At the same time this is no purely abstract law; behind it is the personal God, and the Son to whom judgment is committed (5<sup>22</sup>); see Westcott, St. John, p. xlviti. So in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarun, 'the gulf' is the character * which has been formed on earth and is unalterable. The spiritual condition of the two cannot be altered by a mere change of place. In the parables of the Talents and the Pounds, neglect of opportunity brings unitness for trust; use of opportunity automatically opens the door to the reward of greater opportunity. The cutting down of the fig-tree is the inevitable doom of its barrenness (Lk 13<sup>6</sup>; cf. Mk 11<sup>13</sup> and the teaching of the Baptist, Mt 3<sup>16</sup>). The same principle is seen in the blindness men bring on themselves (Mt 6<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>), and if the blind lead the blind, they must fall into the distance of the property was received. fall into the ditch (1516). The measure we receive is in the nature of things the counterpart of that which we give to others (7), the judgment the counterpart of our judgment, God's forgiveness of our forgiveness (6). The house must stand or fall according to the foundation on which it is built (736-37)

Accordingly, acts have their results rather than their rewards, and the idea of 'the punisher' tends to disappear.

'It is well to remember that infliction from without, by another, so far from being an essential element in all thought of punishment, tends more and more completely to disappear, as having no longer even an accidental place, in those deeper resisties of punishment which human punishments do but outwardly symbolize. The more we discern their process and character, the more profoundly do we recognize that the punishments of God are what we should call self-acting. There is nothing in them that is arbitrary, imposed, or in any strict propriety of the word, inflicted. As death is the natural consummation of mortal disease, not as an aristrary consequence inflicted by one who rescribed the mortal disease, but as its own inherent and inswitable climax, so what is called the judgment of God upon all as but the gradual necessary development, in the consistent sinner, of what sin luburently is' (Moberly, Atonement and Personality, p. 15).

It is from this point of view alone that we can

It is from this point of view alone that we can harmonize the fact of forgiveness with that of judgment or retribution. So long as we look on the latter as the inevitable result of acts considered each on its merits, there can be no room for forgiveness, or at least it appears as an arbitrary interference with law. As soon as we realize that both have to do with character, the difficulty largely disappears. Our retribution depends on character. Forgiveness affects the character, being bound up with perceous, the change of character. The dying thief may have lived a life of sin; under the attraction of the grace of Christ, his whole self experiences a change, and so his future can be changed too. The woman who loves much finds the sins of her past forgiven because she has become a new creature. The unmerciful servant finds his old debt back upon him, because the conditional forgiveness of his master has not touched his character."

(4) Christ spiritualized the conception of reward and punishment. Reward consists not in having certain things, but in seeing God. It is the result of character and the fruition of character. Punishment is the leaving of the self to be identified with sin, and so to depart from Christ into the outer darkness which is separation from God. Again we refer to the Johannine conception of life (17°). we reter to the Johannine conception of life (17°). In the Synoptics, happiness is connected with the Kingdom, as particularly in the Beatitudes; it consists of treasure in heaven (Mt 6°°, Mk 10°°). Specially significant is Lk 10°°; the main cause of rejoicing to the disciples is not the possession of exceptional powers, but the knowledge that their names are written in heaven. All centres round the possession of the helicane to Christ names are written in heaven. All centres round the personal relation of the believer to Christ (Mt 25, Lk 128). And this happiness is enjoyed even now; the believer has life (Jn 3<sup>30</sup> etc.). He enjoys the good things of this life, not as specific rewards for good actions, but as gifts of the love of God which he has fitted himself to use (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>). There can indeed be no thought of a claim against God (Lk 17 6 5). We cannot appear as litigants before His judgment-seat.

Accordingly we may say that Christ destroyed the distinction which existed in the Jewish thought of His time, and which still exists in popular ethics, between rewards in this world and the next. If men know where to find their happiness, how to seek for their reward, they have it now, just as the retribution of the evil conscience is immediate. Only this happiness will be a personal possession of the soul; it may be accompanied by trouble and persecution in the world (Mk 10°, Jn 16<sup>2, 28</sup>). The believer must not look for the twelve legions of angels to vindicate him; none the less he will know the peace of Christ, and his joy will be fulfilled even here and now. The Beatitudes and the section on the rewards of discipleship (Mk 10") are particularly instructive on this point.

To sum up, Christ did not so much change the place and time of happiness as alter its conception. He transformed the idea of retribution, connecting it not with the isolated act, but with the permanent character which lies behind the act. To find His deepest teaching we must go to the Fourth Gospel and to kindred sayings in the Synoptics. Few will dispute this method, whatever be our ultimate view of the nature of the Fourth Gospel. It is, of conree, perfectly true that Christ ness more popular language without scruple, as all teachers must. He appeals to the fear of punishment, and speaks of many and few stripes (Lk 12"). He figures the blessedness of the Kingdom under the current image of a feast (Mt  $22^2$ , Lk  $14^{15}$ ), and He uses freely the motive of reward (Mt 6.  $10^{41}$   $19^{23}$ , Lk  $6^{23}$   $14^{12}$ ); He even speaks as though it were the conscious motive of humility (Lk 14<sup>7-11</sup>). We must interpret such language in the light of His profounder teaching. Even so, some have found it a fault that the thought of reward does not entirely disappear. Religion should be so completely unselfish that all thought of self should be eliminated. The connexion of virtue with the desire for happiness is one of the ultimate problems of Ethics, and cannot be fully treated here. But this we may say. The claim of extreme altruism must fail because it ignores personality (Gore, Sermon on the Mount, ch. vi.). We cannot think ourselves away. We can cease to look for our own happiness in our own shortsighted manner, at the expense of others, apart from God. We can come to identify our own ends with God's purpose for the world, but we cannot dismiss the hope that in the realization of that purpose we shall find our own happiness, that when the Kingdom comes we shall see it and have our place in it. In one sense we learn to do good, hoping for nothing again; or else in seeking to save our life we shall lose it. And yet in the background there is always the consciousness that in losing our life for Christ's sake, we do in the fuller sense find it. In this paradox is summed up the teaching of Christ and the NT. See also REWARD.

&quot;The name 'Lazarus' ('God has helped')—the only name given in a parable—must be intended to be significant of character, so less than the names in the Prigrim's Progress.

&quot;The significance of the truth may best be emphasized by a postrast. Buddhism, strictly interpreted, leaves no loophole for forgiveness. Its doctrine of *Karma is that every act has its strict and inevitable resultant in another existence, either by transmigration, or in heaven or hell. This effect depends on the act per se, and has nothing to do with the character. The embryo-Buddha in one of his existences destroyed a widow's but in a fit of temper. Though he repented and built her a better house, and had performed intumerable other good deeds, yet for this he suffered in hell for eighty thousand years, if it is obvious to compare Plato, *Republic, X., on the rewards of the Amass.

REU.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 325, AV Ragau).

REYELATION.-1. The question stated.-Few theological or philosophical problems have received keener and more industrious examination than the problem which is suggested to us by the word 'revelation.' Does the word stand for any real disclosure of His secrets by the Eternal? Does God stoop to unveil His face to men? And if He does, what is the mode of such manifestations? What are the conditions under which we may believe that a revelation has been given? Is there any room in a rational scheme of the Universe for a revelation? It is pointed out, on the one hand, that every great religion has been promulgated in the faith of its adherents that its message was a veritable message from heaven, and not merely a well-reasoned theory about life; while, on the other hand, it is a part of the claim of Christianity that the revelation of God in Christ is unique and final. 'Comparative Religion' has reached the dignity of a science, and it will not allow us to pass by the non-Christian religions of the world with a mere phrase of patronizing criticism or approval; while the teaching of the Christian creeds will not allow us to regard our own religion as only one among the many in which men have sought and have found their God. And, within the last half-century, a yet more searching question has been suggested by the scientific view of man's gradual development in mental and moral, as in physical, stature, which dominates at this moment all scientific investigation. Is not revelation rather a gradual disclosure than a sudden unveiling? And may it not be that what men have taken for an act of God should rather be described as an acquisition on man's part which came to him, as all natural knowledge has come, by the gradual quickening of his spiritual faculty, in response to the discipline of life?

These are among the largest and most momentous questions on which the human mind can be engaged. It would require encyclopædic knowledge to answer them fully, and only the briefest treatment is possible here. But it may help to prepare the way for an answer if we examine the aspects under which the idea of revelation is set forth in the NT, and the presuppositions which it is necessary to make before the questions that have been rehearsed can be clearly apprehended. We cannot entertain the idea of a Divine revelation without making certain large assumptions as to God and man of which it is well to remind our-selves at the outset. They are all assumed in the

2. Presuppositions.—(a) First, then, we take for granted the central fact of life—the fact that God is a living Being, Merciful and Just: that 'God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him' (He 11°). One must begin somewhere, and we begin here. That is, we assume that, supposing God's creatures to be capable of understanding His purpose in Creation, He is capable, on His part, of making it known to them. He is the Giver of all good things, the Author of all knowledge; and we recognize that the highest of His gifts may be the knowledge of His will and the stimulus of His grace. (b) To say this implies, secondly, that there is a certain capacity in the recipients of such Divine communications. No one will maintain that the Eternal Spirit could thus reveal Himself to the brutes; for, to be sure, a revelation is limited by the capacity of those to whom it is addressed. Revelation, as Maurice said, is always the unveiling of a person; and a revelation can be made to personal beings only in terms of personality.

Thus far, no assumption has been made which is peculiar to Christianity. The thesis is simply this: that whatever difficulties are found in believing that men could appreciate a revelation, there is no difficulty in believing that God could give them one, if He be indeed alive. Whether man could securely recognize it as revelation, and not as a mere discovery of new truth, is another question, to which we shall return later. All that is here asserted is that God may communicate with man. If He be a Personal Being, communication with Him is possible. This is the first principle of all religion worthy of the name.

(c) We assume, in the third place, that as revelation is thus possible, it may also be described as probable. Creation involves responsibility for the creature, and thus there is a probability that He who made the world will continue to guide it. Mankind is not perfect, and it is not doubtful that the progress of the race towards holiness and truth would be made easier by the grace of heaven bringing light and life.† To assert that revelation is probable is then only to assert that God has pity for human weakness, and that it is not His will that it should be left unaided to perish.

3. Aspects of idea of revelation.—We have now to consider the aspects under which the idea of revelation; is presented in the NT. There are, as it seems, two lines of thought in St. Paul about this great matter which we must try to distinguish. Sometimes he speaks of Divine revelation in terms which would be acceptable to every believer in a spiritual religion; at other times he uses language which can be interpreted only if we remember that to him Jesus Christ was a supreme, a unique, a final revelation of the character of the Eternal God. We may take these separately, although they are quite consistent.

4. Revelation in general.—There is a sense in which all religion must presuppose a revelation—that is, the unveiling of His purposes by the Supreme, and the response with which He meets the aspirations and the yearnings of human souls. No religion, e.g., can live which does not encourage and justify the habit of prayer, which does not claim that prayer is heard and answered. In other words, all religion presupposes not only movements of the human spirit towards God, but also a movement of the Divine Spirit towards man. And in every age, and by men of every religious creed, it has been believed—and we cannot doubt that the belief was well founded—that God enters into holy souls and makes known to them His will. In every age and place men have realized His providence, have believed that the Eternal manifests Himself in the world. Now this manifestation may be either ordinary or extraordinary; by which it is not intended here to suggest any distinction between what is natural and what is supernatural. That distinction may not be tenable, for we do not know all the possibilities of nature, and so do not know what may be above it. But what is meant is that there are two distinct kinds of experience, in which men become assured that God is speaking to them—one the commonplace, everyday routine of life, and the other the experience of rare moments of high spiritual exaltation.

(1) Multitudes of religious men have felt, as they looked back upon the past, that their course was ordered from the beginning by an unseen hand, that a Providence has guided them into the paths which were prepared beforehand for them to walk in, and they have been enabled to perceive in the opportunities of life the calling of a Divine voice. They have felt, moreover, that this is the only intelligible interpretation of life; and that without this revelation—for such it is—of its meaning, life would be chaos, and the secret of the future a dreadful and portentous enigma. The light by which they walk is 'the light which lighteth every man,' and they rejoice in the illumination which it sheds upon their path. Some of the most saintly lives that the world has seen have been lived in the strength of the conviction that the changes and chances, as others call them, of the years are but the unveiling of a Divine face; and that the vision of God becomes brighter when seen through the mists of pain. This is the belief of those men and women among us who have the best right to be heard; their spiritual emotions are not altogether born of their own patient hopes; they are due to the stirring of the Divine Spirit, and the stimulation of the Divine Life; they are a revelation of the unseen.

(2) And to such souls there come rare moments of spiritual ecstasy and exaltation, when they are filled with an overpowering conviction of the presence of God, of His Will for them, of His Will for others. Such a moment it was in the life of St. Peter when he reached the supreme conviction of his life, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>); and we have the highest of all authority for the source of his inspiration: 'Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.' Such a moment came to St. John at Patmos when, being 'in the Spirit on the Lord's day' (Rev 1<sup>10</sup>, cf. 4<sup>2</sup>), he heard the Heavenly voice pronouncing judgment on the Churches, and saw in a vision the Heavenly figure which is always standing unseen in their midst. Such a moment came to St. Paul when the vision of the Christ at the gates of Damascus changed the whole course of his career; 'it pleased God to reveal his Son in me' (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>) is his description of the experience. And again and again St. Paul refers the certainty of his convictions to the fact, which is for him indisputable, that they reached him by revelation. The 'mystery of Christ,' as he calls it, that the Gentiles are fellowheirs of the gospel—this was 'made known' to him 'by revelation' (Eph 3<sup>3</sup>). The gospel which he preached came to him, he writes to the Galatians, 'not from man, but through revelation of Jesus Christ' (Gal 1<sup>12</sup>). Such were the revelations of which he wrote, while there were yet others which he counted too intimate, too sacred, to commit to words, as when he says that he 'was caught up into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter' (2 Co 12<sup>4</sup>). It was one of St. Paul's deepest convictions that to him were revealed at times from heaven thoughts greater than his own; so sure is he of this, that he is careful on occasion to explain that all his utterances have not the same supreme authority. 'The things which I write, they are the commandment of the Lord' (1 Co 14<sup>37</sup>). So he says of one subject. Concerning another, 'I have no commandment' (7<sup>20</sup>) is his prelude, although he concludes, 'I think that I have the Spirit of God' (v. <sup>40</sup>). But he is sure that the Divine message has been disclosed to him in a fashion which may be sharply distinguished from the ordinary ways in which knowledge is acquired. Human wisdom is not identical with Divine wisdom; so he warns the Corinthians, as he quotes the ancient words, 'Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not, and which entered not into the heart of man, whatsoever things God hath prepared for them that love him'; and declares, 'Unto us God revealed these things'—not the secrets of the future, but the secrets of the present—'these things God revealed through the Spirit' (2<sup>6</sup>-1<sup>10</sup>).

These and similar passages show beyond doubt that the NT saints, and St. Paul in particular, were quite convinced that God at times reveals His secrets—His mysteries—to a devout and earnest spirit; and that this revelation is consciously recognized by the soul as distinct from the discovery of a Divine purpose in life, or the assurance of Divine guidance, which are reached by patient striving after the highest things. The one is the experience of all good men; the other is the portion of the saints, the elect to whom a fuller disclosure of the Divine will is made. It is the portion of the prophets, the 'seers,' to whom the 'word of the Lord' speaks with an irresistible authority. Yet in both cases—in the ordinary and the extraordinary experiences alike—there is not only a movement of the human soul towards God, but a movement of the Divine love towards man. We generally keep the word 'revelation' for the extraordinary or abnormal experiences; and there is no objection to this restriction, provided we understand that in neither case does man's spirit act without response or without stimulation from heaven. But this it is essential to bear in mind. 'Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you' (Jn 15<sup>16</sup>) are words of universal application.

We have now to interpose with an inevitable question. What is the test by which we may assure ourselves that the imaginings of pious souls are not merely of subjective value, that is, that they are anything more than the expression of discontent with the limitations of human knowledge and of human life? What is the test, or is there any test, by which we may 'try the spirits' (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>), by which we may convince ourselves or others that a true revelation of the Divine will and purpose has been vouchsafed? The theology of the 18th cent. did not hesitate in its answer to this question. The answer was found in the word miracle. Miracles were the appropriate credentials of revelation, which could not be guaranteed as objectively valid without them. Paley and Butler and their successors do not delay to prove this; it seems to them beyond dispute. And forty years ago Dr. Mozley put forward the same view in a well-known passage in his Bampton Lectures (On Miracles, p. 15): 'The visible supernatural is the appropriate witness to, the outward sign of, the invisible supernatural—that proof which goes straight to the point; and, a token being wanted of a Divine communication, is that token.' Taking this view of miracles and of revelation, it has been sought to distinguish natural from revealed religion by the circumstance that miraculous signs are not needed to guarantee the truth of the former, which commends itself at once to man's reason, while they are necessary to confirm our belief in the doctrines of the latter, which are not discoverable by our unassisted faculties, and which may be surprising and even unwelcome to faith.

This is a view which presents many difficulties, clear-cut and definite as it seems. (i.) It is imposclear-cut and definite as it seems. (1) It is impossible to distinguish sharply natural from revealed religion, because, in fact, all religions have presupposed a revelation, an unveiling of the Unseen Realities. 'Natural religion,' said Guizot (Méditations, ii. 237), 'exists only in books.' In all religion there must be a reciprocal communication between man and God; there must be not only man's aspiration heavenward, but heaven's benediction earthward. And this latter is in its measure a revelation. (ii.) It is true that a revelation of new truths requires to be certified to the intellect as valid, but it is not the anomalousness or the inexplicability of the circumstances in which it is given that supplies such certificate; it is their significance. A 'sign' need not necessarily be 'miraculous' (see art. 'Sign' in Hastings' DB), although it may have this character (see 'Miracle,' ib. vol. iii. § 5). The context, so to speak, of revelation helps to disclose its meaning and purpose, and thus enables us to refer it to its true author; but the significance of the context may depend upon concurrences and combinations, none of which, taken separately, need be abnormal or even unusual. (iii.) The revelation itself may be conveyed by these 'signs' which in fact constitute it. The σημεῖα of the Gospels are vehicles, or media, or instruments of revelation quite as much as evidential adjuncts. Their interpretation leads to new thoughts of God and man, undiscoverable, or at any rate undiscovered, without them; and thus it is that 'signs' such as the resurrection of Christ (which would be classed as miraculous) or the moral beauty of His life (which some would not regard as necessarily a miracle) form the premises of Christian theology (cf. Westcott, The Gospel of Life, p. 80). They unveil the Divine love, and power, and holiness; and they are accepted as true revelations, in part because of the existing testimony to them as historical facts, but in part also because they find a response and a welcome in men's hearts. Such revelations serve to unify the bewildering experiences of life, and provide a means of co-ordinating our thoughts about the highest things. That is to say, in brief, they are accepted as true because they are coherent with our spiritual experience, while at the same time they enlarge its boundaries and illuminate its dark places.

Thus the question, What is the ultimate test of revelation? is not to be answered merely by pointing to miracle as its guarantee. It is part of a much larger question, What is the ultimate test of truth? And to this there is only one answer: experience (cf. Wilson, L.c. p. 242), either individual or general; that is the one unfailing test of opinion in every department of human life.

(a) First, as to the experience of the individual. That, in the region of the spirit, is not capable of transference from one to another, and—in so far—it can be valid only for him who has had the experience. But for him the sense of 'realized fellowship with the unseen' (of. Westcott, l.c. p. 83) is so vivid and so vital that he cannot call it in question. He is conscious not only of the strivings of his own soul, but of a response from the spiritual world. And if it be urged that, after all, it would be impossible for him to be sure of this, so subtle and deep-seated are the movements of the soul, his only reply can be that he is sure of it. He is able to distinguish, he will tell you,—for St. Paul's experience here is not singular or even unusual,—between the convictions which he has reasoned out for himself and those which have presented themselves to him with an irresistible authority from without. And he will point, in justification, to what is an admitted fact of mental life, viz., that our powers of discovery are no true measure of our powers of recognition. We can all recognize as true, and as obviously true, many a principle, or law, or fact, when it is once brought before our notice, which we should have been quite incapable of discovering for ourselves.* And it has been the deep-seated belief of the saints that their most cherished and intimate convictions were such as they could never have reached had they not been guaranteed to them by a message from the spiritual world.

(β) But, it will be said, there can be nothing trustworthy in such merely individual convictions. To claim to be in possession of a revelation from heaven is one of the commonest symptoms of mental disorder; and those who make such claims most persistently are the most intractable patients in asylums for the insane. There is, unhappily, no doubt of it. The mystical spirit is divorced, in too many cases, from any just sense of the logic of facts; and incapacity to judge aright of things temporal is often combined with an eager and extravagant judgment upon things eternal. It may be—we do not know—that sometimes a true vision of the spiritual order has proved too much for a brain intellectually feeble, and that the mental powers have been permanently injured by too great an effort being demanded of them. And -conversely-it is undoubtedly true that when the brain fails to do its work, whether from disease, or overstrain, or other causes, the man ceases to be able to distinguish fancies from facts, both in the physical and the spiritual world. But to conclude, therefore, that all alike who have claimed to have had visions of the spiritual order, or who believe that God has answered their prayers directly, are necessarily insane, would be a strangely perverse and illogical inference. Indeed, experience suggests a quite different generalization. Despite these abnormal cases, the men of spiritual insight who see 'visions,' who live near to the boundary of the spiritual order, are the truly 'practical' men, and achieve most of enduring benefit for the race. The truth is that, taken separately, spiritual experiences cannot be verified by any one except the recipient of them; but they cannot be dismissed as untrustworthy merely because some who claim to have enjoyed them are not very wise.

The spiritual experience of the individual is not transferable—apparently, for it would not be well to dogmatize on such a point—from one to another.

*This is fully admitted by so thoroughgoing a Rationalist as Kant: 'If the Gospel had not taught the universal moral laws in their purity, reason would not yet have attained to so complete a knowledge of them; although, once they are there, we can be convinced through pure reason of their truth and validity' (Letter to Jacobi in Jacobi's Werke, iii. 532).

So far, then, it does not submit itself to any objective test of its trustworthiness. But when we find, as we do find, that in a large number of cases the individual experiences which are reported or recorded are of an identical character as regards the information which they supply of the spiritual order, they present a phenomenon which is within the reach of scientific investigation. That the Eternal guides human lives and does not permit them to drift aimlessly into the paths which lead nowhere, that He answers prayer, that He supplies counsel and strength—these are not specially Christian convictions, they are shared by countless multitudes who would all offer the same proof of their truth, namely, personal experience. This is a solid fact of human nature which demands recognition. And if such convictions are not entirely mistaken, then the Eternal has in so far given a revelation of His power and of His love. He has intervened in human life; He has

The test of truth is experience; experience must count for something when we are examining the widespread belief of mankind that the Eternal reveals Himself in the life of the individual and in

We have seen that the general experience of religious men gives identical testimony as to God's power and willingness to communicate with them in their need. But we saw, too (§ 2), that a certain mental and spiritual capacity must be pre-supposed in the recipients of any revelation. And, as this grows from age to age in the history of the race, and is by no means equal in all races at the same period, or in all men even of the same race and epoch, it will follow that revelation, if made at all, must be made gradually and progressively, in correspondence not only with the needs but with the capacity of men. We have all learnt the truth of this in regard to the history of the race, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon it. If the minute and careful study of the OT history and literature, which has occupied the best thoughts of so many of our best Christian scholars for 40 years, had taught us nothing but this, we should still have learnt a lesson of the most far-reaching significance—a lesson which is full of hope and inspiration. It is a lesson which is illustrated by the history of every religion in which men have sought to find God; the measure of His prace is their capacity of receiving it, and not any Divine economy by which there is a jealous hiding of His face. And the same is true of the individual soul. It is in correspondence with the gradual quickening of our spiritual faculty that the Divine secret is gradually disclosed. 'Unto him that hath, to him shall be given' (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>) is not a paradox of the Divine bounty; it is a law of nature, and therefore of revelation as well. all at once can we expect to experience the Beatific Vision, but only in proportion as we grow more and more into the Divine likeness, and learn, through the slow and often disappointing discipline of life, to read the Divine purposes. This is line of life, to read the Divine purposes. not to evacuate the idea of revelation of its content, and regard our spiritual progress as due entirely to the efforts and strivings of our own souls. These must be present,—there must be a movement on man's part if he is to reach at last his highest,—but the revelation which is given is not his discovery, but a Divine act of unveiling.

It is the consummation of this progress, both for the individual and for the race, which is portrayed in the vision of the prophet as the moment when 'the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together,'—not as isolated individuals, but as members of the great company of the saints,—'they shall see it together: for the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it' (Is 40°).

5. The revelation of Christ.—So far, we have been considering the idea of revelation in general —the idea of God revealing His will to man—which appears again and again in Scripture, and which has been abundantly justified by the experience of the saints in every age. But nothing has yet been said which is distinctively Christian, or which touches the belief of Christians that in Christ there is a supreme and sufficient revelation of God. If the doctrine of revelation which has been here set forth exhausted the content of the idea, then there would be no place left for that which is specially characteristic of the Christian religion. What has been said about the possibility and the gradual progress of a revelation would apply to other nations as well as to the Jews, for God has never 'left himself without a witness' (Ac 14<sup>17</sup>). And nothing has been said at all about the revelation of God in Christ, which is the centre of the Christian hope. The passages which were quoted from the NT have a general application. We have now, however, to examine passages of a different character.

St. Paul urges, in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, that if the message of the Christ was not understood by the Jews, it was due to their incapacity, not to its obscurity. 'If our gospel is veiled,' he says, 'it is veiled in them that are perishing' (4"), i.e. the fault lies with the hearers, not with the giver, of the message. That is his way of expressing a great principle which we have already considered, that revelation, to be instructive. presupposes a certain mental capacity, a keentive, presupposes a certain mental capacity, a keenness of spiritual vision, in those to whom it is addressed. In the previous chapter of the same lefter, St. Paul had urged that the Jews had never recognized the transitory character of the Law which was their discipline; 'a veil was upon their theart' (3<sup>16</sup>), which prevented them from seeing that the Law was only a stage in the Divine education of Israel. But, he adds, allegorizing the old story of the veil on the face of Moses, 'if they turn to the Lord, the veil is removed' (v.16), and an open vision is granted. The consummation to which they should look is that 'the light of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should dawn upon them' (44). And, in like manner, he points out elsewhere that 'the law was but a tutor to lead them to Christ' (Gal 324). 'Christ is the end of the law' (Ro 104), in whom it received a perfect fulfilment. This, indeed, is the burden of the Apostolic preaching, that 'God, who of old time spake to the fothers by divergentions. of old time spoke to the fathers by divers portions and in divers manners, hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son' (He 1¹). It is not needful to multiply quotations which illustrate this familiar Christian thought—that highly favoured as the Jewish people had been by revelations of the Divine will, yet the complete—the perfect—revelation of God is in Christ.

(1) There is a sense in which it demands no special gift of faith to discern in Christ a revelation such as had not dawned upon the world before. And there are passages in the NT which, taken by themselves, would not go beyond this. He was 'a prophet, like unto Moses' (Ac 3<sup>22</sup>), although with a clearer, a more urgent message. For the most part, He is represented in the Synoptics as the Great Teacher, strong, wise, and merciful—whose words were powerful to move men towards holiness, and whose teachings shed a new light upon the perplexities of conduct. 'A new teaching,' His hearers said; and they were right. The Fatherhood of God, the dignity and supreme value of the spiritual life, the significance of faith, the Catholic sympathy of love (see Wendt, The Idea and the Reality of Revelation, p. 28)—these are truths of which, indeed, there had been anticipations in the prophets, but they were expounded by Him with a lucidity and an authority which distinguished Him at once from all the great teachers of the past. And even if we could get no further than this, the claim of Jesus Christ to be the spiritual Master of mankind would be a claim which we could not lightly neglect. If the utterances of holy men in every age deserve a reverent attention, as expressing convictions bern of a true spiritual experience, the words of Christ demand a deeper reverence of submission, for He was -at the lowest-the greatest

Master of the spiritual life.

(2) Not even yet, however, have we touched upon those claims of His which mark Him out as unique, those aspects of His life which require us to think of His teaching as differing from other teachings, not only in degree, but in kind. We have not, indeed, to read the Gospels very closely to observe that Jesus Christ claimed to be more than a Teacher, and that His authority was other than that of the greatest of the prophets. He said that He was the Messiah, who was to 'declare all things' (Ju 42). He is the Son beloved of the Father, to whom the Father showed all His works (5<sup>20</sup>). He alone has 'seen the Father' (6<sup>21</sup>); and not only is this vision peculiarly His, but through Him it may be revealed to men: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14"). These phrases are all taken, it is true, from the Fourth Gospel; but the view of Christ's Person which they present is not peculiar to St. John, for the common tradition of St. Matthew and St. Luke preserves the tremendous assertion, 'No man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any the Father, but the Son, and he to whom the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 1127=Lk 1022). It is clear that Christ is represented in the Gospels as more than a Teacher of Divine wisdom, He is the Revealer of the Divine character The matter, the content, of Divine character the revelation which He offers to mankind transcends the message of prophets and holy men, in this, that it has to do not merely with man's relation to the Supreme, with man's duty and man's destiny, but with the inmost nature of God Not only is He an ambassador of Heaven; but He has seen the Father. No such claim as this is made in the record of the most intunate and sacred spiritual Instory of the saints,

Instory of the saints.

It is this aspect of Christ as the Revealer of God which is indicated in the probaind phrases of the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel. He is the Word, the Eternal Wisdom. He was 'from the beginning with test, and is God. Revelation is the extraordisely maintenance of God to man and the Word is the eternal expression of Boits, as in Creation at the first, so in the Incarnation when the fallness of time had come. So Athanasius 'It was the function of the Word, who, by this peculiar providence and ordering of the universe, teaches us concerning the Father, to renew that same teaching' (red pass him wis Illians wission and himself with the same teaching' (red pass him wis Illians wission and himself with the function of the Universe of Reserve Anderson that the wission of Interest with the passion and Interest the Prince of Interest Dr., c. 14). The same idea is in Ironaum 'Per Ipaam conditionen reveals verbain conditionen beuin, et per nording abricatoren mundit Dominum of per plasma cum qui plasma verit artificem et per Filmin cum Patrem qui generaverit Institut' (e Horr is 6). These high speculations are perhaps beyond the modest apacity of human reason, but at all events they are in accordance with the phrases of Scripture, which represent the Word as the Agent of Creation, and as the Expression of the Innine Will. Christ is set before us in the Bold and the Church as the Revealer of the Divine nature and not only as the Revealer of Bivine secrets.

It has been arged by some writers that the uniqueness of Christ as Revealer is indicated in the NT by the fact that, while revelation is continually represented as proceeding from Him, it is nover represented as given to Him. He is the exponent, not the recipient, of revelation; and is, in a sense, the Revealer and the Revealer of the NT by the fact that, while revelation is continually represented as proceeding from Him, it is nover represented as given to Him. He is the exponent; not the recipient, of revelation; and is, in a sense, the Reveal It is this aspect of Christ as the Revealer of God which is the Fourth Gospel as well as in the Apocalypse. Christ describes Himself as 'a man that both told you the truth which I heard from God' (In 840), 'as the Father taught me, I speak these things' (v 20), 'the Father which sent me hath given me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak' (1846)

The distinguishing features of the 'revelation of esus Christ' are, rather (a) He reveals the inmost Jesus Christ nature of God (see above). (b) The revelation to the Son is not intermittent, but continuous and perpetual. 'The Father showeth him all things' (Jn 52); 'himself hath given (505mer) me a commandment' (124), the tense marking the continuance of the action of the command (so Westcott).*
(c) All has been revealed to Him. 'The Father (c) All has been revealed to Him. showeth him all things that himself doeth' (5°°). The Son sees all, while we see parts in Him (so Westcott). The revelation which Christ in His own Person gave of the Divine nature is represented as complete; and the task of the Divine Spirit throughout the ages is to assist mankind in the understanding of it (14 s), and in the application of it to life. It is not to be understood all at once (1618), nor will it be perfectly apprehended until the Day of Consummation, when the human race shall have fulfilled its destiny, 'the day when the Son of Man shall be revealed' (Lk 1720), the day to which the Apostolic Epistles continually point as the day of 'the revelation of Jesus Christ' (1 Co 17, 1 P 113), for which humanity is to wait in patience and hope.

These quotations have been given at length, because it is this claim of Christ to be the Revealer of the Eternal God, as no other was, which is the centre of the Christian religion, and it is this claim which is felt to be difficult to reconcile with the claims of other religions to the possession of revealed truth. But it will bear repetition that it is no article of the Christian faith that God does not reveal His purposes and His will except in Christ, or that those who seek His face without the knowledge of Christ shall be disappointed of their hope. Wherever and whenever the spirit of man has sought communion with the Eternal Spirit, a response-we must believe-has been given; and such response is, in its measure, a revelation of light and life. By whatever avenues of thought men reach new truth about the highest things, the light which makes their journey possible is a light in the heavens. It was a favourite thought of the early Christian apologists that the aspirations of pagan philosophy after God were prompted and encouraged by the Eternal Word speaking to men's hearts. 'Those that have lived with Reason' (of perà λόγοι βιώσαντες, writes Justin Martyr, 'are Christians, even though they were counted atheists, such as Socrates and Herachtus and others among the Greeks, and among the barbarians Abraham and the rest (Appl., 1 48). That there is always the seed of Divine Renson (Voyor σπιρματικός) in man is urged by the same writer more than once, +6 ξμφισον παντί γενει άνθρώπων σπέρμα το Λόγοι (.lpul. ii 8) is a typical afterance. Whatever we may think of the technical phrases of Christian theology Whatever we may used by these writers, we cannot doubt that their main thought was true. God is always revealing Himself to the world. Yet—the question recurs how then are we to express our belief in a special revelation in Christ, a revelation differing not only in degree but in kind from all that went before We are so much affected, in this age, by the idea of orderly and continuous progress in nature, and by the idea of the gradual quickening of man's spiritual faculty, that we find it unwelcome to be * Sabatier has observed (Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion, ranatier has observed (Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion, p. 41) that a phrase in the Gospel according to the Hebrows trings this out well. At the moment of His bayts, it, the Holy Spirit says to Jesus: 'Mi Fili, Te exspectabam in ominibus prophetia, ut venires et requiescerem in Te. Tu enim es requies mess.' presented with the conception of crisis, and with any theory of knowledge or life involving a breach of that rule of continuity by which we are accustomed to guide our thoughts.

6. Recapitulation.—It will be convenient to approach our final answer by re-stating in our modern ways of speech that view of revelation in general, and of the Christian revelation in particular, which seems to be presented in the NT. It is, at any rate, coherent, and is taught by St. Peter as well as by St. Paul, by the Synoptists as well as by St. John. Nor is it out of harmony with the profoundest teachings of science about nature and

The Christian doctrine of God presupposes that He is a Personal Being who lives and acts eternally. We cannot confine His Personal life by the conditions which limit our own; to use the homely phrase of Wm. Law, perhaps the sanest of English mystics, He is really greater than man; He transcends nature, for He is its Author. But He does not stand apart, as it were, from the created life which has issued from Him; He is, as philosophers express it, immanent in nature; He is its Life and its Light. The sun enlightens the earth with its beams, and warms into life the beings with which it is peopled; but the Eternal Spirit is the Life and Light of all creation, and communicates this Life and Light consciously and with a purpose of love. In nature and in history God is always present, always active, always compassionate.

But neither in the field of nature nor in the field of history would it be true to say that the purpose of the Supreme is everywhere clearly revealed. On the contrary, it is for the most part veiled from our eyes. We may speak, indeed, of the Creation itself as a revelation of the Eternal. Perhaps it was an exhibition of that Divine law by which love always seeks an object on which to spend itself, that law which in human life at its noblest always demands sacrifice. Perhaps the law that we only secure our highest life by not attempting to save it received here a stupendous illustration. We cannot tell. But, at any rate, throughout creation, as it is, the Divine love is veiled. In the struggles and competitions of created life, pain and death are the inevitable issue for the weak; in nature it is only the strong that survive. It is a perpetual tax upon faith, in the face of nature's cruelty, to believe—as nevertheless we do believe—that God cares for the sparrows, and that the meaner creatures of the earth are not beyond the reach of His compassion.

(1) Where, then, in nature is God most clearly seen? There is only one possible answer. It is in man, the highest creature of His that we know; in man, who is unique among the creatures, because he reflects, however dimly, the Divine image in which he was made. Man, indeed, is far removed in fact from that which he was intended to be. Corruptio optimi pessima. His capacity for good, by misuse, has become a capacity for evil, to which the humbler animals cannot sink. That is all true. But even in the most degraded man or woman there is that affinity to the Divine which makes redemption possible. In this seed of goodness, which lingers even in the foulest soul, there is always the hope of the future. It is in this elect creature—this creature chosen to be the highest because the best fitted for the service of the Creator—that God perpetually reveals Himself, as we perceive that love is, after all, stronger than It is to this elect creature—despite his kinship with the beasts, a kinship displayed during every hour of his earthly life—it is to this elect creature, and to him alone, that God deigns to reveal His will,—not perpetually, indeed, but at those too rare moments when the spirit is completely master of the flesh. God is always active in nature; He unveils His face only to the elect of creation, and to the elect individuals of the elect

(2) The like is true of the Divine revelation in the field of history. Of the destiny of nations, God is the supreme arbiter. Not theologians only, but historians too, will be found to declare that human history is providentially ordered, that 'the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men' (Dn 423). And viewing history on a large scale, that may be the inevitable conclusion. But we cannot say that it is self-evident, or that perplexities do not present themselves to any one who endeavours to trace an eternal purpose in the decline and fall of empires. In the philosophy of history it is not always easy to find certain tokens of a superintending Providence. In history, as in nature, we see such tokens with greater distinctness when the observation is directed to a particular part of the field. The secrets of the Divine rule are disclosed to us most clearly when we recall the history of the Chosen People, the race elect of the Supreme as His instrument for the education of the world. No history reveals the Divine intention in the same degree as the history of Israel. And thus we rightly look upon the Hebrew literature and history as preserving for us in a special manner the revelation of God's purposes in the education of mankind. This is not purposes in the education of mankind. This is not to make any arbitrary distinction between sacred history and profane history. All history is sacred, for it is directed and controlled by the Eternal Wisdom. But not in all history alike are we permitted to discern the guidance of God who thus reveals Himself. It is no more anomalous or surprising that the revelation should be explicitly recognized as such only in the history of the elect nation Israel, than that His revelation in nature should be recognized as such only in the character of the elect creature—man. The Divine action is always implicit in nature and in history; both are potential revelations, so to speak, of the Eternal Light and Wisdom, but in neither field does the revelation become actual, save in the chosen organ of the Divine life. Man is not an anomaly among the creatures, nor is Israel an anomaly among the nations; but as man with his reason and power of choice is the best fitted of creatures, and Israel with its genius for religion is the best fitted of the nations, to receive and to impart the revelations of the Divine will, to man and to Israel have they been entrusted in a peculiar degree. The story of revelation is always a story of election (cf. Marten-sen, Christian Dogmatics, p. 13).

If we can go thus far, we are constrained to go a step farther. For in the Christ is the consummation, the summing up, of humanity. He is the Representative Man. And in the Christ, too, is the fulfilment of Israel's high destiny as the Servant of Jehovah, the Messenger and Ambassador of the Most High. It is not surprising, then, that He should claim to be the Revealer of the Godhead, in a sense and after a manner unexampled elsewhere. He. too. is the Elect, the Beloved. There where. He, too, is the Elect, the Beloved. is a coherence in the NT account of Christ the Revealer which demands for it a reverent hearing from every thoughtful man, no matter what his belief about historical Christianity may be. We do not assume any breach in the continuity of nature when we hold that a revelation of God may be perceived in man which cannot be perceived in the lower creatures. We do not make history discontinuous if we hold that a revelation of God may be perceived in the record of His dealings with Israel which cannot be perceived in the record of His dealings with Greece, although He is the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of Israel and Greece alike. To the creature and to the nation nniquely fitted to receive and to reflect a Divine revelation, it has been given, in divers portions and manners, according to the need and the capacity of the recipient. But the Christ stands alone, in nature and in history, the flower of humanity and the culmination of Israel's hope—alone, for God has become man in Him. There can be no interpuption or faltering in the communion between the Perfect Man and God, for He is perfect because He shares the Divine nature itself. The revelation is no longer occasional, but permanent; no longer a gradual unveiling, but the full disclosure of the Father's face; no longer to be conceived as for one race only, for 'this is the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest—made known to all nations for the obedience of faith' (Ro 16<sup>25t</sup>, cf. 1 Co 27).

REYELATION, BOOK OF.— Whatever perplexities may still attend the interpretation of the Apocalypse, there can be no question as to the place which it assigns to Jesus Christ, or the copiousness and variety of the references which the writer makes to His Person and His work. For him the fact of Christ conditions the whole of human history. He is the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (138), and He is the Bridegroom-Judge, whose eagerly expected coming will bring to a close the history of the world that now is. And what is true of the world's history is also true of the book itself; its whole contents are a 'revelation' (Apocalypse) of Jesus Christ (11), a revelation which proceeds from Him, and is mediated 'by his angel' to 'his servant John.'

It will be convenient to examine the references and the doctrine which lies behind them in the order of our Lord's experience, beginning with His life on earth. In the first place, it is noteworthy that the human name 'Jesus,' borne by Christ when He was on earth, which is rare in the writings of St. Paul and absent from those of St. Peter, occurs here nine (or ten) times. The martyrs are 'the witnesses of Jesus' (176); their witness is 'the testimony of Jesus' (11 etc.); and it is by this simple human name that the Divine Speaker describes Himself (2216). In this usage we may see an indication of authorship by one who had 'known Christ after the flesh,' to whom the name He had then borne was both familiar and dear. If authoritative criticism no longer permits us to see direct allusions to either the birth or the ascension of Jesus in the story of the 'man-child' contained in ch. 12, His death by crucifixion is very pointedly alluded to as an historical fact (118, His victory in 321 ('as I also overcame'), and His resurrection in 15.18. His twelve Apostles find mention in 2114, and there are echoes of His teaching as recorded in the Gospels in 35.10 717 216 and 2125.

These recollections of Jesus of Nazareth have not been obliterated by the vision of the exalted Christ; rather are the two elements held together in a singular harmony of conviction. Passing to the second, we find that the richness of the conception of Christ which marks the Apocalypse may be gauged by the variety and significance of the aspects in which He is presented—the Word, the Lamb, the Shepherd, the Bridegroom, the Judge, the King of kings. Here only outside the Fourth Gospel does Christ receive the deeply significant title of 'the Word of God' (1913), and significant title of the world of (18<sup>13</sup>), and the idea of pre-existence which the name carries with it also lies behind the declaration twice repeated, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end' (1<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>). But the commonest and the most characteristic title of Christ in this book is 'the Lamb'—a title which is used by the writer with great freedom, as though it had come to have for him almost the force of a proper name (cf. 212 22 37 223). The use of the name is, however, rooted in the conviction of the redemptive efficacy of Christ's sacrifice; it suggests the aspect of His work which is most prominent to the mind of 'John.' It should be noted that the word itself is not identical with that applied to Jesus in John's Gospel (1<sup>20, 26</sup>); it is a diminutive and a neuter; but the meaning is the same, and the sacrificial reference is indubitable. The Lamb stands 'as though it had been slain' (5<sup>6</sup>); He is hailed as One who has 'redeemed us to God by his blood' (5<sup>9</sup>); the adoring saints in heaven are those 'who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb' (714, cf. 15). These latter passages emphasize the ethical consequences of the Atonement, and trace them to the 'blood' of Christian than the consequences of the Atonement, and trace them to the 'blood' of Christ in the same way as the First Epistle of John. The spiritual principle of the Atonement is suggested by the figure of the Lamb itself, in which are combined the attributes of lamb-like character-meekness, gentleness, and purity-and the sacrificial function historically associated with a lamb. At the same time, 'the Lamb,' originally a figure for Christ in the sacrificial aspect of His work, takes on, besides, attributes which belong to Him in other of His functions, and so we read of 'the wrath of the Lamb' (616), of 'the Lamb's book of life' (212), of kings making war with the Lamb and being overcome by Him (1714), of 'the marriage of the Lamb' (197), and, finally, of the Lamb as ruler of the heavenly city (222), as at once the temple of it and 'the light thereof' (2123-24). Thus, while every aspect of the work of Christ, whether in earth or heaven, finds adoring record here, there is a subtle recognition of the fact that all the forms of His relation to men spring out of the fundamental function of redemption.

The writer of the Apocalypse, therefore, holding firmly to the humanity of the Jesus whom probably he had known in the flesh, yet ascribing to Him as the Lamb functions of redemption, government, and judgment, offers to Him throughout his book the homage which is due only to 'God manifest in the flesh.' This is seen alike in the titles, the functions, and the attributes assigned to Him. Every detail of description serves only to enhance the dignity and the glory of His Person. He is 'the Lord of lords and King of kings' (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>). To Him is attributed all the honour and authority pertaining to the Messiah and more. Angels who refuse worship offered to themselves (19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>8</sup>) unite with all creation to worship God and the Lamb (51<sup>1-13</sup>). His existence reaches back before the beginning of things created. Himself the principle from which all creation issues (3<sup>14</sup>; cf. Col 1<sup>15</sup>, Pr 8<sup>22</sup>), He is the absolutely Living One from whose lips are heard words which can be spoken by God alone: 'I am the first and the last, and the Living One' (1<sup>17</sup>, cf. 1<sup>8</sup>). He holds the keys of Death and of Hades (1<sup>18</sup>)—keys which, according to the later Jewish tradition, were held by the hand of the Almighty alone. In the vision of the Son of Man which introduces the Letters to the Seven Churches, the writer takes one after another of those phrases which had been consecrated from old times to the description of the Most High God, those attributes in which He had been apparelled by prophets and psalmists, and lays them simply upon Christ as upon One whose right to bear them was beyond question. The description of 'the Ancient of Days' (Dn 7°) is transferred to Him, as well as the power to 'search the heart and the reins,' which is the peculiar attribute of Jehovah (22°, cf. Ps 7°). It is not strange, therefore, that to this Divine Figure is committed the unfolding of the Book of human Destiny (5°), the waging of the final conflict with evil, and the holding of the Divine assize.

This complete and unhesitating attribution of Divine rank and authority to Jesus Christ is the more remarkable when we give due weight to the intense Hebraism of the writer. A Jew of the Jews, his mind saturated with Hebrew thought, a true son of the race to which monotheism had become a passion, and the ascription of Divine honour to any other than God a horror and a blasphemy, the author nevertheless sets Jesus side by side with the Almighty. One meaning of the phenomenon is plain. It offers the most striking proof of the impression made by Jesus upon His disciples, one which had been sufficient to revolutionize their most cherished religious belief; for them He had the value of God. And the special aspect of His Person and work which is emphasized, as we have seen, in the Apocalypse, gives the clue to the explanation of this exalted Christology. The kernel of experience from which the process starts is indicated in the declaration: 'He hath loosed (v.l. 'washed') us from our sins.' John and those in whose name he wrote had found the sin-barrier between them and God removed, and the sin-dominion over them broken; and this experience they traced to Jesus, to what He had done for them in dying, and in them as living again. And if, along with this their indubitable experience of forgiveness of, and deliverance from, sin, we take the universal conviction of their time, expressed in the question of the Pharisees, 'Who can forgive sins save God only?' we have little difficulty in perceiving the avenue along which the gaze of the Apocalyptist travelled till it beheld the throne of God as a throne which was shared also by 'the Lamb.'

C. Anderson Scott. REYENGE.—See VENGEANCE.

REYERENCE.—The sentiment of veneration, a feeling of high regard and admiration. When cherished towards a superior, it is an emotion of respectful awe. When directed towards God, it is an essential factor in Divine worship. This sentiment usually finds expression in acts of courtesy, respect, or adoration, so that the object held in reverential regard receives fitting homage. But it is to be noted that the term  $\theta \rho \eta \sigma \kappa \epsilon la$ , which in Ac  $26^5$  emphasizes the ritual side of religion, does not occur in the Gospels (cf. Coleridge, Aids to Reference. Introd., Aphor., xxiii.)

tion, Introd., Aphor. xxiii.).

The terms which denote reverence towards Ged come properly under 'worship,' in which reverence is an essential quality; but it may be proper to include in this article passages which involve reverence towards Jesus Christ in the days of His flesh. In the Gospel narratives several terms are used to express the feeling of reverence, but there is no decisive reason to distinguish the usage of these terms as they occur in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel. The term 'reverence,' as the tr. of expersedur—'to turn one's self unto'—is found only a few time—It is used in the parable of the Wicked Hubandmen (Mt 2187, Mk 126, Lk 2013), where the dea is that even those who had ill-treated the expersants might show proper respect and honour to the Son.

(See also the usage of the same word in the parable of the Unjust Judge, who 'feared not God, neither regarded man,' Lk 18<sup>2-4</sup>).

The word τιμή and its derivatives are used to

The word τιμή and its derivatives are used to express high reverential regard and profound respect (Mt 13<sup>97</sup> 15<sup>4-8</sup>, Mk 7<sup>10</sup>, Jn 5<sup>22, 41</sup> 8<sup>40, 54</sup>). Here the regard due to a prophet of God, the affectionate respect of children for their parents, and reverence for the Son, as for the Father, are expressed. The term προσκυνεῦν, which means 'to kiss the hand to,' and then 'to bow down before,' is often used in the Gospels to signify the sentiment of reverential regard, and even of worship (Mt 2<sup>2, 8-11</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>38</sup> 15<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>20</sup> 28<sup>17</sup>, Mk 5<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>19</sup>). In these passages we have reference to the adoration of Jesus by the Magi, Herod's desire to do homage to the child at Bethlehem, the request of the devil that Jesus should worship him, the disciples doing homage to their Lord by the sea, the Canaanite woman humbling herself before Jesus, the mother of James and John as she made her bold request for her two sons, the disciples after the resurrection of Christ, the demoniac of Gadara before Jesus, the mock homage paid to Jesus on the Cross. In many of these passages the outward act of howing down is implied ages the outward act of bowing down is implied.

In one place (Jn 981) the term θεοσεβής is used to describe a worshipper of God, or one who regards and treats God with reverence. In several places certain physical acts are significant of reverence, such as προσπίπτειν, 'to fall down before' (Mk 311 528, Lk 828): γονυπετεῖν, 'to bend the knee' (Mt 1714, Mk 140); πίπτειν ἐπὶ πρόσωπον, 'to fall upon the face.' These movements of the body are expressive of feelings of reverential regard. In some passages δοξάζειν, 'to glorify,' is used in a rather suggestive way to set forth the idea of giving reverence to (as in Mt 62 98, Mk 212, Lk 528.28 716, Jn 884 1714), where hypocrites seeking glory of men, people of different sorts giving glory to God, the Father glorifying the Son, and the Son giving glory to the Father, are alluded to. In the Lord's Prayer, ἀγιάζειν, 'to hallow' or 'hold sacred' (Mt 69) the name of God, implies the sentiment of reverence in its highest form. The terms ἀσπάζειν, 'to salute,' and ἀσπασμός, 'salutation' (Mk 915 1518, Lk 129-41), are also expressive of reverential regard.

Some additional passages may be merely noted, wherein words and phrases denote reverence in different aspects: Mt. 729 86 927 1223 1616 219-15 2221 2212 2612, Mk 17 91-10, Lk 28-30 716. 44. 45 825-37 1935 2211, Jn 123. 14 1813 2115-17.

In the Gospel narratives it is evident that the sentiment of reverence has a large place. It is at root a certain psychical state, or temper of the soul. This temper seeks expression in certain outward acts. In religion this state of the soul is fundamental, and its expression in ritual acts is natural.

2. In Mt 5<sup>11</sup> (|| Lk 6<sup>22</sup>) Jesus pronounces a blessing upon those who are reviled for His sake (δνειδίζω here is the same word as is used in Mk 15<sup>32</sup> of the reproaches of the Cross). That the secret of the blessedness lies in the spirit in which the abuse is borne is shown by the 'Rejoice and be exceeding glad' of the following verse, as well as by St. Paul's 'Being reviled, we bless,' in a passage (1 Co 4<sup>12, 13</sup>) where he evidently has the Eighth Beatitude in mind. St. Peter (1 P 2<sup>23</sup>) says of Jesus that 'being reviled, he reviled not again' (λωδορούμενοι οὐκ ἀντελοιδύρει). And the author of Hebrews suggests that the best preservative against hasty reprisals and a violent temper is a contemplation of the patient silence of Jesus. 'For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds' (He 12). See also REPROACH.

J. C. LAMBERT. REWARD.—1. The NT word for this is μαθθε, which appears in its more literal sense as 'hire' (Mt 20<sup>8</sup>, Lk 10<sup>7</sup>) or 'wages' (Jn 4<sup>26</sup>). Besides  $\mu\sigma\theta\delta s$ , St. Paul twice uses  $dr\iota\mu\sigma\theta la$  (Ro 1<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>13</sup>); while Ep. to Heb. uses  $\mu\sigma\theta\alpha\pi\delta\delta\sigma la$  (2<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>26</sup> 11<sup>26</sup>). RV prefers, in passages where the Greek has a verb .άποδίδωμη, cf. μισθαποδοσία,—the colourless rendering 'recompense' (Mt 66.18). It might be questioned whether, in the 17th cent., the Eng. word 'reward' had so definitely as now the sense of a favourable had so definitely as now the sense of a favourable or desirable retribution. Or is there a touch of conscious paradox in the tr. 'reward evil for good' (Ps 35<sup>12</sup>)? But see Ps 7<sup>4</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup>. On the other hand, Hooker (Eccles. Polity, Books i.-iv., 1592 or 1594) already employs the expression 'rewards and punishments,' which stamps a favourable sense upon the 'rewards'; cf. also—

'A man, that fortune's buffets and rewards Hast ta'en with equal thanks.'—Hamlet, III. ii. 71. At Lk 2341 'due reward of our deeds,' AV and

2. Christ's teaching is popular, and He has no hesitation in using the conception of 'reward in as a stimulus to zeal (e.g. Mt 512 620). Reward on earth is also found among His promises, if apparently with a touch of irony (cf. Mk 10<sup>20</sup>). Yet we cannot conceal from ourselves that reward, like the cognate conception of merit, belongs to a secondary order of moral categories. 'Merit lives from man to man, and not from man, O Lord, to thee.' In public life the bad citizen is punished, while the good citizen's reward is—life as a citizen! Literal 'rewards' are for the nursery or primary school. There is perhaps more of morality in 'punishment.' Moral protoplasm—potential goodness—may exist in the much decried fear of hell oftener than in the hope of heaven. Punishment emphasizes guilt, calls for repentance, and may prove the door to a new life; reward implies righteousness, and the thought of it may tend to self-righteousness. (In order to shut this out, or for some other reason, the 'righteous' (Mt 25<sup>37-39</sup>) are unconscious of their claim to reward). 'Other worldliness' is a much rarer vice than worldliness, the allurement of such distant prizes being faint and cold. Yet a fanatical greed for the future life is not impossible.

3. In Christ's teaching there is comparatively little which carries us beyond the thought of reward. Most noticeable is Lk 17<sup>10</sup> We are unproward. Most noticeable is Lk 1710 We are unprofitable servants,' or, according to Wellhausen's fine conjecture, 'We are servants! we have done that which it was our duty to do.' Also there is an approach to the Pauline standpoint in the flavour of irony with which our Lord describes 'the righteous' in contrast to sinners. He 'came not to call' them (Mt 9<sup>13</sup> !). 'There shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over over one sinner that repentent, more than over ninety and nine righteous persons which need no repentance' (Lk 15<sup>t.</sup> (10. 32)). Lk 7th has the clearest trace of irony. 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; [you can see that it is so] for she' showed such signs of love. 'But to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.' Again, the call to self-sacrifice (Mt 1624 ||) shuts out any vulgar conception of reward, though, in point of form, the acceptance of earthly suffering does not cancel heavenly reward.

4. We must recognize, then, that hope of reward is a legitimate motive. It bears the highest imprimatur; and it keeps a place in the general Christian scheme, even as unfolded by that Apostle who might seem most opposed to it on principle. We need not think to do without it, even while we pass on to higher motives and fuller conceptions of duty. Christian labour and sacrifice are never in vain. The struggle 'availeth' (A. H. Clough's Poems, 'Say not the struggle'). See also art. RETRIBUTION.

RICHES .- See WEALTH.

RIGHT.—In the AV the word 'right' is the RIGHT.—In the AV the word 'right' is the equivalent of two distinct Greek words,  $\delta i \kappa a \omega s$ , 'righteous' (Mt  $20^{4.7}$ , Lk  $12^{87}$ ), and  $\delta \rho \theta \hat{\omega} s$ , 'correctly' (Lk  $7^{48}$   $10^{28}$   $20^{29}$ ). The Eng. word is etymologically associated with Lat. rectus (from regere, 'to rule'; cf. 'direct' and cognates). It implies that which is straight, according to rule. In the Gospels the idea of 'right,' as distinct from the word, runs through the whole of our Lord's revelation of God. His teaching is at once a demand for tion of God. His teaching is at once a demand for that which is right and the source of all instruction about it.

1. The standard of right is always found in the will of God as expressed in His law. Everything will of God as expressed in His law. Everything is referred to that. Doing the will of God is the simple but exhaustive summary of all true life (Mk 3<sup>35</sup>).

2. The extent of right is to be understood as absolute conformity to the law of God, with no immunity and no reservation. Not only actions and words, but also thoughts, desires, and motives, are always included in its scene (Mt 5<sup>32</sup>, 2<sup>30</sup>). Since are always included in its scope (Mt 522, 28). Since right' means conformity to God's character and will, it necessarily follows that this conformity must be absolute. Our Lord contrasts the right-eousness of the scribes and Pharisees with that which He demanded from His followers (5<sup>20</sup>). requirement was higher because of His higher conception of the character, will, and claims of God. To them righteousness was nothing more than a superficial outward conformity to the Divine law as interpreted and altered by their tradition. They measured by means of an imperfect standard, while our Lord laid down an absolute law (546). See art. RIGHTEOUSNESS.

3. The motives to right are variously stated and implied. (a) First and foremost is the (always implied) motive based on the truth that right is right and therefore must be done. (b) Then obedience to the will of God, because it is God's will, is emphasized (5<sup>28</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>). (c) A secondary and yet important motive is found in the spiritual blessings associated with the performance of right (51-11 61.4.6.18). (d) Yet again we have the spiritual influences and effects of right as no inconsiderable motive for righteousness of thought, word, and deed (5<sup>13, 14</sup>).

4. The encouragements to right are found in (a)

the joy of satisfaction in obedience to God; (b) the approving testimony of conscience as the result of righteousness; (c) the blessing of God manifestly resting upon the life  $(10^{28-31})$ ; (d) fellowship with Christ in faithful and true living  $(10^{25} 12^{20})$ . These points concerning right are only a bare summary of what is both implicit and expressed in the whole of our Low's teaching, especially in the five great sections of seashing found in Matthew.

5. The secret of right is found in personal union and communion with Christ. There is nothing dry, formal, and abstract in 'right' as conceived of in the NT. It is no question of an impersonal abstract vò likacos or vò salós, but a warm, loving, living, and personal lufe of right thinking, right speaking, right doing, in union with Hum who is pre-eminently ο δίκαιος and ο καλός. It is this that differentiates Christian ethics from all others. Christianity not only depicts an ideal and insists on its realization; it proclaims and provides the power to realize it, in union with Him who has Himself lived the life and fulfilled the Divine ideal, and whose grace is sufficient for all who receive it. In all that concerns 'right,' the followers of Christ accept and know by experience the truths of two great statements; one of the Master, and the other of one of His Apostles: 'Apart from me ye can do nothing' (Jn 15'); 'I can do all things in him who is empowering me' (Ph 4'1).

RIGHT HAND .- See SESSION.

RIGHTEOUS, RIGHTEOUSNESS.— i. HISTORY OF THE TERMS.—The root notion of the Heb. word nors is that which is just, right, and normal; and its exact meaning fluctuates in each epoch according to the standard by which right and wrong are measured. It is true that in the OT this standard is always based on the will of Jehovah; but we observe great changes -chiefly progressive—in the Jewish notion of what He requires. In more primitive times the conception of "373 is mainly forensic, meaning that which accords with custom as fixed by the Divinely given decisions of the people's judges. But the prophets raised the whole conception of the law of God, and insisted that its moral aspect was infinitely more important than its ceremonial. Indeed, though like all OT writers they dealt with action rather than character, they almost foreshadow in places the NT teaching, that it is a clean heart that makes a righteous deed. Hosea and Jeremiah illumined the conception of man's duty to his neighbour by the preaching of God's loving kindness to His people. Deutero-Isaiah goes further still, and hads in the thought of God's unfailing righteousness the pledge that He will comfort and redeem His servants. As used of Him, the word and denotes moral consistency and faithfulness to His promises, and in the highest prophetic teaching this was felt to include the love which pardons the penitent, though ever stern to the obdurate.

In the age of formalism, which was marked by the cessation of prophecy, the notion of righteonmess became more ceremonial and external. Already in some of the Psalms we have 'the righteous' as a regular party in the land, and the term ultimately became the self-designation of the Pharisees, the sphere of private morals; and, in the judicial sphere, with resdiness to help the weak as opposed to the letter of strict judgment. In the LXX the word is tr. usually by δικαιοσύνη, but also by κρέστι, έλεσε, and έλεπμοσύνη; and the adj. ρ'ης usually by discree, but also by dueunros, sabapos, wierds, and

The Gr kanagion, like the Heb. 7513, was generally used in a much broader sense than our word 'justice,' and denoted social virtue as a whole. Aristotle defines it as spice roles are evg arther also wanted. Arthorough the defined it as again which are not given all and are not given, all as a survey (Ethics, v. 3, 11296, of Plato, Republic, 443). The chief difference between the Heb, and Gr words lies, not in the terms themselves, but in the radical distinction between the religious of the two races, the former being based on the relation of man to God, the latter on man's duty to himself, thus in Greek admin is usually distinguished from acidus.

ii. NT USAGE .- The NT writers inherited the word agrs with all its religious associations, and used as its equivalent becausery, and as its opposite distals. The latter word is sometimes contrasted also with dapleta (e.g. Ro 12, 2 Th 210); for truth passing into action is righteousness (Westcott on 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>). detect is also contrasted with words (Lk 16<sup>10, 11</sup>), everying (2 P 2°, cf. Ro 4°), dyno (1 Co 6°). The first of these three words expresses an idea always present in the word 'righteousness' (namely, consistency); the other two give its basis for man, - devotion to God, -but do not immediately express the notion of duty towards one a neighbour.

Jesus Christ transformed the whole conception of righteousness; for He broke down the externalism of His day by emphasizing character rather than action, and set religion on an entirely new basis by making it a real response of the whole personality to God, and pointing to love as the essence of righteousness. It is significant in this connexion that it was Christianity that created the very conception of personality, and so ultimately the word itself. Jesus Christ tells His followers that their righteousness is to be based on the eternal character of God (Mt 5.44.46), as uniquely revealed in human life by Himself (1127 ||). Accordingly the early Christians seem to have spoken of Christ as 'the righteous one' (see Ac 314 729 2214, Ja 56). But we must examine in more detail the righteousness taught and exemplified by Him.

1. The Synoptists. - (a) General usage. - The Synoptic writers all use disacor and disacorier genersully, of the man who tries to do his duty in the sight of God, whether Christian or not (Mt 13 5%). Mk 620, Lk 18 220). But St. Matthew also uses the words especially of believers in Christ, to denote the character which He requires in citizens of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 510 61 etc.). St. Luke, indeed, approximates to this in three passages at least (Lk 144, Ac 244, 3); but with him it can scarcely be called a well-defined usage. The explanation of this peculiarity of the First Gospel planation of this peculiarity of the First Gospel no doubt lies in the fact that its chief aim is to represent Christianity as the consummation of Judaism (cf. Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). But a still more noteworthy fact is that the Synoptic writers do not directly speak of righteousness as a Divine attribute. [Mt 628 is no exception, for 'his righteousness' there means the character which God expects of us, though this is implicitly based on the nature of the Father]. Nor is Christ ever directly termed disages by them, except in the month of unbelievers (e.g. Pilate's wife in Mt 2719), and in the cases mentioned above from the Acts, where St. Luke represents three different speakers as calling Him o blazios. In this connexion it is significant that in recording the centurion's words at Calvary, St. Luke (23") writes, 'Certainly this was a righteous man'; but St. Matthew (275) and St. Mark (15") give this seed in place of diraces. Now, when we remember that our Lord, in the Synoptic accounts, does not speak of Himself as d clos 700 8000, though He accepts the title from others, and acknowledges His unique Sonship before the Sanhedrin (Lk 22" we see why He does not call Himself à δίκαισε. He does not put forward His own claims in the Galilean ministry, but leaves His followers to infer them from His words and acts (cf. Mt 18<sup>18-17</sup>). And when men have drawn the inference, then they call Him ο νίος του θευθ rather than ο δίκαιος. Similarly, He Himself does not speak of the Father's righteousness, because to His hearers the word would not convey enough. He speaks rather of the Father's love.

(b) God's rightcousness. — What we have said above leads us on naturally to ask, What is the central idea in Christ's teaching about the Father's righteousness (for though He does not Himself apply the word to God in the Synoptic accounts, the idea is not excluded)? Our Lord bases everything on the truth that God is a loving Father to all men, and they are potentially His sons; by love they may know Him, and so make that potentiality actual. Such is the teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>11-22</sup>). In Mt 5<sup>26-48</sup> Christ tells us that God loves both good and evil, both righteous and unrighteous; and His followers are to do the same 'in order that ye may be  $(\gamma \epsilon \nu \eta \sigma \theta \epsilon =$  'show yourselves to be'; or else 'become') sons of your Father which is in heaven.' And His summary of the whole matter is, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect (i.e. in and through love) as your heavenly Father is perfect.' But this love in God, if it was the same of the peritent to the peritent. makes Him infinitely merciful to the penitent sinner, makes Him equally stern to the impenitent. Again and again Christ, by means of a series of parables, teaches the future suffering of the wicked. It will suffice to quote one which shows the unity of the Divine love in its two aspects of mercifulness and sternness—the parable of the king that took account of his servants and punished him who showed no mercy to his fellow (Mt 18<sup>22-35</sup>). He is ready to forgive the largest of debts if only the servant proves his love; but he has no mercy for the ungrateful and unloving; delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due.

(c) Christ's righteousness. — If we may rightly speak of the absolute righteousness of God in the Synoptic accounts, we have no less reason for speaking of the absolute righteousness of Christ. A close examination of His words may even seem explicitly to sanction this. In Mt 510 He pronounces a blessing on those who are persecuted for rightcousness' sake; and in the next verse He goes on, 'Blessed are ye when men shall . . . persecute you . . . for my sake.' We may compare Mk 8<sup>25</sup> 'Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it' (also Mk 10<sup>25</sup>). Throughout his Gospel St. Matthew makes δικαιοσύνη the character of the citizens of the Kingdom of heaven. But Jesus Christ is the inaugurator of that kingdom (Mt 11<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>). It is He, as the Son of Man, who sows the good seed of the Kingdom (13<sup>27</sup>); He, again, who can give 'the keys of the kingdom' (13th. 45). He has authority over the angels in His kingdom, which is the kingdom of the Father (13th. 45). He not only gives to men a unique revelation—the only revelation—of the Father (1127 ||—a passage which implies His sinlessness), but He is the giver of the Holy Ghost (311 ||). This teaching is confirmed by the order of words in Mt 24<sup>38</sup> and Mk 13<sup>32</sup> (men—the angels—the Son—the Father). So He claims to be the Son of God (Lk 2270 ||), and suffers condemnation for blasphemy; as such, He is transfigured, before three of His Apostles, with the Divine glory (Mt 17<sup>1-8</sup> ||). And so again He assents to the statement that He is quite different from one of the prophets (Mt 16<sup>14-16</sup>); they were righteous, but He is the righteous Man, and more also. The whole teaching of the Synoptic Gospels sis implicitly the same; nowhere does our Lord show any consciousness of sin; again and again He emphasizes the sinfulness of all men and their need of repentance. Therefore He is to be the judge of mankind, in the consummation of God's kingdom (Mt 7<sup>22f</sup>· 13<sup>41</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>316</sup>.).

(d) The contents of righteousness. — What, in brief, was the ideal of which Christ was the perfect example, and which He sets before His followers? Obviously an adequate answer to this question is far beyond the limits of this article. But we must try to apprehend a few leading principles. This is the easier, because Christ sought to 'educate' His disciples by giving them principles rather than precepts; His service was to be a free development, not a slavish system. St. Matthew has collected for us, in the Sermon on the Mount, much of our Lord's teaching on the Kingdom of heaven and the δικαιοσύνη which marks its citizens. They are to seek above all else 'the kingdom of God and his righteousness' (Mt 6:3); they are to 'hunger and thirst' after it (5°). The Kingdom only reflects the eternal character of the King (5*). Thus δικαιοσύνη, which is very close in meaning to our modern word 'morality,' is throughout based on religion, and treated as inseparable from it. Mt 6 opens with a warning against ostentation in δικαιοσύνη (if, indeed, that is the right reading); and the examples given are those of almsgiving (v.²), prayer (v.⁵), and fasting (v.¹⁶)—the second of which, at least, is often treated by us as outside morality. Now the central principle of God's being is, as we said, represented to be love. Conbeing is, as we said, represented to be love. Consequently love is the unfailing measure of human δικαιοσύνη. The first commandment is 'Love God'; the second, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12<sup>29-31</sup> ||); and, according to St. Matthew (22<sup>20</sup>), Christ adds the words, 'on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets' (words almost repeated in Mt 7<sup>12</sup> and presupposed in Gal 5<sup>14</sup> and Re 12<sup>30</sup>. 514 and Ro 138).

Here, then, is the principle by which we may test all our actions. God judges men by what they are rather than by what they do; we, being human, and unable to read the heart, are to judge by their deeds what men are (Mt 716), though with much caution against rash and censorious judgments (71). But the final judgment is God's, who takes account of motive as well as act. He who nurses wrath against a brother, or treats him with bitter contempt, is guilty before God as well as the man who proceeds to murder (5<sup>21, 22</sup>); and 'every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart' (526). It has been well said that 'inwardness' is the guiding principle of the Sermon on the Mount. The hard sayings of Mt 5<sup>39-42</sup> must clearly be interpreted on the same principle of love towards our neighbour, resting on love towards God; they do not forbid all resistance of evil (such as resistance to a thief or one of overbearing temper), but they prohibit resistance which springs from personal resentment; they do not inculcate indiscriminate charity, but command us to do, without thought of self, whatever is best for those in need. On the same principle, Christ tells us that it is quality, not quantity, that matters. In prayer we are not to 'use vain repetitions,' as if we should be heard for our 'much speaking' (Mt 67); yet it is to be observed that Christ Hinself sometimes spent the observed that Christ Himself sometimes open awhole or the major part of the night in prayer (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>, Mk 6<sup>46-48</sup>). Men may 'cast out devils' and do 'many mighty works' in Christ's name, and the property of the followers of His (Mt 7<sup>22, 23</sup>). The yet be no true followers of His (Mt 722.23). widow who cast a farthing into the treasury was doing a greater thing than those who brought rich offerings (Mk 12<sup>41-44</sup>||).

Love to God is the first commandment; love to man is included in it, as the less in the greater. The motive which makes the service of men righteous in the highest sense is that it should be done for Christ's sake (Mk 9<sup>41</sup>, Mt 10<sup>42</sup> 18<sup>5</sup>), or, in other words, in order that men 'may glorify your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5<sup>16</sup>). We must really lose ourselves before we can find our true selves (Mt 162 etc.); i.e. self-development is included in the end, but it can never come through selfishness. The Christian's paradise is not like the Mohammedan's; the reward of self-denying toil in Christ's service is more toil (Lk 19<sup>17</sup>). The Lord's Prayer opens, not with petition, but with adoration and thanksgiving; and petition must be qualified with the thought, 'nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done' (Lk 22<sup>12</sup>).

Thus one important aspect of love is filial trust, or faith in God. But this faith is certainly not intellectual in essence. Without love it is void and empty (Mt 7<sup>221</sup>). It is the faith which seeks God's kingdom and His righteousness first, and makes the daily toil for the material necessaries of life subordinate to these, in its calm certitude that God will give sufficient for our needs. But how, it may be asked, are we to win such faith as this? Partly by contemplation of God's love in Nature (Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 6<sup>26-30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>24-22</sup>); partly by the evidence of Christ's life, death, and resurrection (Mt 168-10 2819.20 etc.); partly by turning into earnest prayer the measure of faith that we have (cf. Mk 9<sup>23-24</sup>); and partly by loving service of our brother men in all humility (see Lk 175-10).

Again, as love for mankind is incomplete except when based on love for God, so is love for God an idle sentimentality unless it is realized by the service of men. 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 721). This is set forth in detail in the picture of the Last Judgment (Mt 2511-66). Here the test of men is whether they gave food, drink, and shelter to strangers and to those who were needy, or sick, or outcast. For the 'Golden Rule,' which sums up 'the Law and the Prophets,' is, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also to them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>, Lk 6<sup>21</sup>). Nor is any man to be outside the pale of a Christian's love. To the scribe's question, Who is my neighbour?, Christ replies by a parable, in which a Samaritan is represented as doing for one of his traditional enemies, the Jews, what the priest and Levite of the man's own race had left undone (Lk 10<sup>295</sup>). So He abolishes the Jewish belief that 'neighbour' includes only those of one's own race. And His last words on earth of one's own race. And His last words on earth lay before His Apostles their duty of teaching all nations (Mt 2819, Lk 247, cf. Mk 1615). He uses also the term 'brother' in a no less catholic sense, in all probability, though He never explicitly tells His disciples that they are to consider all men as brethren (see Mt 73 and 1815.21, Lk 173.4). The teaching of the parable of the Prodigal Son is still more enumbatic on this point. It is also true that more emphatic on this point. It is also true that He uses the word 'brother' in a narrower sense, to denote specially the man, whoever he is, that does the will of God (Mk 3<sup>35</sup> ||). See art. BROTHERHOOD.

It was the simplicity and the 'inwardness' of this supreme test of righteousness by love that were to make Christ's 'yoke easy' (Mt 11<sup>20</sup>), in contrast with the 'heavy burdens' imposed on men's shoulders by the externalism and endless rules of the Pharisees (23<sup>4</sup>). He said, 'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wine enter into the little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. soever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven' (1834, cf. Mk 935); and He called the scribes and Pharisees 'children of hell' (Mt 2315) a term which He never applies even to the publican or the harlot—because He found in their self-exaltation and censoriousness (cf. Lk 1811, Mt 235-10) the very antithesis of the meekness and humility which were to Him the essence of righteousness (Mt 1129 71-5, Lk 177-10). His mission, He says, is not to the self-righteous, but to the man conscious of his sin (Mt 9<sup>18</sup> !, cf. Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). To the Pharisee ceremonial was everything, the spirit of action nothing (Mt 23<sup>25, 26</sup>); to Him the ceremonial was useless unless carried out in the spirit of love (5<sup>22-23</sup>), and the rule of law must always give way to the rule of love (cf. His treatment of Sabbathobservance, Mk 2<sup>22</sup>-3°). Therefore He said, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 520).

This leads us to speak briefly of His treatment of the Mosaic Law. He made a rule of observing it, but never in a literal, slavish manner. In everything He acted on the principle that 'the Son of Man is lord even of the Sabbath' (Mk 2<sup>28</sup>). He yielded to authority (cf. Mk 12<sup>17</sup> ||, Lk 17<sup>14</sup>, Mt 17<sup>27</sup>), yielded to authority (cf. Mk 12<sup>17</sup>], Lk 17<sup>18</sup>, Mt 17<sup>27</sup>), except when doing so meant the violation of a higher law (see Mt 23<sup>3</sup>). The Law was to Him sound in principle, but not perfect. His work in respect to it was not revolutionary, but evolutionary (5<sup>17-20</sup>). Not 'a jot or tittle' of its underlying principles was to perish; and the man who should 'break' (λύση in v. 19 picks up καταλῦσαι in v. 17; cf. Jn 7<sup>22</sup>) them would be acting against Christ's command * command.

On the other hand, He gives new and deeper applications to the laws of Moses, as in the case the law of murder (Mt 521ff.). He does not hesitate to add new restrictions to it, as in the case of the laws of adultery, false swearing, and retaliation (vv. 27. 33. 38); and He definitely abrogates a law of Moses when He declares all meats clean (Mk 7<sup>15-19</sup>).

In connexion with the question of Christ's relation to the Law, there is one passage which calls for special mention—Mt 3<sup>15</sup>, where, in answer to the Baptist's protest against baptizing Him, He says: 'Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.' We are sometimes told that business is here equivalent to the ceremonial law; but this cannot be so, inasmuch as there was no ceremonial law about baptism. Nor did baptism mean the same to Him as to most who underwent it. To them the ceremony selected by John brought assurance of forgiveness of sins, but no conscious outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Ac 19<sup>2,3</sup>); to Him it brought no forgiveness of sins, but a visible descent of the Spirit. For He never, all His life through, raised Himself above the ordinary human dependence on outward act and form, as His use of symbolic action and the institution of the two Sacraments show us. By δικαιοσύτη, then, in this passage, He clearly means the general use of outward religious ritual current at His time, and He makes this the occasion of receiving spiritual power.

(c) The communication of Christ's righteousness to His followers.—It would be going beyond the limits of this article to discuss the method of Justification and Sanctification (see sep. artt.), as represented in the Synoptic writers; it only remains to show the place they give to the facts which these words represent (even though it is impossible entirely to separate method and fact). We have seen that Christ claimed a unique know-We have seen that Christ claimed a unique knowledge of the Father and a unique power of revealing Him to man (Mt 11<sup>27</sup> ||),—a revelation which He consistently represented as possible only through love. Nor was this power to fail at His death. As their risen Lord He would always be with His disciples, to pour upon them power from on high (28<sup>18-20</sup>, Lk 24<sup>18-20</sup>). He was now to fulfil the Baptist's prophecy that He should baptize them with the Holy Spirit (Ac 1<sup>4-5</sup> 2<sup>1-13</sup>). The Holy Spirit, representing the risen Christ (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>), was Spirit, representing the risen Christ (Mt 2820), was to give them the righteousness which should, by God's love, fit them for the Kingdom of heaven,righteousness growing with their growing love and faith, which were to be its essence. Christ dis-

* This passage has caused such difficulties to the commen-"This passage has caused such dimensioned to the commen-tators that some of them have declared it inconsistent with Christ's teaching, and have held that He never said these words (cf. Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. p. 241.). But that v. 18 really applies to the principles of the Law, and not its letter, is surely proved by the addition of v. 29, where the scribes and Pharisees are de-nounced as having broken it while seeming to 'hedge it round.'

tinctly took His stand on the appeal to morality. Works were to be the necessary outcome of true love (Mt 7<sup>21</sup> etc.). When He says, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled '(5°), He does not mean in the next world only, but in this also. Indeed, throughout His teaching, the life to come is treated as an orderly development of this life. He speaks, on the one hand, of the Kingdom of heaven as already come in some measure,—'the kingdom of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>, cf. 6<sup>20</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>), and it is to come within you' (Lk 17", cr. or 11"), and to be with more marked power still within the lifetime of some of His disciples (Mk 9<sup>1</sup>||). Yet, on the other hand, its consummation is not for this life, but for the life to come (Mt 25<sup>24</sup>, Mk 14<sup>25</sup> = Lk 22<sup>18</sup> = Mt 26<sup>29</sup>). So Christ taught His disciples to pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' i.e. in ever more and more fulness until the end (συντέλεια). Meanwhile (as is everywhere implied, and nowhere stated) God sees each member of the Kingdom not as he is, but as he is becoming 'in Christ,' and treats him as a son for his faith and love.

2. St. John. - When we turn to the Johannine writings, we pass into a new atmosphere. We are no longer dealing so much with the outer activities of Christ's life in its earthly setting. St. John had pondered through long years and with deep reverence over the inner meaning of that life. To him Christ was primarily the hoyos, the revelation of the eternal nature of the Father, though it had been given them to touch and see Him in earthly form. Consequently we have a series of sayings unlike anything in the first three Gospels: 'God is Spirit' (4<sup>24</sup>), 'God is Light' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>), 'God is Love' (1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup> 1<sup>6</sup>), 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life' (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). So the thought of right-eousness as a Divine attribute is peculiarly developed in St. John. It is parallel to his favourite use of άλήθεια, which he treats almost as a synonym for αγιωσύνη, representing the less active side of righteousness (cf. ποιείν την άληθειαν in Jn 321 and 1 Jn 16 with ποιεῦν τὴν δικαιοσύνην in 1 Jn 37). So in Jn 822-34 'the truth shall make you free . . . but he that doeth sin is a slave.' Again, the conception of the Kingdom becomes in St. John the thought of life eternal; and the latter in Jn., as the former in the Synoptists, is spoken of, now as a present possession (3<sup>36</sup>), now as that which shall be fully bestowed only in the next life (1225).

Thus the thought of righteousness as a Divine attribute meets us at every turn, and its explicit mention not infrequently. Olyanos el, cries the angel to the Eternal in the Apocalypse (Rev 16<sup>5</sup>, where the thought is chiefly of His sternness to the wicked [cf. 15<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>2</sup>] in delivering His saints). Πατὴρ δίκαιε are Christ's own words in prayer (Jn. 1785). 1725), where the thought is primarily of God's gracious mercy and faithfulness in revealing His love to His chosen ones. Sikatos occurs again in 1 Jn 19 in a similar sense of 'true to his loving nature.' 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' In exactly the same way righteousness is predicated of Christ throughout as One who is consistent in His mercy to the penitent, and loving in His necessary sternness to the obdurate. 'If any man sin, we have an advo-cate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn 21); 'They that have done good (shall come forth) unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgment.

... My judgment is righteous' (Jn 5<sup>201</sup>.). Yet 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me... the word that I spake... shall judge him in the last day' (124.49). Christ, that is to say, seeks but to save the wicked, in His love for them; but if they will not have His mercy, they are self-doomed.

The Divine part throughout is that of absolute love: 'God is love,'—that sums Him up in a word; and that is the newness of the Christian teaching (1334 1512) which transforms the notion of what makes goodness in deed. Our whole duty is to love God, which involves obedience to Him (1 Jn 5<sup>3</sup>), and is declared to be the only means of knowing Him (47). The love of God necessarily carries with it the love of man (4<sup>11.12.20</sup>); it is the love of God, shown by sending His Son to die for the world, which teaches us to love other men (3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>9.10</sup>), and the one love must be as catholic as the other (cf. Jn 1232 Elsewhere, in emphasizing the inwardness of all true righteousness, Christ shows that it depends on God's nature as Spirit. 'God is Spirit, and they that worship him, must worship in spirit and truth' (424). And the corollary is that true worship is independent of locality and ceremonial (v. 21), though this is not to be taken as implying that all ceremonial may be safely cast aside.

But it is by developing Christ's teaching about the second or spiritual birth that St. John especially marks both the essential inwardness and the continuous growth of righteousness. The locus classicus for this is the Lord's discourse given in 33-21, where the eternal life given by the second birth is brought into immediate relation with His own pre-existence and resurrection (vv. 13-16). This chapter is illustrated in the First Epistle, where he writes:

Every one that loveth is begotten of God' (47). 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God' (51).

If ye know that he (probably Christ) is righteous, ye know that everyone also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him' (229).

But here we notice a further point. Christ 'was manifested to take away sins; and in him is no Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not . . . '; sin. Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not . . . '; the righteous man is 'he that doeth righteousness, . . . even as he is righteous. . . . Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is begotten of God' (1 Jn 3<sup>5-9</sup>). At first sight this seems inconsistent with 1<sup>8-9</sup>, where the Apostle tells us, 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we canness our sins he is faithful and righteous to confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins...' Clearly, in the former passages, sin is thought of as a lasting state of rebellion against God; in the latter, it is treated rather as an act due to weakness. He that is born of God cannot deliberately rebel against God, as long as the new life is in him; cf. Jn 1310 'Ye are clean, but not all' (Christ excepts only Judas, v. 11); 153 'Already ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you'; for, as He goes on to say, this cleanliness of heart comes from the union of Himself with the disciple, effected by love. 'Abide in me and I in you. . . . He that abideth in me and I in him, the same beareth much fruit; for apart from me ye can do nothing' (v. 4c, cf. 17<sup>21, 23</sup>). Here we have explicitly stated what is implicit in the Synontic Gospels, namely what is implicit in the Synoptic Gospels, namely, that only by the union of love with the risen Christ (cf. 8<sup>31. 22</sup> 15<sup>13-13</sup>) can we do righteousness, receiving more and more of 'his fulness . . . and grace for grace' (1<sup>16</sup>), having already in us the eternal life which is to be consummated at the last day (cf. 17<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>31</sup>). This is the general meaning of 16<sup>5-10</sup> (The Holy Spirit), when he is come, will convict the world in respect of . . . righteousness . . . because I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more'; that is to say, the Holy Spirit will not only reveal Christ's righteousness to the world, but will show men the infinite possibilities which are theirs in union with Him, because Christ is henceforth alive for evermore with the Father, having conquered death and sin. All this implies, what St. Paul explains so fully, that God sees us as we are becoming 'in Christ,' rather than as we are; but St. John does not analyze forgiveness as St. Paul does, and throughout he looks rather at the eternal fact than the temporal process.

3. St. Paul.—In St. Paul's Epistles δίκαιος generally bears the same meaning as elsewhere in the NT, and so is associated with δσισε and ἄγισε (cf. Tit 18, Ro 712). However, once at least he seems to revert almost unconsciously to the Pharisaic idea of the οικαιος as one who conforms to law; for in Ro 57 he apparently differentiates between the 'righteous' and the 'good' (ἀγαθός) man in much the same way as the Gnostics afterwards called the God of the OT 'righteous' (meaning 'just'), and the God of the NT 'good.' This is not his usual custom, however; indeed, in Eph 59 he couples ἀγαθωσύνη and δικαιοσύνη; and in Ro 712 he puts δικαία between ἀγία and ἀναθή. the olkaios as one who conforms to law; for in Ro 57 άγία and  $d\gamma a\theta \dot{\eta}$ .

In Ro 14<sup>17</sup> St. Paul tells us that 'the kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, —words which remind us of St. Matthew. But, unlike the First Gospel, he often speaks of the righteousness of God. In the years which preceded his conversion, he had known all the suffering of a sensitive man who feels that, in spite of all his desire to keep God's law, he is constantly breaking it in act, and generally fail-ing to live up to the spirit of it. The salvation of his life had come to him in the conviction that God takes the will for the deed, and that in union with the risen Christ the human will is kept constantly true. This is the truth that he has to work out intellectually in his Epistles. And he begins by showing that Christ had not lowered the standard of God's righteousness to meet human weakness, but raised it (cf. Ro 3<sup>21-28</sup>). God is and must be true to His righteous nature; He is the sighteous index who will reward those who every righteous judge who will reward those who serve Him and punish those who do not. It is not the fact of God's righteousness that has been abolished by Christianity, but the old standard of service. This comes out very clearly in Ro 10. Israel, he says, were ignorant of God's righteousness (though they knew God's law, v.³), for 'Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness unto every one that hath faith' (v.). The Jew had thought that he must 'ascend into heaven' or 'descend into the abyss, that is, make superhuman efforts to keep the Law. But the righteousness which is of faith saith, ... The word is night thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach. 'For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation' (vv. 6-10). It is not keeping the Law in act that God demands so much as 'faith working through love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>); 'the end of the charge is love out of . . . faith unfeigned' (1 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). 'For the whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Gal 5<sup>14</sup>, cf. Ro 13<sup>8</sup>). Without love, the most wonderful of God's other gifts—even faith itself-or the most perfect acts of self-devotion, are vain and empty (1 Co 13<sup>1-3</sup>): love is greater than faith (v.<sup>13</sup>), though it necessarily contains faith (v.<sup>7</sup>). Thus Mosaism is ή διακονία τῆς κατακρίσεως, but Christianity ή διακονία τῆς διακονία της διακονία τῆς διακονία της διακονία της διακονία της διακονία το το δι shall give the crown of righteousness (i.e. perfect righteousness as a reward; cf. τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς, Rev 2<sup>10</sup>, Ja 1<sup>12</sup>) to all them that have loved His appearing (2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>).

So St. Paul, though he constantly emphasizes the truth that 'faith is counted for righteousness'

(Ro 4<sup>5</sup> etc.), never means by faith merely an intellectual belief, but that faith which is part of love, i.e. a response of the whole personality to God. Therefore it is obviously quite unfair to represent his

doctrine of justification by faith as entailing a legal fiction. The faith and the love must be actual in the believer, and must issue in action (213), and as they grow, so must action become more perfect; it is not the action, however, that constitutes righteousness in God's sight, but the faith and love. God views us sub specie æternitatis: He looks on us as we shall be some day by virtue of our union with Christ. St. Paul puts forward, in different language, the truth which St. John expresses by saying that the man who is begotten of God cannot sin. As the believer beholds through faith 'the glory of the Lord,' he is 'transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>). Christ is the Second Adam (Ro 5<sup>12-18</sup>); we are, by the mysterious union of love, 'in Christ Jesus, who was made unto us righteousness and sanctification' (1 Co 12). We may 'become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 52). 'I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me' (Ph 413). Sometimes St. Paul's Strengtheneth the (114°). Sometimes St. Faths that of St. John: 'If Christ is in you... (your) spirit is life because of righteousness' (Ro  $8^{10}$ ; cf. the opposition of  $\theta d \nu a \tau \sigma \sigma$  and  $\delta \iota \kappa a \iota \sigma \sigma \sigma \nu \tau$  in  $6^{16}$ ; cf. also 'reigning in life,'  $5^{17}$ , where  $\chi d \rho \iota \tau \sigma \sigma$  God's gracious gift—is coupled with δικαιοσύνης).

4. The rest of the NT .- The other books of the NT present few new features which call for notice here. The Epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes Christ's absolute righteousness, in order to show thin as the one sufficient Victim and High Priest. He is 'the effulgence of (God's) glory and the very image of his substance' (1<sup>3</sup>). The Psalmist's words apply to Him uniquely, 'Thou hast loved right-eousness and hated iniquity' (1<sup>3</sup>). He was 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4<sup>1h</sup>). He is the 'king of righteousness' (7<sup>2</sup>). With regard to His work for His followers, the writer of the Epistle usually employs the words άγιάζω and τελειδω. He exhorts his readers to have 'experience of the word of righteousness,' that is, 'to press on unto perfection (τελειότης), not laying again a foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the teaching of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurbaptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment' (5<sup>13</sup> and 6<sup>1, 2</sup>). This perfection comes only through Christ (7<sup>11-19</sup>); He is the risen High Priest, who 'ever liveth to make intercession for us' (7<sup>25</sup>, cf. 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>12, 20</sup>). His blood purges us 'from dead works to serve the living God' (9<sup>14</sup>). 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever (i.e. potentially) them that are being sanctified' (10<sup>14</sup>). Therefore we must 'follow after the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord' (12<sup>14</sup>). The Epistle bases our sanctification on love through faith, just as St. Paul does (319 with 42). The OT heroes wrought all their great deeds through faith (ch. 11); but faith could not possibly bring them such τελείωσις as it can to the Christian, who is united with his risen Lord (1140). The Christian's work rests on a fuller faith; but love is what makes it fruitful,—love to man rooted in love to God (610 1024). Our first duty is to offer up loving worship to God; our second, 'to do good and to communicate' (13<sup>18,18</sup>).

The Epistles of St. Peter touch the subject at several points; but, being practical rather than doctrinal, they do not treat it systematically. The writer of the Second Epistle salutes those 'that have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness' (i.e. consistent mercy) 'of our God and (the) Saviour Jesus Christ' (2 P 1¹). Christ, the righteous, died for us the unrighteous (1 P 3¹8; cf. St. Peter in Ac 3¹4); He is the 'lamb without blemish and without spot' (1¹9). 'He bare our sins in his body upon the tree that we having 3²-3 in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteonsness' (234), by the power of the risen Lord (12 321). Our union with Him in love and faith works out the salva-tion of our souls (1th). For faith ends in love (2 P 1th). The Christian's duty, therefore, is to love his neighbour 'from the heart fervently' (1 P 1th); 'above all things being fervent in love . . . for love covereth a multitude of sins' (4°). But the end of all his good works is that men may glorify God (2<sup>12</sup>). So shall he be saved unto the new heavens and new earth, where this righteousness heavens and new earth, where this righteousness shall dwell in perfection (2 P 312).

The Epistle of St. James follows closely the Sermon on the Mount. He speaks once of God's righteousness, meaning the righteousness which God demands of us (130) And in all probability he refers to Christ as à discoor (50). He speaks of love for one's neighbour as 'the royal law' (20); and he insists at some length that the faith which was accounted unto Abraham for righteonsness was not merely intellectual; it could not be separ ated from his works, in which it was realized and made perfect (22 21)

LITERATURE — The subject is treated, in some of its aspects, in so many books that it is hard to select any for special mention. There are chapters on it in almost every work on NT Theology; e.g. Beyschiag and Sievens, see also Wendt, Tracking of Jesus, vol. | § 11 ch iv , Bruce, Kingdom of God, che vili ix. For individual passages in the NT, reference must be made to the standard Commentaries. Probably the fullest analysis of the word is in Cremer's Bib. Theol. Lex. of NT Greek.

RING.—When the Prodigal Son in the parable returned to his father (Lk 15<sup>22</sup>), the latter ordered a ring (δακτόλιοι) to be placed on his son's linger. This was not only a mark of opulence (Ja 2<sup>2</sup>), it is perhaps intended also as a token that he was restored to a place of anthority in the house, and allowed to issue orders in his father's name (see Gn 3816 4142, Eat 310). For the allegorical funcies that have clustered round this ring, see the works on the Parables; cf., further, art. SEAL.

RIVER (ποταμός).—'River' (Mk 1° etc.), 'flood' (Mt 7°), 'stream' (Lk 6°), and 'waters' (2 Co 11°) stand for the same Greek word ποταμός. 'Stream' in Lk 6° corresponds to 'flood' in Mt 7°.

The Larlow is the corresponds to Palestine.

The Jordan is the one true river in Palestine The name occurs frequently in the Gospels, but only once connected with 'river' (Mk 1°). See

The 'stream' (Lk 64) or 'flood' (Mt 72) is evi dently the rushing torrent raised by wintry rains. From Rev 1215 18 we gather that worager may signify any great volume of water rolling over the land. St. Paul's 'perils of rivers' (1 Co 1129) were doubtless such as the Eastern traveller has per petually to face in fording bridgeless streams in times of rain and melting snow.

To one reared in Palestine, where only water is required to turn the wilderness into a garden, a river, with its beautifying and fertilizing power, might well seem an apt symbol of life (Rev 221 2). W. EWING

ROADS. - Itoads imply a certain amount of civilization. In primitive times it was only near the great centres that regularly built roads were to be found, and even there they were poor and few. In the days of the Empire it was different. The Romans knew the value of good roads, and spared no pains on them. The remains that have come down to us would do credit to modern engineers. They were well bottomed and well laid, and from ten to fourteen feet wide, generally broadest when the cutting was through solid rock. The foundations were of stone, and when allowed to fall into disrepair were rough and slippery, and very trying to the nerves of travellers. In the very trying to the nerves of travellers. governors; elsewhere they were under the charge of special officers-frequently of high rank. Along the great military highways were stations, or guard-houses, where the soldiers had not only to see to the preservation of peace and the safety of travellers, but had also to attend to the mainten ance of the roads themselves. There the tolls were levied. It was probably at one of these places that Matthew was sitting at the receipt of custom when Jesus called him (Mt 9°). As the highways between the East and the West passed through the land of the Israelites, making its geographical position unique, it may be well to indicate one or two of these. Cf. map of Palestine in vol. i.

two of these. Cf. map of Palestine in vol. i.

1. The most northerly, and in some respects the most important, was that connecting the Mediterranean Sea and the Euphrates Valley. Starting at Acco (Ptolemais), it ran, according to Ramsay, till it came to Karn Hattin near to Cana, and then almost due east to Tiberias. Skirting the shores of the Sea of Galdee, it crossed the Jordan near Ratherida, and want over a spure of the Anti-Bethsaida, and went over a spur of the Anti-Libanus, and then east by north to Damascus. This road is said to have been a rich source of revenue to the Romans. In the time of the Cru-sades it was known as the Via Maris.

2. From Damascus there came another road a little to the east of the former, which reached almost to the Sea of Galilee, and then, bending southward on the east side of Jordan, passed beyond the Dead Sen. This was probably the way that the Syrian and Assyrian armies took in their advance on Israel (2 K 8<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>,

3. There was also the road along the Mediterranean; and this, both in peace and war, was of the first importance. It ran through Acco, Casarea, Joppa, Ashdod, and Gaza into Egypt. Along this road St. Paul was sent to Casarea (Ac 23<sup>-5,5</sup>).

4. From Jerusalem roads branched out to north, south, east, and west. (a) There was one through Samaria connecting Judan and Galilee. Although the direct road from Jerusalciu to Galilee, it was seldon used by the devout Jews, on account of the hatred that existed between them and the Samaritans. It was by this road that Jesus jour neyed when He spoke to the woman of Samarita (Ju 44) (b) In ordinary encunstances the Jewspreferred to avoid intercourse with the Samaritans, hence in going northward they took the road leading down by Jericho, over the Jordan, and upthrough Persea. (c) To the west, another road ran from Jerusalem to Jaffa, passing Gibeah, Beth horon, and Lydda; while to to the south the road went through Bethlehem to Hel ron, where it split of Beershela, and the other going west to the coast and passing through Gaza. The latter is supposed and passing through Gaza. The latter is supposed to be the way taken by Philip (Ac 85), because tradition has it that the cumuch was Laptized in the vicinity of Hebron

These roads played an important part in the diffusion of the gospel. The people who hive on the main avenues of traffic are usually of a freer spirit and more open mind than those who dwell in the quiet and cultured towns; and for this reason Jesus got a better hearing in Galilee than in the more polished south. By following the main routes of travel and traffic, St. Paul was lid to the chief eities of his day, and four I there there exists of his message which was carried thence by traders and other into the reacte corners of the Finp re. The roads were not even in the days of the Romans, free from danger; witness Lk 10*; but neither brigandage nor

ROBBER (ληστής, Vulg. latro) is found in AV only in Jn 10<sup>1.8</sup> 18<sup>40</sup> (Barabbas). In RV it stands for the same Greek word also in Mt 21<sup>13</sup>=Mk 11<sup>17</sup>=Lk 19<sup>46</sup> ('den of robbers'); Mt 26<sup>56</sup>=Mk 14<sup>46</sup>=Lk 22<sup>52</sup> ('Are ye come out as against a robber?'); Mt 27<sup>73</sup>. <sup>41</sup>=Mk 15<sup>77</sup> ('two robbers'); Lk 10<sup>50</sup>. <sup>36</sup> ('fell among robbers'). In all these places AV has 'thief,' which elsewhere is the equivalent of κλέπτης. The two Greek words differ precisely as the two English; the ληστής (robber, brigand, highwayman) takes by force, the κλέπτης (thief) by stealth. Judas was a thief (Jn 12<sup>2</sup>), Barabbas a robber (18<sup>40</sup>, cf. Mk 15<sup>7</sup>). But earlier English versions join with AV in ignoring this distinction; 'thief' occurs in them all in the above passages from the Synoptists; in Jn 10<sup>1.8</sup> when another word was needed, Tind. and Geneva have 'robber,' but Cranmer 'murtherer' (cf. Luther, Mörder); in 18<sup>40</sup> Wyc. and Rhem. have 'thief,' Tind. 'robber,' Cran. and Gen. 'murtherer.' But in 16th cent. English, 'thief' was used in a wider sense than now, including all kinds of robbery. Thus Shakespeare calls pirates 'water thieves' (Merchant of Venice, I. 3); Latimer (Sermons, Parker Soc. 208) calls Robin Hood 'a traitor and a thief,' and (139) applying Is 1<sup>28</sup> says 'He calleth princes thieves. Had they a standing at Shooter's Hill or Standgate Hole, to take a purse?' So Cranmer (Remains, Parker Soc. 107), 'Job said not ''These wicked thieves have wrought me this woe"; but referred all to God.' See Trench, NT Synonyms, §xliv.

Palestine has always, if its government has been weak, been infested by robbers, to whom its rocks and caves afford plentiful cover and shelter (cf. Jg 928, Hos 69 71). Herod, when quite young, first made his reputation by ruthlessly executing robbers in Galilee (Josephus, Ant. XIV. ix. 2, BJ I. x. 5). At a later time he destroyed robbers who lived in inaccessible caverns, by lowering chests full of soldiers from the cliff above (Ant. XIV. xv. 4-5, BJ I. xvi. 2-4). This reminds us of 'den of robbers' (Jer 711 Mt 21131). Not only had the Tample here. I. xvi. 2-4). This reminds us of 'den of robbers' (Jer 7<sup>11</sup>, Mt 21<sup>13</sup>!). Not only had the Temple become a haunt of 'robbers'—the dealers in the Temple market were notorious for their extortion but it gave them fancied security in their evil-doing. (During the Jewish War the Temple was literally the stronghold of the robbers or Zealots, BJ IV. iii. 7, etc.). There was a great outbreak of robbery on the death of Herod (Ant. XVII. x., BJ II. iv.). We read later of robbers plundering a servant of the Emperor's, near Bethhoron, which was avenged on the neighbouring villagers by Cumanus (Ant. XX. v. 4, BJ II. xii. 2), and of Fadus, Felix, and Festus destroying large numbers of them (Ant. xx. i. 1, viii. 5, 10, BJ II. xiii. 2, xiv. 1). Under the later procurators the country swarmed with them. It is probable that some of these 'robbers' were really Zealots, in rebellion against the authority of Rome, so that there was an element of misplaced patriotism and even religion in their proceedings. Trench (l.c.) shows how this may throw light on the character of the 'Penitent Robber.' In any case, Josephus at a later date identifies robbers and

Zealots (BJ IV. iii. 3. 9, etc.).

The road from Jerusalem to Jericho, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan, has always had a bad name for robbers. Near it Pompey destroyed two robbers' strongholds (Strabo, xvi. 2); Jerome (on Jer 3²) speaks of its dangers, and derives the 'ascent of Adummim' on this road from the blood shed there by robbers (Loc. Heb. s.v.). See Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 314, 424, and art. SAMARITAN (THE GOOD).

ROCK (πέτρα).—1. In Mt 724 the word stands for a rocky foundation, which would remain solid, notwithstanding the sapping effect of floods; while the sandy foundation means a carelessly chosen site, where the loose formation of the soil would be very easily penetrated by torrents, thus making the building erected on it very insecure. The moral and spiritual parallel is that of two contrasted lives, one durable, the other perishing and worthless. The man who listens to Christ's words but does not carry them out, never allowing them to affect his character, is one who builds upon the sand. He, again, who hears the word and straightway carries it into action, doing the will of God with his might, has chosen the rocky foundation. To him the storms and trials of life act as tests of character, which show it to be securely founded, and make it more firm and durable. Perhaps faith and obedience are the two prominent characteristics of the man who builds his house upon the rock. See art. BUILDING.

2. At Cæsarea Philippi, Christ asked His disciples about the various opinions men were holding regarding Him. St. Peter answered for the Apostles: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' The Saviour was pleased by this answer of faith, which had been revealed to Peter by the Heavenly Father, and commended him by saying (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), 'Thou art Peter (πέτροs), and on this rock (πέτρα) I will build my Church.' St. Peter thus showed himself to be one who had profited by Christ's teaching, being a doer of the word as well as a hearer. Only the faithful and obedient heart could have given him such a deep knowledge of the truth. As Jerusalem stood on the rocky foundation of Mt. Zion, and was faced by the dark rocks of the valley of Hinnom, a scene of death and corruption; so the new city of God, the ἐκκλησία of Christ, is to be founded on imperishable foundations, so that the opposing gates of Hades (all the power of evil) should never prevail against it. St. Peter, in showing himself a man of faith, is a specimen of the believing ones who shall constitute the strong foundation on which the Church is to rest. As πέτροs is a fragment of πέτρα, so the believing St. Peter is an example of all who should hereafter believe (cf. 1 Ti 1<sup>18</sup>).

It is well to note that the Fathers took the rock to mean either Christ Himself, or the faith or the confession of St. Peter, but never St. Peter as an individual. In later days, the text Mt 1618 was used for polemical purposes, in defence of the Papacy. The Reformers returned to the earlier view of the Fathers, mostly holding that the confession of faith made by St. Peter was the rock. Another view held by Luther, following Augustine, was that Christ, in speaking the words, pointed to Himself as the rock. Perhaps this would best accord with the general teaching of the New Testament. St. Paul calls Christ the foundation (1 Co 311), and again speaks of Apostles and prophets being the foundation, while Christ is the chief corner-stone (Eph 220). Is it not most likely, however, that our Lord looked on St. Peter as the type of converted, believing men, on whom, as a foundation, an unconquerable Church should be built? Origen well says: 'If thou hast Peter's faith, thou art a rock like him. If thou hast Peter's virtues, thou hast See also artt. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI Peter's keys.' and CHURCH.

3. The word 'rock' occurs in Lk  $8^{6.13}$ , in the parable of the Sower. It is the equivalent of the 'stony (RV 'rocky') places' of Mt  $13^{5.20}$  (7a  $\pi\epsilon\tau\rho\omega\delta\eta$ ), and gives at once the right sense, a thin coating of soil covering a hard rocky surface, where there could be no depth of earth. The rock here, in the interpretation, signifies a sinful worldly nature, incapable of being penetrated by the living seed. That which makes a good foundation is not at all fitted to be a good seed-bed. See art. SEED.

4. In Mt 27<sup>51</sup> we read that the rocks (wérpa:) were rent, at the hour of Christ's death on Calvary. There is nothing figurative here; but the earthquake would make it appear to men's minds as if the very earth shuddered at man's wicked deed, so that its hardest elements were broken asunder.

5. Finally, the sepulchre in which our Lord was laid was 'hewn out of a rock' (Mt 27<sup>60</sup> = Mk 15<sup>60</sup>).

ROLL (βιβλίον, κεφαλίs).—The word 'roll' is found in NT only in the RV, and in the Gospels only as a marginal reading. In the account in Luke of our Lord's sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth it occurs thrice in the margin (4<sup>17</sup> ota 20) as the rendering of βιβλίον, where AV and text of RV give 'book.' In He 10' 'In the volume of the book it is written of me' RV gives 'roll' for AV 'volume' as the rendering of κεφαλίς. The latter word occurs here only in NT, but it is quoted from the Septuagint (Ps 40'), and thus its meaning is determined, as it is the translation of the Heb. 1722, 'roll,' although in Liddell and Scott κεφαλίς is given as meaning 'chapter or passage.' Why κεφαλίς is taken to represent 1722 is uncertain, although it has been held that the reference was to the knobs or rounded heads of the roller about which the manuscript was rolled (see Grimm-Thayer, Lex. s.v.). The roll was the form of the book both in Palestine and Egypt, although usually, if not always, the Hebrew rolls were, originally at least, of skins which had gone through some process of tanning (see art. BOOK), while the Egyptian rolls were of papyrus. When papyrus began to be used in Palestine it is difficult to say. The codex form of book is generally held to have been introduced after the invention of parchment, but there is reason to believe that the Egyptians occasionally employed it for papyrus manuscripts, while the roll was the prevailing form.

ROME, ROMANS.—Though the name 'Romans' appears only once in the Gospels (Jn 11ss), if we except the adverb 'Pomanori (Jn 19ss), which is tr. 'in Latin' by AV and RV, Rome and the Romans are a very real presence in the Gospel narratives, forming a sort of background to the action of the leading figures. The influence of the world-power is shown by the references to the Emperor (Mt 22sr, Mk 12st, Lk 2st 3st 20st 23st, Jn 19st), the governor Pontius Pilate (see Pilate), the tax-gatherers (Mt 5sst etc.), the centurions (Mk 15ss, Lk 7st etc.), and the soldiers (Mt 27sst etc.). The Gospels testify to the ultra-national feeling of those Jews who were antagonistic to the Roman power, and illustrate the hatred and contempt felt for those of their countrymen—the tax-gatherers, for example—who took employment from the government. The more intellectually enlightened among the Jews—the Sadducees, for instance—welcomed the Roman rule as they welcomed the Greek civilization and culture which it brought with it; but the great mass of the people were in a state of unreasoning opposition to it. The disposition of Pilate may be advanced as an excuse for their attitude, but in general it cannot be denied that the Jews did not deserve to retain their former liberty, that they were ungrateful to the Romans for the special privileges conferred on them, and that they forgot the advantages which the powerful protection of Rome and the advancement and security of trade thus accruing brought to them. The student of history will regard the fate which came upon them in A.D. 70, and which is referred to in Lk 21<sup>206</sup>, as deserved. The stiffneckedness of the Jews brought upon them a ruin which other subject-races in the Empire had escaped by a wise submission.

The beginnings of Rome are shrouded in obscurity, but the spade has helped to correct and amplify what we learn from history. The city was situated on the left bank of the Tiber, about eighteen miles from its mouth. The original Rome was built only on the Palatine Hill. When the was built only on the Palatine Hill. people of Romulus were united with the Sabines, the Capitoline Hill, the Forum, and perhaps part of the Quirinal, were added. Mons Colius was occupied by Etruscan colonists from the other side of the river, and conquest led to the later inclusion or the river, and conquest led to the later inclusion of the Aventine, the Viminal, the Esquiline, and Quirinal Hills, on which early settlements had existed. Tradition has it that one of the kings, named Servius Tullius, built a wall to enclose the now largely extended city. This wall, called the agger, because it was built specially for purposes of defence, remained the wall of Rome till, late in the Empire, in the time of Appelier (2nd cont the Empire, in the time of Aurelian (3rd cent. A.D.), a new and extended line of fortifications was built. Outside the Servian wall there was a trench 100 ft. broad and 30 ft. deep. Within this the wall proper was built of large rectangular blocks, and behind this wall there was an embankment 100 ft. wide and 30 ft. high, pierced by the channels of aqueducts. Portions of the wall have been discovered in thirty-seven different places, and it is possible to trace its entire course. Advantage was taken by the engineers of all the natural features, and where these were lacking, as on the northwest, the above plan was followed. Between the Capitoline and the Aventine the river was thought to afford sufficient protection. The whole circuit of the wall was about 5 miles, and it was pierced by 19 gates. Within there was a large area of vacant spaces, which were gradually built on later, and at the beginning of the Empire the city was not only congested with buildings, but large areas without the wall were also covered with houses. In the year B.C. 10, Augustus divided the city into 14 wards (regiones), and these were in their turn subdivided into smaller quarters (vici). Some of the principal buildings must be referred to. The Roman Forum, an open space measuring over 300 ft. in length and about 150 ft. in breadth, was the centre of political, legal, and commercial life. At one end was the rostra or platform, from which speeches were delivered to the public; at the other end were shops. On one side were the Curia or senate-house and the Basilica Æmilia, a law-court; along the whole of the other side, with the Sacra Via between, stretched the Basilica Julia, a very large law-court, surrounded by two rows of square columns. Other important buildings in the immediate neighbourhood were the Temple of Janus, the Temple of Cæsar, the Arch of Augustus, the Temple of Vesta, the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Temple of Saturn, where was the treasury, with the Tabularium (record-office) behind. On the top of the Capitoline Hill was the Capitolium or great temple dedicated to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and on the Palatine Hill the principal residence of the Emperor, and the Temple of Apollo containing the public libraries, Greek and Latin. In the Imperial period four additional fora were built, devoted entirely to legal, literary, and religious purposes—the Forum Julium begun by Julius Cæsar, the Forum Augustum built by Augustus, the Forum Transitorium completed by Nerva, and the Forum Transitorium the property of the state of th Trajani built by Trajan, the most splendid work of Imperial times. Considerations of space will not allow mention of the markets, circuses, theatres, baths, and gardens, which were characteristic features of the city and its life. The great roads which converged at Rome, and the aqueducts, can merely be mentioned. Various estimates of the population of Rome in the time of Christ have been given, ranging from 800,000 to 2,000,000: the latter seems more likely than the former. All nationalities in the Empire were represented, and the alties in the Empire were represented, and the slave population was very large.

Only a very brief sketch of the progress of the Romans can be given. Their history is curiously parallel to our own. They were a mixed race, and passed through the three stages, pastoral and agricultural, commercial, and imperial. The kernel of the race was Latin, but there was an early intermixture with Sabines and Etruscans, the latter, according to tradition, emigrants from Lydia, in Asia Minor. The Romans began as one of the members of the Latin league of which, having become presidents, they eventually became masters. After conquering Latium, they were inevitably brought into conflict with the other races of Italy. They rose again after the Gallic invasion and destruction of their city in 390, and by the time their trade interests brought them into conflict with the Carthaginians, about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C., they were sovereign over most of Italy. The close of that century saw them pos-sessors of Sicily and Sardinia, as well as conquerors over 'Africa.' About this time they began to interfere in Eastern politics, and the Macedonian wars and the conflicts which grew out of them resulted in the conquest of Macedonia and Greece in the same year as they finally became masters of 'Africa.' Ere this they had become possessed of most of Spain. The extension of Roman territory steadily continued, until in the time of Christ it included, roughly, Europe (except the British Isles, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia), the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and the north-west of Africa.

The internal history of the Roman people was no less remarkable. Great dangers from within were successfully surmounted. The conflict between the patricians and the dependent class lasted for hundreds of years. At first the Roman State was ruled by a king, with a body of patrician advisers. On the substitution of a dyarchy for a monarchy— a change effected not without difficulty—the new office, called the consulship, tenable for one year, was open only to the patrician class. Even from the earliest times there appears to have been a popular assembly, which played some part in legis-lation, but to define its powers or to state their exact relation to the powers of the king and senate is impossible. The consuls were elected by the citizen-army, which assembled in classes according to the property qualification of each citizen-soldier. The whole procedure of this assembly was in the hands of its patrician presidents, so that there was more of the semblance than the reality of power. Further, the plebeian had no appeal against the arbitrary authority of a chief magistrate. At the very beginning of the Republic the famous Valerian law was passed, that no magistrate should put a Roman citizen to death unless the sentence had been confirmed by the assembly of citizen-soldiers. This law was always regarded as the great charter of a Roman's liberties, but at first it was difficult The plebeians adopted on more than to enforce. one occasion the plan of deserting the city for a time, and thus wrung concessions from the unwilling patricians. It was in this way that they succeeded in obtaining magistrates of their own, called tribunes, who were authorized to protect them against the consuls. The development of the powers of this magistracy had more to do with the progress of the Roman democracy than any other factor, and even in the Empire the most important of the Emperor's statutory powers was his 'tribunician authority.' The tribunes convened assemblies of the plebeians, and carried resolutions of importance to that class. The resolutions of this body, which met by tribes, were later on to become the most powerful force in the State, having at a comparatively early period been declared to have the force of laws (B.C. 287). The first plebeian consul was elected in 367, about a century and a half after the traditional date of the establishment of the Republic, and by the end of the fourth century B.C. every office in the State was open to the plebeian class. The plebeians had won all they sought.

The establishment of the equality of the orders was not the establishment of a real democracy. It was the beginning of a new struggle between the governing class, which was mainly plebeian in origin, and the mass of the people. The rapid expansion of the Roman territory, the necessity for the appointment of new magistrates to govern the new countries, and the establishment of a governing class alone possessed of the experience necessary for coping with foreign affairs, tended more and more to withdraw the real power from the popular assemblies and to concentrate it in the hands of the senate. By the theory of the consti-tution the popular assemblies had all the power, but in practice, between the middle of the 3rd and the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C., the senate was all-powerful. Circumstances also produced great distress among the people in general. In the absence of the farmer, serving in the army abroad, his farm was neglected, and trouble came upon him and his household. He had to borrow money, which in many cases he was unable to repay. acres were bought by the rich, who worked them with slave labour, which was cheap owing to the enormous influx of captives seized in war. The small landholder disappeared, to join the hungry proletariat in Rome; and Italy became a country of large estates, which, in the words of Pliny, wrought her ruin. The attempts made by the Gracchi (B.C. 133-122) to redress this state of matters were rewarded with assassination. cally, to the end of the Republic, agrarian laws were brought forward, but were unable to check the evil. Even under the Empire it was only partially checked, and a large part of the Roman population was fed by the Emperors.

A Roman 'province' consisted of the sphere of duty of a magistrate, and the word had not pri-marily a territorial application. The inhabitants were disarmed and taxed. The main lines under which a province was to be governed were set forth in a special law, generally drawn up by the senate. This law always took account of local conditions, such as the form of government already in existence before annexation, and the favour shown to Rome by particular cities. In some provinces certain States were free, such as Athens in the province of Achaia. It was the custom to send a body of commissioners to start the new constitution on its way. Some of these constitutions were modified as time went on, but others which had been established in Republican times were found still existing in Imperial times. Much was left to governors in the time of the Republic. Cruelty and rapacity were very common, but incompetence was unknown. The provincials could hardly get redress for injuries inflicted on them in Republican times. All the eloquence of a Cicero, engaged to plead the cause of the province of Sicily, availed only to remove Verres, the cause of the evil; the evil was not healed.

During the last century of the Republic, Rome and Italy were torn by a long succession of ruinous civil wars. It said much for the machinery of the 538 government that foreign enemies did not imperil its very existence. There was a lenging among all the better citizens for an era of peace and prosperity, and it had become increasingly clear that this goal could be reached only under an Imperial rule. The need of the time was satisfied by Augustus, who ruled as autocrat under constitutional forms. The appearance of a republic was retuined, but the reality was gone, and the appearance itself gradually disappeared also. For the city the Empire was a time of luxury and idleness, but the provinces entered upon an era of progressive prosperity The Emperor was responsible for the government of all provinces where an army was necessary, and governed these by paid deputies of his own. The older and more settled provinces were governed by officials appointed by the senate, but the Emperor had his financial interests looked after by procurators of his own even in these. The provinces were now much more protected against the rapacity and cruelty of governors. The Emperors themselves stood for just as well as efficient administration, and most of them gave a noble example by strenuous devotion to administrative husiness

The resident Romans in any province consisted of (1) the officials connected with the government, who were generally changed annually; (2) members of the great financial companies, and lesser business men, whose interests kept them there,—the pub-licans of the Gospels were agents of the former; (3) citizens of colonize (or military settlements), which were really parts of Rome itself eet down in the provinces; (4) soldiers of the garmson and their officers. These formed the aristocracy of any city in which they lived. A fifth class of Roman citizens might be made out of those natives of the province who, for services rendered to the State, were individually gifted with the citizenship. It was a great honour, which was not conferred on all the inhabitants of the Empire till A.D. 212.

The Romans have left a great legacy to the world As administrators, lawyers, soldiers, engineers, architects, and builders, they have never been aurpassed. In literature they depended mainly on the Greeks, but they claimed that satire was a native product. So with sculpture, music, paint ing, and medicine. In the arts they never attained more than a respectable standard, by imitating the Greeks, who could turn their hands to anything.

As applied to Christ (Rev 5° 22'11), the title 'Root' probably means more than 'branch or sucker from an ancient root.' Rather does it point to Him as Himself the 'root' whence David and his tribe aprang, appearing at last to manifest His transcendent power and glory.

RUE (whyavor, Ruta graveolens) is a low growing shrubby plant of the natural order Rutacese, and is still cultivated in Palestine. It has a strong, unpleasant smell, and is bitter and pungent to the taste. The ancient Romans made use of the leaves of rue for culmary purposes. An essential oil, which is obtained by distillation with water, is used in medicine, chiefly as an antispasmodic. In Lk 11<sup>6</sup>, where the only Biblical allusion to rue occurs, it is named along with mint (wh. see) as one of the common garden herbs on which the Pharisees paid tithe. HUGH DUNCAN.

But our Lord's words do not exhibit that 'moval hatred of all the visible power of the world regarded as a vast selfish manifestation and embodiment of evil,' which finds expression in the following passage from one of the letters of Gregory vi. the is writing to Herman of Metz, one of his partisans); 'Who can be ignorant that kings and nobles took their beginning from those who, not knowing God, by their pride, robberies, perifds and murders, in abort, by almost every kind of crime, no doubt at the suggestion of the prince of this world, the devil, have in blind ambition and intelerable presumption had a mind to tyransize over other near who are undoubtedly their equals.' Milman asks, 'Are we reading a journalist of Pris in 1791' '(Letin Christianity, III 191, ct. Mozley's Sermon on 'The Roman Council, Univ. Serms, p. 1).

Our Lord, it is true, speaks of the exercise of domination and coercion that is characteristic of the rulers of the Gentiles as an example to be avoided by His disciples as members of a Kingdom not of this world; 'so shall it not be among you.'
With them, greatness is to come through minister-With them, greatness is to come through ministering love (cf. art. MINISTER, 3). At the same time, in His great saying, Mk 12.7,—a saying which reveals that the whole domain of duty lay open before Him,—our Lord teaches that a kingdom of this world, even the principality of a Tiberius, has its own sphere of right, and that when it keeps within it, and exercises its administrative functions,—of which the levying of tribute is a representative instance,—it is to be obeyed without demur. This saying was probably present to the mind of St. Paul when he wrote, under Nero (but in the earlier and better part of his reign), his weighty exposition of the ethics of citizenship (Ro 13.1.2).

(i.) Also 30 their and its context.—Like his older contemporary Isaiah (9, 11), Micali looks forward to the end of the Assyrian invasion as the time when the Messianic hope shall be fulfilled.

'The daughter of Zlon must pass through the pangs of labour before her true king is born, she must come forth from the city and dwell in the open field; there, and not within her proud ramparts. Jehovah will grant her deliverance from her enemies. For a time the land shall be given up to the foe, but only for a time. Once more as in the days of Dayld, guerilla hands gather together to average the wrongs of their nation (i). A new Day of comes firth from little liethlebem, and the rost of his brether i return to the children of large! that is the kindred Helrew nations again accept the sway of the new king, who stands and feeds his flock in the strength of Jehovah, in the nejects of the name of Jehovah his God. Then Assyria shall no longer insult Jehovah's land with impunity! (W. R. Binith, The Prophets of Israel 1, 291).

This being the meaning of the prophecy, it is evident that it was never literally fulfilled. But when we look at the deeper side of the Messianic hope which it sets forth—the heart-felt longing for a true Kingdom of God, 'the perception that that Kingdom can never be realized without a personal centre, a representative of God with man and man with God, who shall attain to true greatness through humility—we see that the purpose which was in the mind of God, when He moved the prophet to write, was fulfilled in the highest sense when He sent His Son into the world, and when Jesus Christ entered, by being born and that in a low condition, on that life of humiliation that led to His exaltation to the place of power, and will finally lead to 'all things being put under His feet.'

(ii.) The quotation in Mt.—It is not in verbal agreement with the LXX or with the Heb. text.

The most important differences from the latter are the following .-

the following .—

(a) Instead of The hope of the little for being' ('a town too small to be reckoned as a canton in Judah,' W. R. Smith, I.E.), Mt. has obsessed algorithm of the first in no wise least' (Rt). Turple (OT in the Asse, 190) translates the Heb. 'And art thou, Bethelem, little for being (: so little as not to be) among the thousands of Juda':—following Grotius (Opers, ii , Amst. 1679), who received the suggestion from Pesh., where the clause is rendered interrogatively. Others conjecture that a it's has dropped out of the Heb. text (of W. C. Allen in ExpT xii. [1901] 283. Cow. on M. p. 13). These suggested emendations are unnecessary. Micah as, a that the ideal king is to come out of Bethlebem, a town held in little estimation; and kit., in view of the dignity bestowed on the town by the birth of Christ, way. 'Thou are by no means the least.' They agree in spirit.

(3) The words of Micah, 'the that is to be ruler in Israel,' are expanded by Mt. into 'a ruler who shall be shepherd of my people Israel.' He thus Introduces into his quotation the words of the promise to David, 'And thou shall be shepherd of (Tgra)

of the promise to David, "And thou shalt be shepherd of ("gras) my people israel" (2.8.5% i 1 Ch 11"). But in Mic 64 of link! the words, 'And he shall stand and be shepherd of '(""), are a reministence of the promise to David. The Evangelist simply gives the promise at full length

To most Biblical scholars these differences will not seem of much account. The quotations in the NT are an important subject of study, but it is not now considered necessary, in the interests of revelation, to make out a verbal correspondence between these quotations and their OT equivalents.

It is well known that σοιμαίνων is a favourite figure with Greek writers to denote the kingly office. Plato is very fond of the comparison; see Rep. 343 A with the note in Adam's ed. (Camb. 1902). In a passage in the Nicom. Ethics (viii. 11), Aristotle refers to Homer's well-known words, τό γερ σαιό τους βανιλιωμένους, όττο ἀγαθός δεν ίτιμελύτει αύτου, το το παττωσιν, δοττρ νομός προβάτων 'όθιν καὶ 'Όμηρος τὸν 'Αγαμέμονοα ταμέμονοα ταμέμονοα ταμέμονοα ταμέμονοα του Adam' d'res. 'It seems to me desirable,' Dr. Adam observes, 'whenever possible, to quote classical Greek parallels to the figures of the NT, as well as parallels from the Hebrew: the use of figures already familiar to the Greeks cannot but have made the NT writings more acceptable to Greek readers.'

RULER.—This word is used in AV of the Gospels to tr. six different Greek words, and it is therefore necessary to classify the instances according to the word represented. (1) In Mk 13° and Lk 21¹² γγεμών (RV 'governor'), for which see art. Governor Nor. (2) In Mt 24° (47) 25³¹¹ (28), Lk 12¹² (44) κύριος, which means an owner of property, especially of slaves. It is hardly too much to say that the word κύριος suggests the word δοῦλος, 'slave.' The one word is correlative to the other. A κύριος is one who possesses slaves; a δοῦλος is one who belongs to and is bound to serve an owner. St. Paul, for example, regarded himself as standing in that relation to Jesus Christ. (3) In one passage, Jn 4°6 (AVm), βασιλικός, a general term, not infrequently found, to indicate any one in the service of a royal person. In this passage a man in the service of Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, is doubtless meant. The word appears to be used only of those in the service of Eastern potentates, and never in connexion with the Roman Emperor. (4) In Jn 2° the expression 'ruler of the feast' occurs. This is a tr. of the compound word δρχιτρίκλινος, lit. 'ruler of the dining-room' (with three dining-couches). His position at a dinner or banquet corresponded very much to that of a head-waiter at a modern public dinner. He had to see to the arrangement of the dining-couches, the laying of the table, the supply of food and drink; in short, to supervise everything connected with the comfort of the guests and the success of the banquet. (5) In the great bulk of the instances the word 'ruler' represents dρχων, a more or less vague term which generally answers to the English (city) magistrate. In the following passages it indicates a member or officer of the Sanhedrin (wh. see): Lk 2313. 35 2420, Jn 3. In Mt 918-23, if we compare the parallel narratives (Mk 5<sup>22</sup>, Lk 8<sup>41</sup>), it would appear to mean 'ruler of the synagogue,' as in Jn 12<sup>12</sup>, the context of which seems to settle the question. We are probably to understand this implication also in Lk 1818, Jn 722.49. (6) The title 'ruler of the synagogue' (dpy(ord)) is explicitly used in Mk 5<sup>22</sup> 25.

25. 25, Lk 8<sup>41. 26</sup> 13<sup>14</sup> (in all the passages except the last it is Jairus that is referred to). The name was applied in Palestine to the chief official of the synagogue as a place of worship. He had, for example, to maintain order in the building, and had to select those who were to take part in the service. Outside Palestine the title was frequently honorary, and carried no duties with it. A. SOUTER.

RUST (βρώσις [fr. βιβρώσκω, Lat. voro, 'to eat.' Properly the act of eating, and so 'corrosion'], Mt 6<sup>19t.</sup>; also used for 'food,' Jn 4<sup>23</sup> 6<sup>27.55</sup>).—The corroding influence liable to tarnish treasures or precious metals, which in Eastern countries were often stored in the ground (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>) or on inhabited premises (Lk 15<sup>8</sup>).

SABBATH (Heb. ngv, Gr. σάββατον).—1. Sabbath observance in the time of Christ.—Although the Mishna dates from c. 200 A.D., many of the provisions there recorded were current at a much earlier time; hence we may often use it to illustrate Jewish life in the time of Christ. Two of its treatises, Shabbath and Erubin, besides portions of others, deal with the observance of the Sabbath. Shabbath is concerned with regulations respecting what is lawful or unlawful on that day, and Erubin treats of modifications of the laws concerning travelling or moving anything from one place to another on the Sabbath.

In accordance with the Jewish custom (derived from the recurring expression 'the evening and the morning were the . . . day' in Gn 1, see Erubin, v. 5), the Sabbath was considered to begin at sunset on the Friday and to-end at sunset on the Saturday. The day preceding the Sabbath (or other feast) was called the day of the Preparation, παρασκενή (Lk 23<sup>54</sup>, Jn 19<sup>31, 42</sup>), on which all work must be finished, and nothing fresh attempted, unless there was time enough to complete it before sunset. For instance, a tailor must not go out carrying his needle near dusk on the Friday, lest through forgetfulness he should carry it on the Sabbath (Shabbath, i. 3); and meat, onions, or eggs must not be fried unless they can be quite done before the sunset at which the Sabbath begins (ib. i. 10). This explains the request of the Jews to Pilate that the bodies of Jesus and the two robbers should be taken down (Jn 1931), in accordance with Dt 2123. It was the custom of the Jews to take down the bodies of those who were condemned and crucified, and to bury them before the going down of the sun (Jos. B. J. IV. v. 2). It also explains the haste in the entombment of the Saviour. He did not die until the ninth hour, i.e. 3 p.m. (Mt 27.45-20), and Joseph of Arimathæa and his friends had to finish the temporary burial and to return home before sundown when the Sabbath began, leaving the completion of the embalming until the Sabbath was past (Lk 2356). They could prepare the spices after sunset on the Saturday, and be ready to go to the tomb very early on the following morning (Lk 241).

Just before sunset the Sabbath lamp was lighted; to neglect this was a transgression (Shabbath, 2). As no fire was allowed to be kindled, all meals had to be prepared before the Sabbath began. Three meals were customary (ib. xvi. 2), one on the Sabbath eve (Friday after sunset); another on the following morning, called  $\delta \rho \mu \sigma \tau \sigma \nu$  (as Lk 1138, see Edersheim, LT, ii. 205; but in later times the word was applied to 'dinner,' see Grimm-Thayer's Lex.); the third meal was towards evening, called  $\delta \epsilon \mu \nu \sigma \nu \nu (Jn 12^2)$ . To preserve the festive character of the day, the provisions were the best obtainable, and the best clothes were worn. Religious exercises were provided by the synagogue services, which were generally two in number, one on the Sabbath eve (Friday night) and the other on the following

The traditional rules of the Mishna, which at least partially existed in the time of Christ, introduced very embarrassing limitations to actions lawful on the Sabbath. The distance which might be travelled was limited to 2000 cubits. This rule was obtained as follows. According to Ex 16th, no man may go out of his place on the Sabbath. The extent of a 'place' was fixed by the Rabbis at the traditional distance of the Tabernacle from the camp of Israel in the wilderness. This was somewhat arbitrarily set down as the same distance as that by which the Ark of the Covenant preceded the people at the crossing of the Jordan (Jos 34). In this way arose the measurement called a 'Sabbath day's journey' (Ac 112, see Lumby, ad loc.). This limitation to the distance which might be travelled seems also to illustrate the words of Jesus in Mt 2420 'neither on the Sabbath day.' (For the way in which this traditional rule might be evaded, see Erubin, iv. and v.). The Mishna names thirty-nine aboth (אַבוֹת) or principal kinds of work unlawful on the Sabbath, and from these it deduces a number of others (called toledoth, איריא), which it pronounces likewise unlawful; and it proceeds by casuistry to what actions are permissible (see Shabbath; also Edersheim, LT, Append. xVII.). It must here suffice to refer to these rules only in so far as they illustrate passages in the Gospels.

2. Gospel incidents connected with the Sabbath.

—(a) Preaching in the Synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>16-20</sup> || Mk 6<sup>1-6</sup>).—Some regard these passages as referring to two distinct incidents, of which that recorded by Lk. is the earlier (so Edersheim); others think the incident in Mk. is the same as the former, but related out of its chronological order.

(b) Healing of the infirm man at the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5<sup>5-18</sup>).—It was lawful to carry a sick person on a bed, because the bed was only accessory to the carrying of the person (Shabbath, x. 5), but to carry the bed alone was unlawful, as it was then an ordinary burden. Thus those who carried the man to the Pool of Bethesda escaped censure (although it is difficult to see how they could do this, according to the Mishna, unless the man were in danger of death [see Yoma, viii. 6], but this may be a more stringent rule than was then in force); but when the healed man carried his bed, he was decidedly breaking the Law as interpreted by the Rabbis. Indeed, the healing of the man, unless he were in danger of death, would appear to be regarded as an infraction of the Sabbath law (Mk 31-6). Food or outward applications to the body might be used on the Sabbath only if they were in customary use in health; thus a man who had toothache might not rinse his teeth with vinegar (for that was not a common act in health), but he might wash them as he did every day (Shabbath, xiv. 4). If, however, there were danger of death, the Sabbath law did not apply.

(c) Healing of the man with an unclean spirit at Capernaum (Mk  $1^{21.57} \parallel Lk 4^{33.57}$ ).

place when the sun set and the Sabbath was past.

(e) Plucking the ears of corn (Mt 12<sup>1-8</sup> || Mk 2<sup>23-23</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1-5</sup>).—The action of the disciples was legitimate on week-days, according to Dt 2325; but on the Sabbath it was held unlawful, as involving the two actions of reaping and of threshing. The illustration given by our Lord in His reply (Mt 126) the Temple service in its relation to the Sabbathwas a difficulty which the Talmud discusses (see Edersheim, LT, ii. 59). In this case the Law ordained service which apparently broke its own requirements.

Ik. specifies this Sabbath as durapirpares (AV 'second Sabbath after the first'; RV omits in text, 'second-first' being placed in the margin as the reading of 'many ancient authorities'). The expression has been variously explained, and no aid is to be derived from the Talmud. The fifty days between Passover and Pentecoat were reckoned from the second day of the feast (Nisan 16), on which the wave-sheaf was offered (Lv 2311). Hence the Sabbath indicated has been taken as (i.) the first Sabbath after that second day of the feast (Scaliger, Ewald, de Wette, Edersheim, and others); or (ii.) the second Sabbath after the day (Nisan 16) which was the first in counting the time to Pentecoat (Delitzsch). Other explanations are (iii.) the first Sabbath of the second year of the Sabbatical series of seven years (Wieseler); and (iv.) the first Sabbath of the second month. The reading of the text is doubtful; durapierpares is omitted in MBL, 1, 33, 69 (see Plummer, 'St. Luke' (ICC), ad loc.; and Edersheim, LT).

(f) Healing of the man with a withered hand (Mt  $12^{9-14} \parallel \text{Mk} \ 3^{1-5}$ , Lk  $6^{9-11}$ ).—On the lawfulness (Mt 12<sup>9-14</sup> || Mk 3<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9-11</sup>).—On the lawfulness of healing on the Sabbath according to the Mishna, see (b) above. The legitimacy of lifting a sheep out of a pit on the Sabbath is discussed in the Talmud (Shabbath, 117a; see Edersheim).

(g) The defence which Jesus made against the charge of Sabbath-breaking (Jn 7<sup>22-24</sup>).—The Mishna (Shabbath, 19) expressly permits all ceremonies relating to circumcision and all preparation for it to be carried out on the Sabbath to be carried out on the Sabbath.

(h) Opening of the eyes of one born blind (Jn 91-16).—This involved the 'making of clay' on the Sabbath for application to the man's eyes, which would be a breach of the Sabbath law, in addition to the general question of the legitimacy of healing discussed in (b) above.

(i) Healing of the woman who had a spirit of infirmity (Lk 1310-17).—Regulations for the watering of cattle on the Sabbath are found in the Mishna (Erubin, ii.). The Talmud even allows water to be drawn and poured into the trough for the animals to drink.

(k) Healing of the man who had the dropsy (Lk  $14^{1-6}$ ).

(1) The supper at Bethany (Jn 121). - Jesus (1) The supper at Bettary (51 12).— Jesus reached Bethany on Friday, and the supper was the festive meal ($\delta cirror$) on the following Sabbath.

(m) The Sabbath between the Crucifizion and the Resurrection (Mt 28\delta Mk 16\dagger, Lk 23 25-25).

3. Teaching of Jesus respecting the Sabbath The observance of the Sabbath was one of the most easily apparent points upon which the teaching of our Lord differed from the punctilious legalism of His time. Mistaken patriotism had employed itself in elaborating the provisions of the Law and raising a fence around it (Aboth, i. 1). The teaching of Jesus was more akin to that of the ancient prophets than to that of the scribes. He preferred spiritual obedience to ceremonial literalism. The traditions of the scribes, which added burdens to the original Law, were regarded by Him as obscuring the underlying truth, and thus hindering true godliness (Mt 15<sup>3-20</sup> 23<sup>13-33</sup>). This is illustrated in His treatment of the Sabbath.

(1) The practice of Jesus upholds the general use of the institution.—It was 'his custom' to worship in the synagogue (Lk 416). He observed the usual requirements of the Law, except in cases where casuistical refinements had brought it into opposition to spiritual service. He seems to have intended this to be the attitude of His Jewish disciples (Mt 24<sup>20</sup> possibly supports this), and they certainly understood that this was His will, and they only dropped Jewish ceremonies as the Church outgrew them. The decision recorded in Ac 15<sup>24-29</sup> did not release Jews who became Christians from obedience to the Law. St. Paul himself kept the Law (Ac 2134-26).

(2) Christ asserted that the well-being of man was more important than the rigid observance of the Sabbath law as interpreted by the scribes.—This appears in the many instances of miracles of healing on the Sabbath, and the arguments with which He met criticism. He taught that the Sabbath law is to be subordinated to man's good (Mk 2<sup>27</sup>). This is in accordance with the reason for the Sabbath in Dt 5<sup>14</sup>. The Sabbath was intended to afford opportunity for religious worship and the culture of the soul, and we may regard Jesus as teaching that attention to the physical well-being of man on the Sabbath was legitimate in so far as it ministered to spiritual life. In this life spiritual exercises are to a certain degree dependent on bodily conditions, just as a sound body is a condition requisite for a sound mind. He taught that physical need supersedes the ceremonial Law, in His illustration from the life of David (Mt 12<sup>3</sup>, Mk 2<sup>24-29</sup>), and that God prefers mercy, exercised by man towards his fellows, and by Himself towards men, to sacrifices (Mt 12<sup>7</sup>).

David (Mt 12°, Mk 2° -), and that God prefers mercy, exercised by man towards his fellows, and by Himself towards men, to sacrifices (Mt 12°).

(3) Christ taught that the ceremonial observance of the Sabbath must give way before any higher and more spiritual motive.—Upon this principle the Temple service to which Christ refers (Mt 12°) was legitimate, and He did not find fault with it. In this way it is possible to explain the verse which in Codex Bezæ (D) is inserted after Lk 6° (which may possibly be an instance of a genuine saying of Christ which is not elsewhere recorded): On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, He said unto him, O man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law. That is, the breaking of the Sabbath in obedience to a higher motive is allowed, and the man is pronounced 'blessed' as being free from the trammels of Jewish tradition; but if his action lacks such motive, he is guilty of wilful disregard of the command.

4. The change of day from Saturday to Sunday in the Christian Church.—This change took place very early in the history of the Christian Church, but its date and reasons are somewhat indefinite. It scarcely requires any argument in justification, as (i) it preserves the spirit and purpose of the older practice; and (ii) the change occurred so early that it must have had the sanction of the immediate disciples of Christ. Probably the change arose owing to Sunday being the day of Christ's resurrection, and the day upon which He appeared to His disciples (Jn 20<sup>19, 28</sup>). The work of redemption, being the creation of the new world, was regarded as superseding in importance the work of physical creation: so the Ep. of Barnabas (15) speaks of Sunday as 'the beginning of another world,' and says: 'Wherefore also we keep the eighth day for rejoicing, in the which also Jesus rose from the dead, and, having been manifested, ascended into the heavens.' Evidences of the change are found in the NT in 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>, and Ac 20<sup>7</sup>. The name ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα for Sunday occurs in Rev 1<sup>10</sup>. In early Christian writings we find that the change had already taken place (Didache, 14; Ignatius, Magnes. 9; Pliny, Ep. x. 97; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 67). Eusebius (HE iii. 27) says that the Ebionites kept the Jewish Sabbath and also Sunday (see Lightfoot, Ignatius, ii. 129; Allen, Christian Institutions, p. 467). See also 'Lord's Day' in art. CALENDAR, vol. i. p. 251 ff.

SACKCLOTH.—A coarse, dark-coloured cloth, made of goat's or camel's hair (Gr. σάκκος, Heb. ρψ), used in ordinary life for sacking, sieves, strainers, and the like, but in the Gospels twice named in connexion with prevalent mourning customs (Mt 11<sup>21</sup>, Lk 10<sup>13</sup>), coupled with 'ashes' (wh. see) as an expression of penitential grief. The mourner wore the sackcloth garment, sometimes next the skin; and because of the garment's coarseness it became a constant reminder of his grief, its irritation being a sort of penance; sometimes it was worn as an outer garment as a visible expression of mourning. Closely related to this use of sackcloth was the use of it by ascetics and prophets (cf. later use by pilgrims). So John the Baptist wore a garment of camel's hair (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>8</sup>) as the expression of a certain austerity of life, and as a rebuke to the love of ease and luxury which characterized the age.

E. B. POLLARD.

SACRIFICE.—The saving significance of the death of Jesus Christ is of necessity the most important part of any article on the NT idea of sacrifice; for it is in the light of the sacrifice of Christ that all Christian sacrifice must be viewed.

It is now universally admitted that there is development and difference in the doctrinal standpoint of the NT writers. The old method of taking texts at haphazard from the various Gospels and Epistles, and setting them side by side, has been given up. The only satisfactory results are to be obtained by examining in turn the teaching of each writer; and this is the method which it is proposed to adopt in considering the subject of the sacrifice of Christ.

1. We begin with the teaching of our Lord as set forth in the Synoptic Gospels. Here there is nothing to be found in the nature of dogmatic assertion. The statements of our Lord as to the significance of His death are far from numerous, and in no case can they be looked at wholly by themselves. His whole life and teaching is their context. To any one carefully reading the Synoptic Gospels it becomes plain that it is only towards the end of His life on earth that the meaning of His death begins to occupy anything like a prominent place in the consciousness of Christ. There is not a single word regarding it in the Sermon on the Mount. There He is the second Moses, the new Lawgiver, the Revealer of the Father and His will, the Preacher of that new Kingdom whose laws should be written upon the hearts of men. Man is to be transformed inwardly by the renewal of his mind as leaven works in dough. All external religious practices are valueless except in so far as they manifest inward spiritual life. But it is already a Father of infinite tenderness and love, a Father only waiting to be gracious, whom He reveals, not a God full of wrath against sinful man, who must be propitiated and reconciled by the death of His Son before He can pardon. Forgiveness is already offered to all who will do the Father's will, to all who in love forgive the trespasses of their brethren. There is not one word to suggest that pardon and reconciliation are conditionally and the suggest that the su tional upon the sacrifice of Himself still to be offered. Here Christ is the Teacher of morality, with an authority greater than that of Moses, it is true; but He has not yet revealed Himself as the Way and the Truth and the Life. He is implicitly the Saviour in that His Person and work are alone the guarantee of the will of the Father, in that He embodies the attractive power of right-eousness, in that He is the source of healing grace to all afflicted ones who come with faith in Him; but He has not yet made surrender to Himself the only way of salvation. It is only in consequence of the opposition of His countrymen that He gives expression to the thought that He is Himself the Mediator of salvation, the only Revealer of God (Mt 11<sup>25-30</sup>). He realizes that it is offence at His humility and lowliness that it is onence at his humility and lowliness that keeps 'the wise and prudent' from hearing His word, and that it is love to Him that draws the poor and despised and sin-laden to the knowledge of the Father and the doing of His will. From that time the thought that He is the personal Mediator is frequently upon His lips (Mt 10<sup>40</sup> 12<sup>30</sup> 18<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>8</sup> etc.). It is opposition, too, that arouses in Him the consciousopposition, too, that arouses in Him the consciousness of being the Conqueror and Dethroner of Satan and all the powers of darkness (Mt 12<sup>20</sup>, Mk 3<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18.19</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>). As time goes on, this opposition develops into a bitter hatred which threatens His life. Selfishness and world-love array themselves against Him and His doctrine of world-renunciation. His power is too great to be overlooked. The world-spirit which dominates the bulk of His countrymen demands His death: and looked. The world-spirit which dominates the bulk of His countrymen demands His death; and even His most faithful followers are still enslaved by the world's toils—bound to earth by that material glory which, according to their selfish hopes, His Messiahship is to procure for them. While He lives, they will still buoy themselves up with false hopes: they will not understand the pure spirituality of His life and work—that His 'kingdom is not of this world.' The perception of these dangers, then—of that which from the outside threatened His life, of that which from within threatened the purity of His disciples' faith—became to Him a further revelation of the Father's will,—a revelation that His death was decreed, and that by it He should accomplish that for which His whole life had been but the preparation. But we must not expect many explicit statements on the subject. His followers were not yet fit to bear this truth. He was leaving this to be made plain to them by the Holy Spirit after His departure. Yet there are hints enough to lead us to a right understanding. 'I have a baptism to be baptized with,' He says on one occasion, 'and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!' (Lk how am I straitened till it be accomplished! (LK 12<sup>40,50</sup>). Manifestly the baptism was the baptism of death (cf. Mt 20<sup>22-28</sup>). In Mt 20<sup>28</sup> the reason for the necessity of His death is made plain—'to give his life a ransom for many.' The idea clearly is that men are enslaved, and that Christ gives His life to set them free; but the question still remains as to the nature of the bondage. 'From death, from the cuilt of sin and its nunishment.' says the from the guilt of sin and its punishment,' says the old theology, or, as it is sometimes expressed, 'from the wrath of God.' But there is not a single word upon the lips of Christ to justify this inter-pretation; and, as we shall see later, wherever in the NT the death of Christ is called a deliverance or a ransom, it is always a being purchased for God, a being delivered from the bondage of sin to serve God, that is thought of (Ro 6<sup>1-11</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>23</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>187</sup>, etc.). Moreover, the whole mission of our Lord and the whole meaning of His teaching was to deliver man from sin, to make him love, and long for, righteousness. It is impossible to imagine the Preacher of the Sermon on the Mount accounting it the great work of His life merely to deliver men from the consequences of their sins. any one believe that such a Moralist would be content with less than the deliverance from sin itself, the worst bondage of all to which man is subject? The context of the words, too (Mt 2017-29), must lead us to the same conclusion. There is no thought of death or even of guilt; but there is a thought of sin—of the sin of self-seeking, bound up as it was with the expectation of material glory in an earthly kingdom, which had just prompted the request of James and John, and of the selfish indignation of the other disciples who resented that request as an attempt to obtain an unfair advantage over them. That Christ should think of His coming death as certain to break for ever the cords of their worldliness, so that their love for Him might draw them away from the world unto righteousness and God, is perfectly conceivable. His cross, borne for love's sake as the last step in the path of perfect holiness which He was called to tread, must for all time crucify the world unto all who truly believed in Him, and them unto the world. To imagine that Christ in these words represents the Father as requiring a ransom at His hands before He can forgive man-kind, is to render His revelation of the Heavenly Father wholly inconsistent, is to give the lie to all His earlier words regarding the mercy and com-passion of God. The parable of the Prodigal Son in the light of this later presentation becomes an impossibility.

But let us proceed to the institution of the Lord's Supper, whence the most definite teaching as to the saving import of His death is to be drawn (Mt 26<sup>25-28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>25-24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19-20</sup>). Here He speaks of the surrender of His life as a thing advantageous to those who believe on Him, and St. Matthew adds the words-'for the remission of sins.' In the Sacrament thus instituted there is a twofold reference to the ritual of the Jews—(1) to the Passover, in the breaking of bread, the symbol of His broken body; (2) to the sacrifice of the covenant at Sinai, to which the giving of the cup with the words—'This is my blood of the new covenant' clearly alludes. Now the Passover signified exemption from the death of the first born which covered the Formations. which overtook the Egyptians. By the death of the lamb, which the Israelites appropriated to themselves by eating it, forgiveness and life were granted to them. But the Passover meant more than this. It brought them freedom not only from death, but also from bondage. It transformed a multitude of slaves into a free nation; it made them God's people; and sent them forth to serve Him. Its aim was the service of God. Our Lord, then, in the institution of the bread expressed the thought that His life given up to death is to be appropriated by His followers, that it may become their life, that it may set them free from the bondage of sin, and make them free servants and sons of God. This, too, must be noted, that it is not the fact of His death in itself that is significant. Had He thought of abiding in death, the whole meaning of the institution would have been taken away. The idea is that He surrenders His physical life for their sakes, that His spiritual life may dwell in and inspire them. In the closing chapters of St. John's Gospel this thought is most clearly expressed. As to the institution of the cup and its reference to the ratification of the Sinaitic covenant, the idea here is that of purification on entering into communion with God. In Ex 24 the sprinkling of the blood is the completion of the covenant already made: it symbolizes the need of purity in those who would obey God. Just as the baptism of John was valueless without change of mind, and could confer no forgiveness without the bringing forth of fruit worthy of repentance, so the sprinkling of the blood expressed the thought that purity and sin-cerity are necessary for all who would enter into the covenant relationship with God—that there can be no forgiveness except it be followed by sincere obedience. There is further present to the mind of our Lord the prophecy of Jeremiah regarding the New Covenant (or Testament) (Jer 3131-34) which should be an inward relationship, a covenant of regeneration—'I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it on their hearts.' In this covenant forgiveness was to be granted in consequence of an internal reformation (v.34). When the power of sin is broken and cast out, when the heart is dead to sin, God is just to pardon. Thus Christ called His blood about to be shed the blood of the New Covenant, in the sense that His death of love would inspire His followers with new life, would be to them in the first place a means of breaking the power of sin in their lives, of recreating them in the love of holiness, and only in consequence of that an assurance of pardon. The saving significance of the death of Christ, then, as it is set forth in the Lord's Supper, is this—to create in the believer a new power of spiritual life which should make sin hateful and so destroy its bondage, and to assure him of pardon by the guarantee of God's perfect love as revealed in the life and death of His Son. Christ's death is a sacrifice in that it removes for ever all doubt of God's forgiving love, and makes man's willing, loving obedience possible; in that it proves the absolute victory of good over evil; and, lifting His life beyond the limits of time and space, makes it a spiritual force communicable to all who accept Him as their Saviour.

2. When we turn to the Gospel of St. John, we find at once much to confirm the hints which the Synoptics have already given us. He wrote long after the departure of his Lord, and his experience and spiritual insight had made clear to him the meaning of many words that had been dark to the earlier writers. In the teaching of Jesus as St. John presents it, the thought of His death as setting free a spiritual life-giving principle emerges with much greater distinctness. He is the Bread of Life, the Living Water, that giveth life to men (Jn 6. 7<sup>37, 38</sup> 3<sup>10-15</sup>); He is the Resurrection and the Life (11<sup>25</sup>); but that this πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν may act with completed power, it must pass through death to larger life. Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, etc. (1224). 'It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come to you,' etc. (167). But the death itself has a value apart from the resurrection, for in it is revealed the triumph of holy love over the power of evil: it is the means whereby the Father glorifies the Son (12<sup>27, 28</sup> 13<sup>31, 32</sup>). All men are subject to this power save Jesus only; and the power of evil is broken through His meek submission to that death which the evil world forces upon Him (1281). The spirit of selfishness no longer rules the earth when its utmost wickedness is outdone by the obedience of perfect love even unto death. This power of overcoming the world and its spirit, He will communicate to those who follow Him. He will draw all men unto Him when He is lifted up (12<sup>32</sup>, cf. 16<sup>33</sup>). The cleansing power of His death, which in the Synoptics is symbolized by the institution of the Symportes is symbolized by the institution of the Supper, here finds its place in the washing of the disciples' feet (13<sup>2-17</sup>). They were already clean by the word which He had spoken unto them (15<sup>3</sup>): the death was but the completion, the final cleansing. According to St. John, then, the efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ lay in this—that it was an act of perfect chedical the will of it was an act of perfect obedience to the will of the righteous Father (1431) and of love to the world (1011 1513),—an example, therefore, and an inspiration; but also that it broke the power of sin, and, through the glorified life which of necessity followed it, became a means of spiritual energizing and sanctification to all believers. Once again there is no word to suggest the judicial theory of satisfaction.

3. Proceeding now to the Acts of the Apostles and to the Epistle of James, we are met by this remarkable fact, that in neither is there a single reference to the saving significance of the death of Christ. The accusation of having put the Holy One to death is brought home most forcibly in the speeches of Peter and Stephen (Ac 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>13-15</sup> 7<sup>52</sup>); but the Cross is not once spoken of as necessary to salvation. Repentance and conversion are alone mentioned as essential to forgiveness; and even when (Ac 822.) Philip overhears the Ethiopian reading the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and inter-prets it for him, though this chapter above all others seems to speak of Messiah's vicarious suffering and death, the all-important passage—'He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities,' etc. (v. b), is not even quoted. The natural conclusion is that the sacrificial significance of Christ's death, so far from having been a cardinal doctrine of the Church from the outset, had not yet dawned upon the disciples' minds. The glad facts of the Resurrection and Ascension, with all of spiritual quickening that these had brought them, were the all-important things to them. The them, were the all-important things to them. The death, except in so far as it was the passage to this larger life, was still obscure. They had no thought that Christ's sacrifice alone procured their pardon; for if they had, they could not possibly have kept silence regarding it. It was the Resurrection they preached, not the Cross (3<sup>13-18</sup> 10<sup>40, 41</sup>).

4. When we turn to the First Epistle of St. Peter, we find a marked advance upon this early preach-

we find a marked advance upon this early preaching. The Apostle explains the death of the Lord as an example, as a power of redemption, and as a deliverance from the sense of guilt. But throughout, this development is on the lines of Christ's own teaching. He does not speak a word to which a parallel could not be found in the Gospels. As the Lord told His disciples that the world would treat them as it treated Him, so St. Peter bids his readers follow in the steps of Christ; 'for this is thankworthy,' he says, 'if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully.'
'If, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God' (2<sup>19.30</sup>; cf. 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>). Here he inculcates a sacrifice on the part of believers similar to the sacrifice of Christ, and asserts its acceptance in God's sight. Of the redemptive power of Christ's sacrifice he speaks in 1<sup>18-25</sup> 2<sup>21, 24</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>; and in each of these it is redemption from sin's bondage that is thought of, with the end in view of service to God. Forgiveness is never thought of by itself as a consequence of the death of the Saviour, but always in connexion with sanctification, its end and aim. Believers are redeemed from their vain conversation by the blood of the Lamb, that they may purify their souls in obeying the truth. He bears their sins that they should live unto righteousness. He suffered for sins to bring them to God. Christ's death is only for those who let it act upon them. It is not a satisfaction of God that removes for ever the guilt of men by bearing their penalty: it is a moral deliverance: it is the impression which it creates upon the hearts of believers that is the delivering power—a power increased and fulfilled by the influence of the quickening Spirit (1<sup>23</sup>). In 4<sup>1</sup> St. Peter says, 'He that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin.' By following Christ's example men are to be delivered. Just as the suffering of a mother for her erring son becomes to that son redemption,—a force to make sin hateful in his eyes,—so the picture of Christ's suffering for us acts upon our hearts; and our imitation of Him, our suffering borne for righteousness' sake, breaks the will of the flesh, so that in St. Paul's words we die to sin and live to God. That Christ 'suffered once for sin, the just for the unjust' (3<sup>18</sup>), means simply that human sin brought Him to death, a death which love and righteousness compelled Him to bear for our sakes, and that the spectacle of that Divine transcendent love becomes to all believers a power of regeneration. But, further, it is also a pledge of Divine forgiveness. In 12 he mentions the 'sprinkling of the blood of Christ' along with obedience and sanctification of the Spirit, and by it he can mean only the remission of sins—the removal of the sense of guilt. Moreover, in 118-21 he speaks of the shedding of the blood of the Lamb as having for one object 'that your faith and hope may be in God.' What can this mean but that the love of the Father manifested in the death of His Son is to be to believers a means of breaking down the barrier which the sense of guilt had erected between them and God? It shows the Father ready to forgive and draw men unto Him (316). To get rid of sin and to be assured of pardon are the two essentials to salva-tion, which by His death Christ has procured, but He has procured them only for those who make Christ their example by suffering Him to write God's law upon their hearts—who appropriate God's life unto themselves.

5. It is in the writings of St. Paul, however, that the Cross of Christ attains its pre-eminent position. The whole gospel is to him the preaching of the Cross. 'Christ and him crucified' is the subject of all his teaching. Yet the emphasis he lays on it is never one-sided; for the death of Christ is but the consummation of His holy life of Divine love, and at the same time the prelude to the fuller life of glory beyond; both of which are essential to the meaning and value of the sacrifice. Nor is it that the mind of the Pharisaic Saul has led him to the contemplation of the Cross because of his close study of the OT ritual. It is his own personal experience of salvation that has caused him to understand—the marvellous change wrought in him by the Lord who appeared to him on the road to Damascus, and which he has expressed in the words, 'I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 220, cf. 614).

It certainly cannot be denied that in many passages the Apostle speaks of the death of Jesus as a means of deliverance from guilt, or of justification (Ro 325.25, 2 Co 521, Gal 313, Col 214 etc.); and in the Epistle to the Romans the first place is certainly given to this doctrine; but justification is always conditioned by faith; Christ is never represented as reconciling God to us, but contrariwise, God through Christ reconciles the world to Himself; even our faith in Christ is useless except Christ be risen (1 Co 1517), i.e. except He be in us a living power to lead to sanctification; and Christ is never said to die ἀντί, but always ὑπὸρ ἡμῶν; all of which facts are radically opposed to the theory of legal substitution. But, most important of all, guilt is no more than sin's consequence, and we cannot conceive of St. Paul, who above all others understood the meaning of sin's bondage, ascribing to Christ a mere redemption from sin's consequences and not from sin itself. The Apostle, however, speaks for himself. It was, he says, to deliver us from the evil world, it was that we should live together with Him, it was that men should not henceforth serve sin, that Christ died (Gal 1, 1 The whole with the property of Berney, is 510, Ro 66). The whole sixth chapter of Romans is on this theme-death to sin in Christ; and the seventh expresses the same thing in reference to the Law. The death of Christ is in his view, then, the direct cause of our death to sin, the breaking of sin's bondage, the putting off the sensuous selfish nature, the subjugation of its desires and appetites (Col 2<sup>11</sup>, Ro 3<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>2.4</sup> 7<sup>4</sup>); and this is the first step to the energizing of the life-giving Spirit of the glorified Lord within us. The passage in 2 Co 5<sup>16.15</sup> seems to express St. Paul's view with perfect clearness. Here we are told that it is the love of Christ that constraineth—that makes the death of the One a means of death to sin in all. It is as the Lord of humanity, the spiritual Head, spiritually related to all, that He dies; but He rose again and lives now, so that all who recognize the relationship are compelled, by the love which His perfect sacrifice excites, to break for ever with sin-sin which slew Him-and to live henceforth His life, the life of love and righteousness (cf. Ro 6<sup>10. 11</sup> 5<sup>19</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19. 20</sup>). It is not, however, the love of Christ only that is manifested by His death, but also that of the Father. 'God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Ro 5<sup>8, 10</sup>). The attitude of the fleshly mind is enmity against God (Ro 8'). Men are rebels towards Him. It is the sense of guilt that keeps them from Him. They cannot even believe it possible that God can pardon. It is this, then, that God carlot are represented in the God carlot of the Son, that God seeks to remove by the death of His Son. He gives an infinite pledge of His desire to forgive (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). Yet it still remains true that this pledge is not the actual justification of the sinner. He must accept God's offer; he must allow God's love to enter his heart; and that means death to sin, and makes him a new creature (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). Sanctification in principle is his from that moment. Thenceforth he lives spiritually—lives to God. In St. Paul, too, we find that aspect of Christ's death as a conquest of evil, an objective breaking of the power of sin, of which we have already spoken. He speaks of Christ coming in the likeness of sinful flesh and condemning sin in the flesh (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>). By this he means that Christ's death was the completion of a life of righteousness, and the final act of triumph over evil. He condemned sin in that He resisted it all His life, and in the end gave His life to that resistance. He submitted to the shameful death of the Cross, because to that the path of Divine righteousness led Him. It is for this research that there is no condemnation to this reason that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus (8'). In Him they spiritually delight in the law of God; by their love to Him and life in Him they, too, condemn sin; and 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Level has made them from from the law of sin and Jesus has made them free from the law of sin and death' (83). It is in the same manner that the Apostle represents the death of Christ as a 'propitiation through faith in his blood' (320). It is not a propitiation to God in the sense that it hides sin from His eyes, but in that Christ's sacrifice contains the power of breaking sin in all who accept Him by faith. God is just in forgiving the sin of the believer, because Christ's victory is the guarantee of ultimate victory to all who live in Him (cf. 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup> and 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>). Finally, the importance which St. Paul attaches to the resurrection of Christ enforces all that has been said. Without that fact his whole doctrine of the scheme of salvation would fall to pieces (1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>). It is not even the death of Christ, but only the risen Saviour that justifies (Ro 4<sup>23</sup>). It is in Christ—therefore in a Christ who lives—that justification is obtained (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Eph 17), and that sanctification is rendered possible (Ro 5<sup>10</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 14°, 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>. <sup>18</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). It is only because the believer is in living union with the holy Lord that God can justify him; for the union and communion are the guarantee that the work of sanctification begun will be carried to com-pletion, that the believer will be conformed in all things to his Redeemer. To have Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, to be rooted and grounded in love, to know the love of Christ, is to be filled with the fulness of God (Eph 3<sup>17-19</sup>). If the old view of legal satisfaction through the saccepted all this because the saccepted all Christ be accepted, all this becomes absurd.

6. We now come to the Epistle to the Hebrews, which, more than any other NT writing, relates the sacrifice of Christ to those of the Mosaic ritual. In this relation the author views the sacrifice of Jesus as the only one that can satisfy the needs of men, the one which alone requires no repetition. Fol-lowing the example of our Lord Himself in the institution of the Supper, the writer alludes to 546 SACRIFICE SACRIFICES the covenant sacrifice of Ex 24; and it is perfectly manifest from the way in which he speaks of it that he no more regards Christ's death as having created the New Covenant, than he does the sacrifice at Sinai as having procured the Old. In each case it is but a dedication, a ratification. He also refers to the offering of the great Day of Atonement, and with it he compares the sacrifice of Christ, calling it the great atonement by which the conscience is purged from dead works to serve the living God (914, cf. 1022). The mention of conscience, of course, suggests deliverance from the sense of guilt; but the immediately following words—'to serve the living God'-point to something far beyond mere escape from punishment, namely, to sanctification and obedience. Repeatedly he tells us that the sacrifices of the OT could not take away sin (10<sup>4–11</sup>); but if by taking away sin he means merely remission of guilt, his words become meaningless; for why should not obedience to a Divinely appointed ordinance have procured deliverance from guilt? Wherein they failed — what made their continual repetition necessary—was not that they could not give the sense of pardon, but that they could not give deliverance from the bondage of sin. It was in this that Christ's sacrifice was superior to all the Mosaic offerings, that it led to the service of the living God, that it put sin away (926), that it perfected them that are sanctified (1014), that it worked a change in the will of the believer, realizing the covenant which Jeremiah foresaw when God's law should be written on the mind and heart (101°). If holiness is the great essential to salvation (1214), and Christ's sacrifice procured no more than deliverance from guilt, then it did not procure salvation. The old ritual could not make the worshipper 'perfect as pertaining to con-science' (9º 10¹), because it only pointed to the need of purity: it could not create the power to attain that purity: there was no force in it to break the power of sin and set free the will to attain holiness and communion with God. We are accustomed to think of atonement as meaning that God is made willing to pardon; but to make Christ's sacrifice an atonement in this sense is to charge it with exactly the same weakness as belonged to the old ritual. Unquestionably Christ's death does, in the writer's view, guarantee forgiveness; but everywhere this forgiveness is regarded not as an end in itself, but only as the accompaniment of deliverance from the power of sin and the attainment of actual holiness. Indeed, there can be no certainty of pardon to the conscience until it is sensible of sanctification. God forgives not because Christ's death has been accepted in lieu of the punishment of men, but because the perfect holiness and love of Christ's life consummated by a death of shame are a pledge to God for the sanctification of all believers (109. 10). Christ's life and death established perfection as an actual fact in human history, broke the hitherto victorious power of evil; and by virtue of His resurrection and ascension that power of victory can be communicated to all who believe. It is in this sense that Christ interested force. that Christ intercedes for men in heaven, in that He is there as a guarantee of the perfectibility of human nature; and because of His pledge that in those who are His, sin is, and will be, conquered and cast out, God is just to forgive (cf. 725 81 912. 14. 24 1320 716 211 59).

7. We come, finally, to the Epistles of St. John, with which we shall conclude our consideration. Here, as was to be expected in the Beloved Disciple, the ultimate explanation of the sacrifice of Christ is love, the love of God (1 Jn 4<sup>10</sup>). There is nowhere a suspicion of the thought that a change is made in God by the offering of Jesus. It was as the manifestation of the Father's love that the Son was sent to suffer and die, and it is the influence of this love on us that creates love in us (419), and renders possible the keeping of God's commandments (5<sup>3</sup>). To be filled with love is to dwell in God (4<sup>12</sup>), to be born of God; and this ensures the victory that overcometh the world, and sin, which is the world-spirit (5<sup>4, 5</sup>). Selfishness and hatred are the signs of unregenerateness, because salvation means love to God, and consequently love to all mankind (4<sup>20.21</sup>). The death of Christ was the proof of His Divinity, because it showed perfect love. Once more, then, in St. John's view also it is a morally effective sacrifice, a power of renewal, not a substitution. God forgives all in whom sin is broken by the death of Christ, and who are being sanctified by His indwelling life. 'If we confess our sins,' he says, 'he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins' (19); for if we confess, it is plain that the holiness and love of Christ are acting upon us, so that we realize our sinfulness, and hate_it (cf. 17). The belief in Christ, as the whole Epistle shows, to which for-giveness and cleansing are granted, is no mere passive acceptance of deliverance from guilt, no mere belief in substitutionary merit, but the perception of the perfect holiness and love of Jesus Christ, so that sin is revealed in all its hideousness as rebellion against a Father of love, and the man is delivered from its power by his hatred of it, and longing to serve and love God and the brethren. It is the creation in man of a spirit akin to that which fired the life of Jesus, that is man's salvation; and it is the power in Christ's self-sacrifice to produce this and to perfect it, that is the pledge to God of man's sanctification, and that makes Him just in forgiving sin.

On the whole subject this must be added, that sacrifice is acceptable to God only in virtue of the spirit which lies behind it and which it expresses. It is never the outward value of the offering, never the amount of suffering it entails, that makes it precious in God's sight. The multiplicity and costliness of the sacrifices under the old ritual became hateful in His eyes whenever they became a mere attempt to bribe God's favour, and ceased to be the symbol of dependence and gratitude and obedience in man (cf. Is 1<sup>13, 14</sup>). Mercy toward man and love to God must always be the underlying, inspiring spirit of sacrifice, else even the minutest observance of ritual becomes worthless (Mt 23<sup>21-33</sup> 913 127). Christ's sacrifice, then, was acceptable to God, not because of the amount of suffering or the shame of the death,—the willingness to undergo so much was but the revelation of the greatness of the love,—but because it manifested perfect obedience, perfect holiness, perfect Divine love. It is in the same way—it is in Christ only—that the sacrifices of Christians are a sweet incense unto God. Men no longer need offer sacrifice for sin, but the Father still asks of the believer burntofferings of self-dedication (Ro 121), thank-offerings of grateful love. These are sacrifices which the love of God and the holiness for which the believer longs make it a joy to offer, because they are a revelation of the spirit which inspires his heart and works in his whole life—the spirit of Jesus Christ (Eph 5<sup>19-21</sup>, He 13<sup>15, 16</sup>, Ph 4<sup>17, 18</sup>, Mt 5<sup>23, 24</sup>). SACRIFICES (of OT in relation to Christ)—

SACRIFICES SACRIFICES 547

Sacrifice is an act of homage resulting in a degree of friendship with God. So long as the creature is not incorporated into the Creator, homage must always be due from man to God. Not even under the gospel have we outgrown the attitude expressed by sacrifice. We have passed away from animal sacrifices, but we have passed into the region of the sacrifice of Christ.

The sacrifices of the OT may be divided into ritual or prescribed, and the spontaneous, primitive usages of which instances occur both before and after the time of Moses, and among heathen as well as in the direct line of revelation (Gn 48 82 127, Ex 1812, Nu 231, Jg 1131, 1 S 79, 1 K 34 1822, 2 K 327). This distinction, however, is not dwelt upon in the NT, and is noteworthy only for the light which the older form of sacrifice throws upon the origin of the Mosaic sacrifices.

1. It is generally agreed that the sacred record represents sacrifice as a practice found already in existence among men, when the special revelation to Israel begins (Gn 428). A sense of dependence upon God, the need of His friendship, and the duty of rendering homage to Him by gifts, are the universal elements in sacrifice. It is not clear whether the friendship of God was taken to be assured, and the sacrificial meal only expressed it, or whether it was usually felt that there was some amends to be made, and the favour of God obtained, before His friendship could be enjoyed. But this matter was made clearer afterwards in the separate appointment of sin-offerings and peaceofferings in the Mosaic system. Meantime, we have here a universally implanted instinct in human nature that responds to the sovereignty of the Unseen in homage, thankfulness, confidence, or fear. Thus there was in the Mosaic law of sacrifice a language being prepared that would be intelligible to all men, and that was fitted to be the vehicle of a world-wide revelation of God.

a world-wide revelation of God.

It is of importance to notice that the usage of sacrifice is not only adopted and regulated in the OT, but is expressly commanded by prophets of God from Moses to Malachi (Ex 2318, Mal 17-14). This fact makes the use of sacrificial language in regard to the death of Christ to be of very much greater significance than if sacrifice had merely provided Christ and His Apostles with an illustration that lay to hand. And it is the more to be attended to because so often the sacrifices of the Mosaic law seem to be disparaged by the prophets. What they found fault with was that the people complied with the outward rules of God's worship, and did not lay to heart the high requirements of His law; for if these sacrifices meant that they were in friendly relations with God, this ought to have carried with a life and conduct consistent with so high a religious profession (Is 111-16, Jer 79). Since, therefore, sacrifice was undoubtedly of Divine institution, through the prophets, we may take it that whatever feelings of confidence toward God, or of the consciousness of guilt, were expressed by sacrifice, these were not only Divinely allowed and sanctioned, but were required by God on the part of His people towards Him. God on the part of His people towards Him.

2. The Mosaic ritual was inaugurated by a covenant (Ex 24). The sacrifices then offered are called burnt-offerings and peace-offerings (v.5). This latter term usually implies that the flesh of the sacrifices was eaten by the worshippers, and accordingly we read that the elders did 'eat and drink' in the presence of God (v.<sup>11</sup>). The covenant between Jacob and Laban (Gn 31<sup>54</sup>) was of a similar nature. Other covenants are between God and Abraham (Gn 15<sup>18</sup>), and in Jer 34<sup>18</sup>. It was a feature of these sacrifices that the animals sacrificed were divided, or the blood was divided, so that the parties to the covenant were assumed into a mystic unity of life. It is this particular sacrifice that is adduced in the Epistle to the Hebrews as signalizing the covenant between God and Israel (He 920). We have then these points to notice—(1) Everything in the subsequent history of the relations between God and Israel depended upon the fact that this covenant had been made. (2) It was a celebration of friendship between God and Israel, involving reverent obedience on their part, and securing to them the immense privilege of being welcome to draw indefinitely upon the aid of the Almighty. (3) The covenant was sealed by sacrifice, and more particularly by blood. This is insisted on in He 918 as giving an element of effective force to what was done. An oath is spoken of in somewhat similar tion of sin, nor was amends offered to God for sin. There was set forth a tie of friendship between God and His people, to begin with: of the existence of which friendship the whole events of the deliverance from Egypt were incontrovertible proof. At the same time the root-idea of a friendship subsisting between God and His people, and the obbe necessary, are not widely different. A usually friendly attitude on the part of God is the presupposition which underlies the offering of sacrifice to remove His displeasure because of particular sins, or to obtain His favour in any special enterprise (1 S 7°). The Creator has bestowed innumerable benefits upon His creatures, and is justly to be regarded by them as their Friend. If Israel limited this to themselves, and had a feeling of their proprietary interest in God, and His in them, there is in that feeling the germ of the doctrine of special providence, and of God's interest in the salvation of individuals; and all the confidence and intimacy of faithful affection therein contained may be appropriated to the believer's relationship with God. The ignorance of those who thought they alone had a portion in God does not invalidate the truth and beauty of the mutual affection which that very ignorance allowed them to realize.

3. Under the general shelter of this covenant 5. Under the general should be relationship the sacrifices of the Mosaic law were instituted (Gal 317.19). These consisted of two great classes Sin-offerings and Peace-offerings. There classes, Sin-offerings and Peace-offerings. There were sin-offerings for the nation (Lv 4<sup>13</sup>), for the priests (v.<sup>3</sup>), and for individuals (v.<sup>27</sup>): of which the first two were entirely consumed by fire, and the last were eaten only by the priests (v.<sup>28</sup>). Guilt-offerings, with whatever differences, belonged to the same general class; and with them may be reckoned the various offerings of purification. All these assumed their most characteristic form in connexion with the yearly Day of Atonement (Lv 16). Peace-offerings, on the other hand, may be taken to include the Passover, and all offerings of first-fruits and tithes and bloodless sacrifices. Thus Christ acknowledged the one class (sin-offering) when He bade the leper 'offer for thy cleansing what Moses commanded' (Mk 1<sup>44</sup>); and the other class (peace-offering) when He said, 'Leave there thy gift before the altar' (Mt 5<sup>24</sup>). As we have seen, the sacrifices offered at the making of the covenant were peace-offerings. These were acts of homage, and seals of a happy relationship between God and His people. Thus Solomon offering sacrifices received a gracious revelation that he might ask what he pleased (1 K 34, cf. Ps. 203). Sin-offerings took notice of human unworthiness to approach God. The offences at oned for by sacri-fice were sins of ignorance or inadvertence, and also misfortunes such as leprosy (Lv 1419). wilful disobedience there was no sacrifice (Nu 15<sup>20</sup>, 1 S 2<sup>25</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup>). Where there was a civil penalty, there was a sacrifice as well. That is to say, the fact of sin against God was taken into account (Lv 6<sup>5</sup>). The holiness of God was the dominating principle of the OT sacrifices for sin. Whatever was unsightly and degrading was to be abhorred : regard to propriety was enforced. By purity and seemliness of outward behaviour everything that tended to pollute the mind was atro-phied, and only what was helpful to the higher nature was allowed to influence the future. Constituted as human nature is, physical purity is not only a picture of godliness but a help to it. Thus the OT sacrifices outclassed the customs of the heathen by their blamelessness, and collaborated with the prophets and with God's providences to inculcate a high quality of conduct (Lv 2023, 1 Co 1020).

In the sacrifices which involved the death of animals, a sense of the sacredness of life was expressed by the reverent use of the blood (Lv 1711). Whatever was ratified by the taking of life obtained a sanctity thereby, and the putting away of human sin in making approach to God was so ratified, and the transaction made sacrosanct and secure. So far as we know, the animals sacrificed were put to death with no unnecessary pain; they did not expiate sin by suffering (contrast 1 K 18<sup>28</sup>): it was the deprivation of life they suffered, and it was the blood representing life which had mysterious significance. No one might eat the blood of sacrifices, or of any animal (contrast Ps 164 'drink-offerings of blood'). There was no festive garland placed on the victim, to make believe that it went willingly; but it must be without blemish, partly because only the best should be given to God, and partly, it may be, because the mystery of death is greater in the case of a perfectly healthful life.

In a sense the life of the animal went for the life of the worshipper. This was signified when the offerer laid his hand upon the victim's head (Lv 14). etc.). And the same substitution is suggested when a ransom (Mt 20<sup>26</sup>) was paid for the firstborn, although no animal substitute is mentioned (Ex 13<sup>13</sup>, cf. Nu 3<sup>47</sup>). But the vicariousness of the suffering of Christ is anticipated in the OT rather by the priestly feeling of responsibility expressed in Ezr 9<sup>6</sup> and Dn 9<sup>6</sup> (cf. also Is 53), than by anything explicit in the appointment of animal sacrifices. See § 5, below.

4. The prophecy of the New Covenant (Jer 3131) forms the principal link between the sacrifices of the OT and Christ's fulfilment of them. For in that passage the promise of a covenant between God and His people is connected with the forgiveroot and his people is connected with the forgive-ness of sin; and in the NT this conjunction is all-important. The NT is full of allusions to the law of sacrifice: 'Christ died for our sins' (1 Co 15°); 'Christ our passover is sacrificed for us' (5°); and the words 'ransom,' 'redemption,' 'propitiation,' 'cleanse,' 'purify,' 'sanctify,'— all occur fre-quently. But especially this reference is to be found in Christ's words at the institution of the Supper: 'For this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>); and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (chs. 8-10). In both these places attention is drawn to the covenant at Sinai. That was the OT sacrifice which especially corresponds in its position and efficacy to the position and efficacy of the death of Christ. By it there was solemnly established a relation of friendship between God and His people, once for all. So for all believers Christ's one sacrifice avails to make them the people and children of God. As the slaying of animals, according to a well-understood language, gave sacredness to the older covenant, so the dying of the Saviour gave greater sacredness to a greater covenant. But these descriptions of the efficacy of Christ's death also refer, as does the prophecy of Jeremiah, to the taking away of sin, to which there was no reference in the Old Covenant. Moreover, the words, 'Take, eat,' 'Drink ye all of it,' taken along with Jn 6<sup>28-27</sup>, introduce in sacrificial language the thought of fellowship with God. Conception in the other side of reconsiliation. secration is the other side of reconciliation (Ex 2915.33). 'We have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1 Jn 1'). So in Hebrews, from the words 'Let us come boldly' (418) to 'Let us draw near' (1022), the whole matter of our salva-tion is pictured under the form of access into the happy condition of being at peace with God (cf. Ro 51. 2), which was given under the Mosaic law by the covenant sacrifice, and continued by the sacrifices that were commanded; but for us this has been obtained once for all by Christ (He 10<sup>10</sup>), and remains ours as we abide in Him. It is understood that more had to be done in the fulness of time to that the dealer of the the threshold for that when they came out of Egypt. Now, they had a conscience of sin. This the Law had produced (Gal 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>). Accordingly, in the New Covenant provision was made for the remission of sin, for redemption, for propitiation (Ro 3<sup>24,25</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>10</sup>). Even while the Apostles are setting aside the sacrifices of the OT, they can express the work of Christ in no other than sacrificial language. There was something in the sacrifices for sin that could not be set aside. Thus, to meet the displeasure of God witnessed by an accusing conscience (Ro 2<sup>18</sup>) or by experience of the state of the world (1<sup>18</sup>), there was need of 'the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth to be a propitiation by his blood' (3<sup>94f.</sup>).

In the last chapter of Hebrews the fate of the sin-offering is made into a parable of the state of believers (He 1310-16). They do not rest in the enjoyment of God's favour in this world, as the Jewish worshippers rejoiced before God and feasted on their peace-offerings. This is not our rest. Here we have no continuing city. We are not of the world, as Christ is not of the world. But the sin-offering was burned 'in a clean place' without the camp (Lv 4<sup>12</sup>), and it was most holy. The place where it was consumed by fire was made a holy altar by it. So not in a worldly but in a spiritual manner those who go out unto Jesus without the camp have the highest, happiest enjoyment of the friendship of God; Christ Himself by His sacred and faithful life and death is their Temple, and there they 'offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually.'

5. Finally, the sacrifices of the OT do not cover in analogy the whole of the Saviour's work. Epistle to the Hebrews employs the priesthood of Christ, as well as His sacrifice, to set forth all He is to us. Moses and Joshua and Aaron and Melchizedek were imperfect anticipations of Christ, besides the sacrifices. In Is 53 the prophet is compelled to go beyond his sacrificial parable, and to say, 'By his stripes we are healed,' 'He shall see of the travail of his soul.' The lamb could give its life, but it needs a human representative of the Saviour to show His priestly sympathy and responsibility and sufferings. And this being so, no doubt the decided preference of Scripture and of Christian feeling for dwelling rather on the sacrifices than on the men who were anticipations of Christ, is because it is so supremely important that Christ should be seen to stand alone among men, no one near Him. A prophet may be a man of God, but Christ is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world,—that to God may be all the glory of man's redemption. See also the preceding article.

T. Gregory. SADDUCEES. - 1. Derivation and use of the name.—It seems impossible to attain certainty as to the derivation of the name 'Sadducees' (Σαδδου-אמיתי: מידיש). Formerly it was supposed to be connected with the adjective zaddik, 'righteous'; but this derivation is now generally given up, for philological and other reasons. No explanation can be given of the change from i to u; and the Sadducees were never regarded, either by themselves or by others, as specially righteous. In more recent others, as specially righteous. In more recent times the commonly accepted derivation is from the proper name Zadok; but neither is this without its difficulties. The doubling of the d is not well accounted for, and the problem as to which Zadok gave name to the party is one upon which there is considerable difference of opinion. Many hold that it was Zadok the priest, the contemporary of David and Solomon (2 S 8<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>26</sup> etc.), whose posterity officiated in the Temple down to the time of the Exile, and even formed the chief element of the post-exilic priesthood; but Kuenen says this conjecture is 'burdened with insurmountable difficulties' (Religion of Israel, iii. p. 122). A Jewish legend states that it was a disciple of Antigonus of Socho, named Zadok; but this is almost universally admitted to have no historical foundation. To solve the difficulty, Kuenen and Montet postulate a Zadok, 'perhaps a contemporary of Jonathan the a Zadok, 'perhaps a contemporary of Jonathan the Asmonæan' (Kuenen, l.c.), from whom the name may have been derived; but this, again, is purely hypothetical. Yet another suggestion is offered by A. E. Cowley (art. 'Sadducees' in the EBi), that the word may have been of Persian origin, connected with zindīk, which is used in a general sense for 'infidel.' The suggestion is interesting, but is put forward 'with great diffidence' by its author author.

But however uncertain the derivation may be, there is no dubiety about the application of the name 'Sadducees.' It is always used to designate the political party of the Jewish aristocratic priesthood from the time of the Maccabees to the final fall of the Jewish State. The chief authorities for its use are the NT, Josephus, and portions of the Mishna. It is important to note that, while any one, whatever his rank or station, could be a Pharisee, no one could be a Sadducee unless he belonged to one of the high-priestly or aristocratic families. It was not enough to be a priest. There was as great a distance between the higher and lower orders of the priesthood as between the aristocracy and the common people.

2. Outline of history.—From the beginning of the Grecian period of Jewish history, and even before that time, the whole conduct of political affairs was in the hands of the priestly aristocracy. Influenced by Hellenic culture, they sympathized to some extent with the policy of Antiochus Epiphanes which provoked the Maccabean rebellion; and although, as a consequence, they fell into the background during the earlier period of Hasmonæan rule, they recovered their position in the time of John Hyrcanus, under whom we find them, now known as Sadducees, in direct antagonism to the Pharisees, or party of the scribes. These for a short time acceded to power under Alexandra, but immediately afterwards the Sadducees came again to the front. In the Roman period their power was considerably diminished, in this respect that while they were able to retain the high offices for themselves, they were compelled to adopt the policy of the Pharisees, who had an overwhelming influence with the people. The high priests at the head of the Sanhedrin were Sadducees, but they were always in a minority; though essentially a political party, they had apparently no independent existence apart from Jerusalem and its Temple, and with the fall of the Jewish State they disappear

conservatism. They stood by the established position, held by the old points of view, and rejected everything that partook of the nature of novelty. They were priests, but priests of aristocratic family, and, as such, their duties were political as well as religious. Brought into close contact with their Gentile rulers, their political interests tended to thrust the religious into the background. Their aim was the welfare of the State as a secular institution, rather than the purity of the nation as a religious community. As sober, practical statesmen, representative of moderate Jewish opinion, they entertained no extravagant notions of the coming high position or brilliant future of Israel. And being themselves in comfortable circumstances, they were satisfied with the present, and felt no special need of a future rectification in the inter-ests of justice. The intellectual standpoint of the Sadducees seems to have been mainly negative. They were characterized chiefly by their denial of certain doctrines, and had no positive religious or theological system of their own. They stood in most things in direct opposition to the Pharisees, yet in an opposition which involved no fundamental principle, but into which they had been driven by their historical development.

The leading difference between the two parties is to be found in this, that the Sadducees held by the written Law, and rejected the Pharisaic tradi-tion. It is not, however, correct to say that the Sadducees acknowledged only the Pentateuch and rejected the rest of the OT. Kuenen even main-tains that they accepted the Oral Tradition, 'in so far as this was already established when they constituted themselves a party' (Rel. of Israel, iii. p. 144). Schürer says that they agreed with the Pharisees on some—perhaps many—particulars of the tradition, but 'only denied its obligation, and reserved the right of private opinion (HJP II. ii. 38). A number of minor differences are recorded in Rabbinical literature, of which full accounts will be found in Schürer, or in art. 'Sadducees' in Hastings' DB. The Sadducees are stated to have been more severe in penal legislation, adhering more strictly to the letter of the Law; and in questions of ritual, while admitting the principle of Levitical purification, they ridiculed the Pharisees for the absurdities of their traditional regulations. It has been maintained that the attitude of the Sadducees was largely determined by their desire to magnify the importance of the priesthood; but Schürer denies that any such motive can be traced. Probably they felt that the Pharisees vitiated the Law by their self-contradictions, and that only by an adherence to what was definite and authentic could the system be conserved according

The distinctive Sadducean doctrines are usually classed under three heads:—(1) They denied the resurrection, personal immortality, and retribution in a future life. So far they merely stood by the old Hebrew position, and from their materialistic and worldly point of view they felt no need of a future life to compensate for the inequalities of the present. In the same spirit they also renounced the entire Messianic hope, at least in the form then current. (2) They denied the existence of angels and spirits. This was scarcely the position of the OT, but their worldly common sense and general culture were bound to prejudice them against the fantastic products of the Pharisaic imagination in the wild extravagances of its angelology and demonology. (3) They denied foreordination and the supremacy of fate, and upheld the freedom of the human will, maintaining 'that good and evil are at the choice of man, who can do the one or the other at his discretion.' This is quite in keeping with the rest of their views. They felt no special need of a Divine Providence to order their life, and claimed that whatever they possessed was due to their own efforts. Generally it may be said that, after the manner of an aristocracy, they resented any attempt to impose on them an excess of legal strictness, and that 'advanced religious views were, on the one hand, superfluous to their worldly-mindedness, and, on the other, inadmissible by their higher culture and enlightenment' (HJP II. Yet the distance between them and the Pharisees was not so great as it might appear. Politically at least there was no insuperable bar-The two could sit together in the Sanhedrin, and could combine to make common cause against Jesus and to plan His destruction.

4. Relations to Jesus.—The Sadducees are not often mentioned by name in the Gospels, but it has to be remembered that, when mention is made of the chief priests, practically the same persons are referred to. Jesus did not come into the same constant antagonism with the Sadducees as with the Pharisees. For the most part they seem to have ignored Him, at least in the early part of His ministry. They joined with the Pharisees in asking Him to show them a sign from heaven (Mt 161), and shortly afterwards He warned His disciples to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, meaning probably, so far as the Sadducees were concerned, their utterly secular spirit. They resented His action in the cleansing of the Temple, and along with the scribes and elders they demanded His authority (Mk 11<sup>27t.</sup>), and from this time forward sought to destroy Him (v. 18). They thought to inveigle Him with the Roman power by asking whether it was lawful to give tribute to Casar (Lk 20<sup>22</sup>), and they attempted to discredit His teaching by presenting to Him the problem of the woman who had been married to seven brethren, and asking whose wife she should be in the resur-rection; but they only brought upon themselves discomfiture, and the reproof that they knew neither the Scriptures nor the power of God (Mt 2228|). They sat in the Sanhedrin which condemned Him, and with the others mocked Him upon the cross. Their opposition to Christian doctrine did not cease with the death of Jesus. There is no record of any Sadducee being admitted into the Christian Church, and before long they were merely a memory, hazy and indistinct.

JOSEPH MITCHELL. SADOC.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 114).

SAINTS.—The word 'saints' (ol άγιοι) occurs in the Gospels in Mt 27<sup>22</sup> only. Elsewhere in the NT it is never used of any but Christians (e.g. Ac 9<sup>13</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, Rev 11<sup>18</sup>). In the LXX (Dn 7<sup>22, 25, 27</sup> 8<sup>24</sup>) άγιοι is the equivalent of prop the holy ones' (i.e. angels). The root idea seems to be that of 'separation,' so that a 'saint' is one who is separated, consecrated, one who belongs to God. Its occurrence in Mt 2722 opens up the entire question of the meaning of the section. The incident is peculiar to the First Gospel, and occurs in the course of the narrative of our Lord's crucifixion and death. It is stated that at the moment of His death there was a supernatural earthquake which caused the tombs to be opened, and that immediately following His resurrection on the first day of the week many bodies (σώματα) of dead saints arose from their graves, and the persons (έξελθόντες, masc.) raised from the dead appeared in the city of Jerusalem to many. Several theories have been put forward to account for this remarkable statement.

1. It is said to be an interpolation. In reply, it is argued that the textual evidence of MSS and Versions is exactly the same for this passage as for the rest of the First Gospel. It is also urged that the incident seems plainly referred to as early as

Ignatius (Ep. ad Magn. 9).

2. It is said to be a legendary addition. It is thought that the graves were rent by an earthquake which actually occurred, and that then this statement was subsequently added as a spiritual explanation of the natural phenomenon. Bruce (EGT, in loc.) says: 'We seem here to be in the region of Christian legend.' Meyer takes the same general view. Those who oppose this view argue that textual considerations give no indication of a later addition, and that the writer of the First Gospel evidently believed in the incident, and wished his readers to do the same.

3. It is accounted for as a wrong explanation of incidents which were in themselves true. Farrar (Life of Christ) suggests that these ghostly visitants were the product of the imagination of those who were impressed by the events then taking place. To this it is replied that there is no trace of it in the narrative which now is, and apparently has been from the first, an integral part of this Gospel.

4. It is explained by saying that we have in the incident a striking testimony to the supernatural character and far-reaching power of our Lord's death; that not only did it affect nature (earthquake), the Jewish economy (the rent veil), and human life (centurion), but that its influence penetrated even to the unseen world. The narrative as it stands says that it was at the moment of His death that the tombs were opened, but that the actual rising of the saints did not take place until after the Lord's resurrection. He was 'the first-fruits of them that slept.' The fact that the inci-dent is found in one Gospel only is, it is urged, no necessary argument against its credibility. On this view, the question as to who were the saints would seem to be answered by the narrative itself. The tombs were near Jerusalem, and the fact of recognition implied in the appearance of the risen ones in the city suggests that the saints were some of those who, during their earthly life, had been led to faith in Jesus as the Messiah: godly people of the type of Anna, Simeon, Zacharias, and Elisabeth. Those who accept its genuineness fully recognize that the incident is mysterious, but they point out that the narrative as it stands is a calin, quiet statement, marked by reserve and by the absence of all legendary details. The upholders of the authenticity consider it full of spiritual meaning as to the supernatural character of our Lord's death in relation to the holy dead, holding that it was a manifestation of His power over death and the grave (1) by the resurrection of some from Hades, (2) by the clothing of them with a resurrection body, and (3) by permission to appear to those who knew them. On this theory the narrative is to be accepted as it is, and the exegesis of the passage strictly adhered to without endeavouring to draw conclusions which go beyond the brief record.

Serivener's edition of the AV gives as marginal references 'Gn 33<sup>18</sup>' or Jos 15<sup>23</sup>' or 1 S 9<sup>41</sup>'; other editions only the last passage (where the text has Shalim, or rether Shelling in Help power) the BV only or rather Shaalim, in Heb. chyp), the RV only the first (margin). It is to be noticed that the the first (margin). It is to be noticed that the former view is also that of Jerome, in his Liber interpret. Heb. Nom., when he writes: 'Salim pugilli sive volæ aut ortus aquarum, quod brevius græce dicitur βρύοντα'; pugilli and volæ = υνου. And before Jerome, Origen also explained in a similar way (on Jn 1039, p. 543 of the Berlin ed.):

Alvèr δφθαλμὸς βασάνου και Σαλήμ αὐτὸς ὁ ἀναβαίνων. In the Com. on 3<sup>28</sup> the new edition has in the text Σαλίμ, but thinks in the apparatus that Σαλήμ would perhaps be better. With the view of a plural agrees the fact that most MSS spell the ending -ειμ, and not -ημ, as in the Complutensian Polyglott; the latter spelling (Σαλήμ) would favour identification with 1/2. In the article ÆNON (vol. i. p. 35), most of the topographical identifications proposed for these places are discussed. We may add that AINώN Η ΕΓΓΥΣ ΤΟΥ ΣΑLΙ<Μ>is entered already on the mosaic map of Madeba on the left bank of the Jordan, and that the oldest and most explicit discussion of these sites is found in the pilgrimage of the so-called Silvia of Aquitania (or Étheria of Spain), about 385. A special monograph was published in 1903 by C. Mommert (Ænon und Bethania die Taufstätten des Täufers, nebst einer Abhandlung über Salem die Königsstadt des Melchisedech, Leipzig), on which see G. H. Gilbert, AJTh vii. 777; cf., further, Kλ. Μ. When Silvia had finished Jerusalem, she wished to go 'ad regionem Ausitidem' to see 'memoriam sancti Job.' It took her eight days (mansiones) from Jerusalem to Carneas: 'in quo itinere iens vidi super ripam Jordanis fluminis vallem pulchram satis et amœnam, abundantem vineis et arboribus, quoniam aquæ multæ ibi erant et optimæ satis. Nam in ea valle vicus erat grandis qui appellatur nunc Sedima. In eo ergo vico, qui est in media planitie positus, in medio loco est monticulus non satis grandis, sed factus sicut solent esse tumbre, sed grandis: ibi ergo in summo ecclesia est.' She inquires after the place, and receives the answer: 'hæc est civitas regis Melchisedech, quæ dicta est ante Salem, unde nunc corrupto sermone, Sedima appellatur ipse vicus.' For further details, amongst which is the statement that when people dig for foundations of new buildings, they find 'aliquoties et de argento et æramento modica frustella, the reader is referred to Silvia. She then remembered that in the Bible it was written: 'Baptizasse sanctum Johannem in Enon juxta Salim.' Therefore she inquired also after Ænon, and was shown the place in ducentis passibus . . . hortum pomarium valde amœnum, ubi ostendit nobis in medio fontem aquæ optimæ satis et puræ, qui a semel integrum fluvium dimittebat. Habebat autem ante se ipse fons lacum, ubi parebat fuisse operatum sanctum Johannem baptistam. Tunc dixit nobis ipse sanctus presbyter: In hodie hic hortus aliter non appellaest quod vos dicitis latine "hortus sancti Johannis" (for further particulars, see again the text). Going on for some time 'per vallem Jordanis super ripam fluminis ipsius,' the traveller danis super ripam fluminis ipsius,' the traveller sees after a little the town of the holy prophet Elia, 'id est Thesbe,' where his cave is, and also 'memoria sancti Gethæ,' of whom we read in the Books of the Judges (this is, of course, Jephthah, and not Cod. and not Gad, as has been suggested by Mommert).

This localization of the two places agrees exactly with the statement of Eusebius that Ænon was 8 miles south from Scythopolis (see vol. i. p. 35, and supply from the Berlin ed. p. 152, the reference to Procopius, who helps to fill up the lacuna in the Greek text with Σαλουμίαs, just as Jerome reads). But instead of seeking the place west of the Jordan at Sheikh Salim, Mommert now seeks Ænon east of it at 'Ain Djirm ('well of the leprosy'), at the foot of the hill 'Scharabil,' as he spells it, or 'Scharhabit' as it is spelt on the map of Fischer-Guthe, opposite to Tell Ridhgah, with which it has been identified hitherto.

We thus get the following identifications: (1) Tell Ridhgah, (2) Sharabil, (3) Salim east of Nåblus, (4) Wady Suleim near Anata, (5) 'Ain Karim, (6) Shilhim in the Negeb. A definite result has not been reached as yet; the identity of Ænon and Bethany (Jn 128 RV) is not improbable.

EB. NESTLE, SALMON.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>42</sup>, Lk 3<sup>32</sup> [RVm Sala]).

SALOME (Gr. Σαλώμη, possibly shortened from Heb. אלוכיואל Shēlómfēl, or the name = אלוכיואל Shālóm with Gr. termination).—1. The daughter of Herodias, mentioned (although not by name) in Mt  $14^{6-11}$ , Mk  $6^{22-28}$ . See HEROD in vol. i. p.  $722^{2}$ , and HERODIAS.

2. The mother of James and John, and wife of Zebedee (Mk 15% 16¹; cf. Jn 1925, Mt 2020 2756). In St. Matthew's account of the ambitious request of the sons of Zebedee, she is represented as coming with her sons and prostrating herself before Jesus. St. Mark does not mention her in this connexion. She was one of the women who followed our Lord and ministered to Him (ħκολούθουν αὐτῷ καὶ διηκόνουν αὐτῷ, Mk 15⁴), and was present at the Crucifixion. Along with Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James the Little, she came after the Sabbath was over, bringing fragrant oils (ἀρώματα, μύρα [Lk 23³6]) with which to anoint the body of Jesus. In the narrative of St. John there are mentioned as present at the Crucifixion (standing 'by the cross') 'his mother and his mother's sister, Mary of Clopas and Mary Magdalene.' It has been argued by some that three women only are here mentioned, and that the words 'Mary of Clopas' are explanatory of 'his mother's sister.' Most of the more recent commentators, however, notably Westcott ('St. John' in Speaker's NT Commentary, p. 275), hold that four women are meant, and that 'his mother's sister' is Salome. The following considerations seem fairly conclusive in favour of this latter view: (1) it is most unlikely that two sisters in a private family should bear the same name; (2) the parallelism ('his mother and his mother's sister; Mary of Clopas and Mary Magdalene') is characteristic of St. John; (3) 'the circuitous manner of describing his own mother is in character with St. John's manner of describing himself' (W. L. Bevan in Smith's DB, art. 'Salome'); (4) the Peshitta inserts 'and' before Mary of Clopas; (5) Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James the Little (who is certainly the same as Mary of Clopas), and Salome are mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark as present. The supposition that Salome='his mother's sister' harmonizes St. John's account with that of St. Matthew and St. Mark.* See also artt. Clopas, Mary.

SALT (&λαs).—Salt has been used from very early times to season and preserve food. In Palestine there was always a plentiful supply. The chief sources were (and are) the great rock salt cliffs known as the Khasm Usdum to the S.W. of the Dead Sea, and the marshes and pools around its shores. The cliffs are from 30 to 60 feet high, and stretch from 6 to 7 miles along the coast. In the \* Epiphanius ( $H\varpi r$ . lxxviii. 8) says that Salome was a daughter of Joseph, and Nicephorus Callistus (HE ii. 3) makes her Joseph's wife. These traditions, at any rate, indicate a belief in some connexion between Salome and the house of Joseph.

Bible this sea is sometimes called the 'salt sea' (Gn 14°, Dt 317). Three lbs. of its water are said to yield 1 lb. of solid salts.

In addition to its common use as a condiment or preservative of food, salt from early times had religious and social significance. As a fitting emblem of incorruptness, it was habitually offered along with the sacrifices (cf. Ly 2<sup>13</sup>). The preservative qualities of salt probably led to its being regarded as an essential element in the making of any enduring covenant (cf. Lv 2<sup>18</sup>, Nu 18<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ch 13°). As a sacrificial meal was usually celebrated in connexion with the making of a covenant, the salt of the meal naturally became the salt of the covenant. Among Eastern peoples, 'to eat of the sait' is a sign of enduring friendship and peace. The Arabs use the phrase 'there is sait between us' as expressing the fact that a bond of loyalty is in existence (cf. Ezr 414).

In the Gospels, salt is used for the most part metaphorically: (1) As an emblem of preservation from corruption, 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5"). The new spiritual life of the disciples was to purify and preserve the life of the world. Jesus solemnly warms them against the danger of losing the power which would enable them to fulfil this function, 'for if the salt have lost its savour ('become saltless,' Mk 9°), wherewith shall it be salted?' (Mt 51° | 1.k 14°). (2) There is also a sug gestion of its significance as a symbol of concord in the counsel, 'Have selt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another' (Mk 9<sup>30</sup>); for it is given in connexion with disputes or discussions as to which of the disciples should be the greatest (Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>) These disputings may also be regarded as one of the influences which render the salt saltless (draker). (3) As a symbol of incorruption in connexion with sacrifice. In Mk 9th the words πάσα θυσία άλι άλισθήσεται are omitted by Tischendorf, WH, and Nestle, following MSS MBLΔ. The words in the text thus adjusted (was yap wepl adjustificeras) have been translated 'for every one shall be salted for the fire' (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messich, n. 121), and 'for every one shall be salted with fire' (RV). The latter is almost certainly the right translation, since 'with fire' (wost) takes the place of 'with salt' (alt), as indicating the new spiritual element which was to be present in the sacrificial life of the disciples. In the old economy every sacrifice was to be salted with salt, and every sacrines was to be saired with sair, and would not be accepted without it; so in the new economy, the 'living sacrifice' of the Christian disciple will not be rightly prepared without the 'fire' which alone makes it acceptable. As the old sacrifices were prepared with salt, so the new marifices must be prepared with fire. The fire is most probably to be interpreted as the fire of judgment, as in the verse immediately preceding ('where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched,' Mk 9") There is a twofold pulgment quenched, Mk 9m by fire. It may be Divine and penal (Mk 90), or personal and corrective (cf. 'If we would judge ourselves we should not be judged,' I Co 111). The previous context interprets the personal, salu tary judgment by fire, by which the life is to be prepared as an acceptable sacrifice: 'If thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched '(cf. Mk. 9<sup>cs. 47</sup>) Swete (St. Mark, ad loc.) interprets the fire of the Christian life as the Holy Spirit, but fire as a symbol of the Spirit is not found in Mark. It may, however, be said that no self-judgment will be complete, or sufficient, unless it is carried

SALVATION .- The Gospel usage of this word is closely connected with that of OT.

The corresponding Heb, words are derivatives of the and 783. Of the former, the Niphal and Hiphil are found in the verb, of noun forms pur or pur, name, happen, shopen and some proper names, of which the most important is Twin's 'Jehovak is salvation.' The root 'Ni occurs in the Niphal and Hiphil of the verb, its only noun-derivative is the swed Arysesee, 7/26, Est 414. The fundamental meaning of perspective to be 'emlargement,' whence the notion of 'deliverance' naturally springs, the same amociation of ideas being observed in the use of 'compression,' 'confinement as figures of 'delivers. Bo far as the verbal terms of both roots are concerned, the idea of 'naving' is entirely negative, that in deliverance from some exil, no reflexion being passed upon favourable, positive consequences. A negative sense is very clear in such passages as In 126 6000, where the positive results of the saving act are named as something additional. From other words denoting deliverance 'to mave' is distinguished to the constant presence of two elements, that of a delivering agent, and that of an active interposition on his part for the removal of actual will or peril. For more 'present atous' or mere 'escape other words are used. 'healing 'also is expressed by different terms; of 6n 457 47%, Ex 117, Jer 446, Esk 530, Pa 63-413 Job 26. The exil from which salvation takes place varies in most cases it is the opperssion of farael by its essentes, sometimes, though not trequently, it appears in the acute form of individual of national death (Pa 600-20). While the noun forms frequently have the same negative meaning as the verb, they pass over the takes and prosperity. Thus Tigs' and Tigs's come to mean visitors of the Malace of the Nation of the Nation' has set of deliversome proper names, of which the most important is proba-political to the purely religious sphere we being named as the soft from which formed or the individual to saved (Ezk 372), Pa

The LXX renders the Heb verbs to report the norms by reasons and recepts. These words, however are likewise used to render Heb terms of a different shade of meaning and thus to a large extent the nice distinction of the original between "anisation" specifically so called and such more general terms is obscured. Thus report stands for $2.5 higher Pol and Hipbil, frequently in the Passive for meri 'emaje, also for forms of 278 and 778. On the other hand, rays never lears in the

The noun σωτηρία is used twice in the OT sense of deliverance from the enemies of Israel—Lk 162. 71; and 3 times in the more specifically religious sense—Lk 171 199, Jn 420. τὸ σωτήριον in Lk 2000 has the same distinctly religious associations; in 36 it stands in a quotation from Is 405, where the meaning is eschatological from the OT point of view.

1. First we examine the passages relating to the deliverance from diseases or demoniacal resease.

the deliverance from diseases or demoniacal posses-The question is whether the import of σώζειν here is exhausted by the notion of 'healing.' The Greek word has this meaning, being connected with  $\sigma\hat{\omega}s$  ( $\sigma dos$ ), 'whole,' 'sound,' therefore  $\sigma \hat{\omega} f e \nu =$  'to render whole, sound.' The AV accordingly renders in most of these cases 'to make whole' or 'be whole,' in two 'to heal' (Mk 5<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26</sup>), in one 'to do well' (Jn 11<sup>12</sup>), and only once 'to save' (Lk 18<sup>24</sup>). In one instance it offers 'to save' as a marginal reading for 'to make whole' (Mk 10<sup>26</sup>). RV everywhere follows the rendering of AV except that it makes the two passages where the latter has 'to heal' and the one passages where it has 'to save' uniform with the others; further, that it renders in Jn 11<sup>12</sup> 'to recover,' and that it offers in all passages except Mk 6<sup>56</sup> the marginal alternative 'to save.' It should be noticed that on other occasions the Evangelists use, and make Jesus use, different words, whose import is restricted to 'healing' in the medical sense, and that not only where the object is some disease or disability, but also with a personal object; so  $\theta \in \rho a \pi e \psi e v \neq 0$  (Mt  $4^{25}$ .  $^{24}$   $8^{7}$ .  $^{16}$   $9^{35}$   $10^{1.8}$   $12^{10}$ .  $^{15}$   $14^{14}$   $15^{20}$   $17^{16}$ .  $^{18}$   $19^{2}$   $21^{14}$ , Mk  $1^{34}$   $3^{2}$   $^{10}$ .  $^{15}$   $6^{8}$   $^{19}$ , Lk  $4^{23}$ .  $^{40}$   $5^{15}$   $6^{7}$ .  $^{18}$   $7^{21}$   $8^{2}$ .  $^{42}$   $9^{1.6}$   $10^{9}$   $13^{14}$   $14^{3}$ , Jn  $5^{10}$ ) and  $l a \pi \theta a v$  (Lk  $6^{19}$   $9^{2}$ .  $^{11}$ .  $^{42}$   $14^{4}$   $22^{61}$ , Jn  $4^{47}$ ). The questional states t = 0 t =tion is not, of course, whether the element of 'healing' as a connotated idea should be entirely eliminated from  $\sigma \omega_{fev}$ . Not only would this have been impossible to a Greek speaker or writer in cases where the saving act as a matter of fact consisted in or involved healing, but it is also ex-cluded by the observation that Jesus more than once referred to His saving work as the work of a physician, and in the instruction to His disciples spoke also of it as 'healing' (Mt 9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>1.8</sup> 13<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup>, Lk 4<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> 9<sup>1.2</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>). The only point at issue is whether the Evangelists are aware of a difference between statements where 'healing' is designated as such, and other statements where 'healing' is implied, but where for a certain purpose it is characterized as 'saving.

The data above cited show that this last question must be answered in the affirmative. In view of the fact that Aramaic lies behind the Greek form of the words of Jesus or the Evangelists, we shall also have to assume a clearly marked difference between the two sets of cases. The additional element which the use of σώξεν introduces into the situation is that of deliverance from the sphere or power of death. In Mk 34, Lk 69, while speaking of His healing work, our Lord contrasts σώξεν with ἀποκτείνεν, which implies that He regarded it as the opposite of 'killing,' i.e. as rescuing from death and restoring to life. According to Mk 522, the purpose of 'being the preposition marks the process as a transition from death to life. It is true that in some instances the disease or infirmity from which Jesus saves is not fatal in itself, e.g. the withered hand (Mk 34), the issue of blood (5<sup>28</sup>), certainly some of the diseases of 6<sup>36</sup>, blindness (10<sup>82</sup>). Still even here the act of saving is viewed not from a medical point of view, but from the religious point of view, according to which all disease and infirmity lie on the side of death, so that it belongs to the function of one who delivers from death to work deliverance from these consequences of sin

This is further confirmed by the general inter-pretation Jesus puts upon His healing miracles as prophecies and pledges of the approaching Kingdom, in which all sin and death shall be done away with. With regard to the casting out of demons, the correctness of this view is vouched for by the explicit statement (Mt 12<sup>28</sup> = Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). But it applies equally well to the other miracles of healing. Jesus did not look upon these as works of philanthropy merely, or as signs authenticating His mission primarily. While the latter was one of the purposes for which they were intended-and Gospel—in the Synoptics, where Jesus' teaching is centred in the Kingdom-idea, the miracles are before all else signs of the actual approach of the Kingdom,—proofs that the saving power of God, which calls the Kingdom into being, is already in motion, and therefore so many instances of σώζευ. Jesus' saving power is simply the Kingdom-power applied to the individual under the influence of sin and death. Thus only can we naturally explain the fact that, where 'salvation' has a direct religious reference, both in our Lord's own and in the later Apostolic teaching, the close connexion between it and the ideas of death and life is unmistakable. If this religious usage is at all dependent on the physical aspect of our Lord's saving activity, it can be only through the common element of victory over sin and death. Jesus Himself has sufficiently indicated the connexion between the two, both in the Synoptical sayings and in the Johannine discourses. In the former the physical evils, which the saving Kingdom-power removes, have a moral and spiritual background. Hence Jesus makes such physical salva-tion the occasion for suggesting and working the profounder change by which the bonds of sin are loosed, and the rule of God set up in the inner life of man. The external and the internal are sigof man. The external and the internal are significantly placed side by side as co-ordinated halves of an identical work (Mk 29). And in the Fourth Gospel we are explicitly told that the physical acts are intended to point to corresponding spiritual transactions; the healing of the blind, the raising of the dead, are symbolic of Jesus' saving work in the spiritual sphere (5<sup>14</sup> <sup>19-29</sup> 9<sup>3</sup> <sup>39</sup> 12<sup>25</sup> <sup>25</sup>). On three occasions our Lord has brought out the spiritual significance of the physical salvation by calling significance of the physical salvation by calling special attention to its dependence on the exercise of faith: the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5<sup>24</sup>=Mt 9<sup>22</sup>=Lk 8<sup>42</sup>), the blind man near Jericho (Mk 10<sup>82</sup>=Lk 18<sup>42</sup>), one of the lepers (Lk 17<sup>19</sup>). The words 'thy faith has saved thee' are on these occasions the same as were used in such a case of purely spiritual salvation as is recorded Lk 750. They were intended as a suggestion that faith, which had yielded such results in the physical sphere, could be made equally further than the order of the physical sphere. fruitful in the sphere of spiritual salvation. Thus the external and internal are linked together by the common factor of faith.

ing,' i.e. as rescuing from death and restoring to life. According to Mk 5<sup>23</sup>, the purpose of 'being saved' is 'to live.' In Lk 7<sup>3</sup> διασώζειν, the use of of its natural use where deliverance from evil other than disease or demon-possession is referred to, for here everywhere the evil is that of physical death (Mt 8<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>25</sup> 27<sup>40</sup> 42. 49, Mk 8<sup>25</sup> 15<sup>20</sup> . 31, Lk 9<sup>24</sup> 56 23<sup>35</sup> . 37. 39, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>).

2. In connexion with the directly religious use

2. In connexion with the directly religious use in the Gospels several questions emerge. (1) Is the saving act, when belonging to the spiritual sphere, still viewed as a translation from death into life, and what is the meaning of death and life as related to salvation in this sphere? (2) Is the deliverance conceived eschatologically, as something to be experienced in the Last Day, or is it treated as an experience already attainable in this present life? (3) Is the conception negative or positive, or both negative and positive, i.e. does it express merely the removal of spiritual evil, or also the bestowal of positive spiritual blessings, especially the gift of life in a positive, pregnant sense?

(1) The answer to the first question is that spiritual salvation still revolves around the contrast between life and death, and that in a twofold sense. Both as subjective and as objective states, death and life come under consideration here. In other words: Jesus saves from spiritual death as a condition of the soul, and He saves from eternal death as a punishment awaiting the sinner. As the object of His saving activity, our Lord names τὸ ἀπολωλός 'that which has become lost and now is lost' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>24</sup> 18<sup>12-14</sup>, Lk 15<sup>4</sup> · 6 · 8 · 2<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>10</sup>). From the figures used it appears that the Gr. dπόλλυσθαι has in this connexion the sense 'miss,' 'be missing,' not primarily the sense 'destroy,' 'be destroyed.' The 'lost' are like sheep gone astray upon the mountains, like the coin slipped out of the hand of its owner, like the prodigal who has left the father's home. A lost condition means estrangement from God, a missing of all the religious and moral relations man is designed to sustain towards his Maker. But this lost condition is further identified by Jesus with spiritual death, for of the prodigal the father declares: 'This thy brother was dead and is alive again, and was lost and is found' (Lk 15<sup>24</sup> <sup>22</sup>). Elsewhere also the state of sin is described as a state of death (Mt 8<sup>22</sup>, Lk 20<sup>38</sup>). Salvation of 'the lost,' therefore, is salvation from spiritual death. As such it includes both forgiveness of sin and moral-religious renewal. To the woman who had anointed Him Jesus said: 'Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace,' and this obviously repeats in another form the preceding statement, 'Thy sins are forgiven' (Lk 7<sup>48, 50</sup>). In the case of Zacchæus also assurance of pardon is undoubtedly implied when Jesus declares 'salva-tion' to have come to his house (19°). Here, how-ever, the salvation manifests itself also in the moral transformation of the publican, issuing directly into repentance and good works. prodigal is pardoned and restored to the privileges of sonship. But salvation is not confined to deliverance from this subjective spiritual death, just as the conception of being 'lost' is not exhausted by estrangement from God.  $d\pi \delta \lambda \lambda u \sigma \theta a \iota$  is used in a retributive sense in connexion with the judgment of God to which the sinner is subject; it involves exposure to objective death as a result of con-demnation. With reference to this the two senses of the verb, 'to be missing' and 'to be destroyed,' are used side by side. From the point of view of are used side by side. From the point of view of man the judgment may bring a 'losing' or a 'finding,' 'keeping' of the soul or life (Mt  $10^{39}$   $16^{25}$ , Mk  $8^{35}$ , Lk  $9^{24-25}$   $17^{28}$ , Jn  $12^{29}$ ). From the point of view of God as Judge it may bring 'destruction.' This is the  $d\pi \omega \lambda \epsilon u a$ , which is spoken of in Mt  $5^{39}$   $7^{13}$   $10^{28}$   $18^{14}$ , Lk  $13^{3.5}$ , Jn  $3^{15-16}$   $6^{39}$   $10^{28}$   $17^{12}$   $18^{9}$ . The two 18<sup>10-14</sup>, where first the sinning one is compared to a sheep gone astray and to be sought, and then, to give the motive for this search after the subjectively lost, Jesus adds: 'Even so it is not the will of your Father who is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish'  $(4\pi\delta\lambda\eta\tau\alpha\iota)$ ; that which is already lost in the one sense must be diligently sought, lest it should be lost in the deeper, absolute sense. And the deliverance from this final  $4\pi\omega\lambda\epsilon\iota a$ , as well as the deliverance from the other lost condition, is  $\sigma\omega\xi\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$ ,  $\sigma\omega\tau\eta\rho\iota a$ . Thus in Mk  $16^{16}$  'to be saved' is the opposite of 'to be condemned'; in Jn  $3^{16.17}$  of 'to be judged' and 'to perish,' in  $10^{9.10}$  of 'to be destroyed,' in  $12^{27}$  of 'to be judged.' This  $4\pi\omega\lambda\epsilon\iota a$ , however, not less than the other 'being lost,' is equivalent to death. It is a losing of the life  $(\psi\nu\chi\eta, \text{Mt }10^{39}16^{25}, \text{Mk }8^{35}, \text{Lk}$  alosing of the life  $(\psi\nu\chi\eta, \text{Mt }10^{39}16^{25}, \text{Mk }8^{35}, \text{Lk}$  alosing of the life ( $\psi\nu\chi\eta, \text{Mt }10^{39}16^{25}, \text{Mk }8^{35}, \text{Lk}$  alosing of the life ( $\psi\nu\chi\eta, \text{Mt }10^{39}16^{25}, \text{Mk }8^{35}, \text{Lk}$  alosing of the life ( $\psi\nu\chi\eta, \text{Mt }10^{39}16^{25}, \text{Mk }8^{35}, \text{Lk}$  alie' (Jn  $3^{16}10^{28}$ ), or 'to be raised up at the last day' ( $6^{29}$ ). Thus it appears that salvation in its specific religious sense is still viewed throughout as a deliverance from death and an introduction into the sphere of life.

(2) The second question was whether 'salvation' is conceived eschatologically or as something experienced already in this present life. It has been answered in principle by the above, for present salvation coincides with deliverance from subjective spiritual death; eschatological salvation coincides with deliverance from objective death in the Judgment. In a number of the passages already considered the reference to the present is very plain. To the woman who anointed Him Jesus addressed the words, 'Thy faith has saved thee.' Of Zaccheus He declared: 'To-day is salvation come to this house'; and in the following statement—'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost,'—the 'saving' must belong to the same time as the 'seeking,' i.e. to the present time of our Lord's earthly ministry. In Jn 12" the saving of the world for which Jesus has come is a present thing as distinct from the judging of the world for which He has not come, but which is reserved for the future. In Mt 121 the sins of the people being the evil from which Jesus saves, the salvation is viewed as a present one. In other passages the eschatological reference is equally obvious. 'He that endures to the end shall be saved' (Mt 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>13</sup>). Mt 16<sup>23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>35</sup>, Lk 9<sup>24</sup> speak of the finding or saving of life in the future Judgment as conditioned by the willingness to sacrifice one's life here. This is clear from the context (v. 38 in Mk., v. 27 in  $Mt. = v.^{26} \text{ in } Lk).$

The point of the saying is not, as often interpreted, that for one kind of life, physical life, given up, another kind of life, spiritual life, will be received in return; in which case the future tenses might be purely logical, and no eschatological reference implied. The meaning is that for life, in its general sense, sacrificed by accepting physical death, life in the same general sense will be received in reward through the escape from death, when Jesus comes to judge and to render every man according to his deeds. As Zahn observes, the distinction between two kinds of 'life' or 'soul' is scarcely in harmony with the Hebrew point of view, according to which the 'life' or the 'soul' is frequently called 'the only one' (Com. on Matthew, in loco).

of God to which the sinner is subject; it involves exposure to objective death as a result of condemnation. With reference to this the two senses of the verb, 'to be missing' and 'to be destroyed,' are used side by side. From the point of view of man the judgment may bring a 'losing' or a 'finding,' 'keeping' of the soul or life (Mt 10° 162°, Mk 8°, Lk 9²4 2° 173°, Jn 12°3). From the point of view of God as Judge it may bring 'destruction.' This is the  $4\pi\omega \lambda \epsilon \epsilon a$ , which is spoken of in Mt  $5^{30}$   $7^{13}$   $10^{28}$  (to enter the Kingdom' = 'to inherit eternal life,' and the qualification of life as eternal, 1814, Lk  $13^{3.5}$ , Jn  $3^{15.16}$   $6^{30}$   $10^{28}$   $17^{12}$   $18^9$ . The two aspects of  $4\pi\delta \lambda \lambda \nu \sigma \theta a \iota$  the subjective spiritual 'being lost' and the objective retributive 'being lost' and the objective retributive

these days had been shortened, no flesh would have been saved, is best understood as follows: The temptation in these last times will be so severe, that, if their duration had not been kept within certain limits, all men, even the elect, would have fallen away, and so no flesh would have been ultimately saved in the Day of Judgment.

This interpretation seems to be required by the fact that the shortening of the days is for the sake of the elect. The mere preservation of physical life could have no special bearing upon the destiny of the elect since, even when fulled in the body, they would be sure to inherit the Kingdom, the whole representation concerning the possibility of none being saved, and the elect falling away and the shortening of the days, is, of course, conceived from the human point of view (cf Zahn, Coss. on Mathew, in loca).

In the remainder of the passages there are no means of determining whether "salvation" be future or present. For Mt 1811 (TR only) the reference to the present is supported by Lk 1010. In Lk 812 "that they may not believe and be saved," the eschatological sense would be quite plausible, but the other view is slightly favoured by the general import of the parables dealing with the present invisible supect of the Kingdom as both present and future creates a presumption in favour of the view that our Lord regarded salvation as both a present and an eschatological experience. The form out believed, "those who are being saved," in Lk 1322, probably reflects the two-sidedness of the process, as belonging to both present and future, and therefore unfinished in this life. In the case of the Johannine sayings (Jn 316-17 425 534 102) we shall have to assume, in harmony with the generalization of the conception of 'life,' 'eternal life,' in the discourses of this Gospel which makes out of it a conception indifferent to the distinction between present and future—that the same will be true of the synonymous conception of salvation. The future in 102 is purely logical in its force.

the synonymous conception of salvation. The future in 10° is purely logical in its force.

(3) The third question concerned what may be gathered from the Gospels in regard to the positive or negative context of the idea of religious salvation. The negative aspect—escape from death—stands in the foreground in Mt 24°, Mk 13°: if the days had not been shortened, not even the elect would have escaped the fate of death in the Judgment; similarly in Mt 16°, Mk 8°, Lk 9°: he who will sacrifice his life here shall escape the loss of life in the Judgment. Probably Mt 10° and 24° should be interpreted on the same principle: the enduring now will save from greater calamity in the Last Day. On the other hand, in Mt 19°, Mk 10°, Lk 18°, where 'salvation' is equivalent to entrance of the Kingdom and inheriting of eternal life, the emphasis rests on the positive side. In the Johannine passages the positive content of the idea is very marked. According to Jn 3° 16.1°, to have eternal life' and 'to be saved' are synonymous. In Jn 5° also the preceding context revolves around the idea of life (vv. 1° 30), and in the sequel the same idea is again brought forward (v. 3°). Again, in 10° 'salvation' and 'life' appear in close conjunction; 12° receives its interpretation from 3°. The same difference as is observable with reference to eschatological salvation may be observed where present salvation is spoken of. Sometimes the conception is negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°), sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°), sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°), sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°), sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°); sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°); sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°); sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°); sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°). Lk 7°); sometimes positive as well as negative ('lit 1°).

In the saying of Lk 19th Jesus declares 'saving' to be the highest category under which His Messianic activity is to be subsumed. He came to save,

i.c. His entrance into the world was for this specific purpose (cf. Mk 10st). The connexion between Him and salvation consists not merely in this, that as a preacher of the gospel He proclaims it. Everywhere the supposition is that salvation is in some way bound to His Person. For the Johannine discourses this needs no proof. But it is no less true for the Synoptics. Because He lodged with Zacchsens, salvation entered the latter's house. The rich young man was not saved, because he The rich young man was not saved, because he refused to follow Jesus. The saving acts in the physical sphere are suspended on faith, and this faith involves trust in Jesus,—in Jesus, to be sure, as the instrument of God, but none the less so that on Jesus' Person together with God the act of faith terminates. It is psychologically inconceivable that in those who were helped by the miracles of Jesus, faith should not have assumed the form of personal trust in Him. Faith in God and faith in Jesus here inevitably coalesce. On the occasion of the storm, Jesus rebukes the dusciples for their lack of confidence in His presence with them as a guarantee of absolute safety (Mt 8"). Similarly Peter, when walking upon the water, calls upon Jesus to perform the saving act. From the close connexion in which these transactions stand to the specific religious salvation, it may be safely inferred that in the latter also Jesus occupies a necessary place. This is confirmed by Lk 720, where the woman's faith, which is declared to have saved her, consists in the attitude of trust she had assumed towards Jesus; the love shown Lord is here the result of the forgiveness of sins (v.47), and inasmuch as this love terminated on Jesus, the faith which conditioned the forgiveness must likewise have had Him for its object. Similarly in the discourse at Cassarea Philippi, 'salvation' in the Last Day is made dependent on following of Jesus and sacrifice of life for Jesus' sake and the gospel's sake, and the corresponding acknowledgment by Jesus in the Judgment (Mk 8<sup>M, M, M</sup> | Mt. and Lk.).

ment by Jesus in this Judgment (Mk 834. 20. 20 ml) Mt. and Lk.).

It is not true, as is being frequently asserted of late, that in the gospal preached by Jesus there is no place for His own Ferson, it being merely a gospel about God. Though not frequently in so many words, set in acts we find our Lord seeking to cultivate a relationship of faith between the disciple and Himself and, in Himself with God. If only once in the Synoptics we read explicitly of faith in Jesus (Mt 1-2), and that in a passage where the authentority of the words acts is doubtful, this is contributed as the object of faith (Mk 11-2). Jesus, concasions of being the Hessiath, the Judge at the Last Day, who would finally dispose of the destiny of all manhind, could not help as ribing a central noterological position to Himself. Such a figure as He was in His own view could not be kept outside of the saving transaction, which in a certain sense forestalls the Last Jougnest. The absence of more direct affirmations of this principle is simply the result of Jesus method of not directly proclaiming at first His Messianle dign'ts but rather allowing it to be gradually inferred from the impression made by His Ferson and the witness of His works. On the basis of our present Gospels, again from critical reconstructions of the teaching of Jesus, no other view is possible than that our Lord represented substances and the witness of the words. On the basis of our present Gospels, again from critical reconstructions of the teaching of Jesus, no other view is possible than that our Lord represented substances on the one of the describe not God a attitude towards miners in the abstract, but the historic appreach of God to lost men in the appearance of His Son Jesus. It was the attitude of Jesus towards publicans and sincer that drew forth the parable, and therefore I describe not God's attitude towards miners in the abstract, but the historic appreach of God to lost men in the appearance of His Son Jesus. It was the attitude of Jesus towards publicans and

3. Humanly considered, solvation is dependent on faith. This is not merely explicitly announced

(Mk 1616, Lk 812, Jn 214, 12), it is likewise presupposed or expressed in connexion with the healing acts of Jesus. It is a striking fact that in the Synoptics nearly the whole of our Lord's teaching on faith attaches itself to the performance of miracles. This is because miracles embody that maving aspect of the Kingdom to which faith is the subjective counterpart. The miracles, almost withexception, have two features in common. Firstly, they are transactions in which the result depends absolutely on the forth putting of the Divine supernatural powers, where no human effort could possibly contribute anything towards its accomplishment. And, secondly, the miracles are healing miracles, in which the gracious love of God approaches man for his salvation, the spiritual attitude called for by this twofold element in God's saving work. It is the recognielement in God's saving work. It is the recogni-tion of the Divine power and grace,—not, of course, in a purely intellectual way, but practically so as to carry with it the movement of the whole inner life. How faith stands related to the saving power of God is most clearly illustrated in the harrative of Mk 9<sup>17-18</sup>. When the disciples could narrative of Mk 9" ". When the disciples could not heal the child with the dumb spirit, Jesus exclaimed, 'O unbelieving generation?' The father mays, after describing the severity of the case. "But if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us and help us.' To this Jesus replies. 'What, if thou canst! all things are possible to him that believes he with the country of the country is the construction.' believeth.' Faith is omnipotent. To speak, with reference to it, of an 'if thou caust' is an ab nurdity. Thus to faith is ascribed what can be affirmed of God alone. And elsewhere also this same principle is emphasized by our Lord (Mt 212.3), Mk 112.3, Lk 179). The explanation lies in this, that faith is nothing else than that act where there were the same believed. whereby man lays hold of, appropriates, the end-less power of God. This line of reasoning, how-ever, is not applicable to the miracles only. The miracles, as has been shown, illustrate the saving work of God in general. All salvation partakes. humanly speaking, of the nature of the impossible it can be accomplished by God alone (Mt 19<sup>26,27</sup>). Mk 10<sup>26,27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>26,27</sup>). All genuine saving faith is as profoundly conscious of its utter dependence on God for deliverance from sin and death as the recipients of our Lord's nuraculous cures were convinced that God alone could heal their bodies from disease. Faith, however, is more than belief, more than a conviction regarding the necessity and sufficiency of the Divine power. It also involves trust, the reliance upon God's willingness and readiness to save. Jesus never encouraged the exercise of faith as a mere theoretical belief in supernatural power. The performance of a sign from heaven, such as men might have witnessed without trust in God or Himself, He persistently refused. He who truly believes, realizes that God is loving, merciful, forgiving, glad to receive minners. Faith transfers to God in the matter refused. of salvation what human parents experience in themselves with reference to their own children, the desire to help and supply (Mt 77-11). This reliance of faith is not confined to the critical moments of life, it is to be the abiding, characteristic disposition of the disciple with reference to his salvation as a whole. Faith, in those on whom the wonderful cures were wrought, may have manifested itself at first as a momentary act, but, as shown above, Jesus frequently called the atten-tion of such people to what faith had done for them, thus suggesting that it was permanently available as an instrument of salvation

The meaning of Mt 12 is not that Josus will bear this name a mbolically in illustration of the fact that 'Jehovah is naivation, but rather that in Him Jehovah myes, or even, He is Jehovah who saves for thus only can we mitidactorily explain the joining together of the two statements, 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus, and 'for it in the that shall mee his people from their sins.' 8. To the foregoing may be added a rapid survey of the usage of σωζεισ and σωτηρία in the remainder of the NT. "Salvation" in connexion with healing, but at the same time projected into the specific religious sphere, reappears in Ac 4" 1-14". That the idea in the Apostolic teaching largely revolves around the contrast between life and death, is made abundantly plain by the following passages: Ac 315 520 13 65 7, Ro 1 6 17, 1 Co 55, 2 Co 2 6 2 750 Ph 320, 2 Tr 150, Tit 35, He 57, Ja 55 1 Ph 3 1 2, Where the saving act is referred to a definite point of time, this is most frequently the eschatological future (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 3 <sup>2</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>, Ph 1<sup>2</sup> 1 Fh 5<sup>3</sup> 2 Fh 2<sup>3</sup>, He 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>26</sup>, Ja 5<sup>27</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> 3 <sup>3</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>) Instances Institutes where salvation is made a matter of the past or present are Eph 2<sup>5, 5</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>. Saviour, who abolished death, and brought life and ininortality to light through the gospel.' Salvation from an especifically appears in Ro 11<sup>28</sup> in a quotation from the LXX of 1s 59<sup>29</sup>.

6. It ought to be observed that σωτηρία in the NT relates to what is dogmatically called 'the application of redemption' in distinction from application of redemption in distinction from the impetration of redemption, or the objective work of Christ. This is the natural result of its original eschatological significance, for what takes place in the end lies on the line of the subjective transformation of the believer.

The view has recently been advocated by Wendland (ZNTW v [1901] S51) that the original background of the conception of valories is the rule and influence of evil spirits, of which death and disease would be only the peripheral manifestations. The facts cited above do not bear out this hypothesis, or even lavour it. In the Gospels there is only one passage which applies value to the casting out of a demon (1k 820). In all other cases of deliverance from demoniacal possession of the expressions are used. It would be far more correct to my that ain and death lie at the centre, demoniacal influence in the puriphery of the conception. On the other hand, it creates an equally wrong distribution of the suphasis to conceive of our Lord's value as in its primary aspect a species of 'bealing,' and of Jesus Himself an chiefly a spiritual physician. Against Harnsck, who in his work, Dr. Missions and Justician deriving des Christenthusus is desserved are Jakrhunderten, goes too far in this direction, Wagner (ZNTW xt. [1966] 384, 285) well observed, that the NT writers do not, like the later Church Fathers, who stood under the influence of the Stoic philosophy, view sin as a disease of the soil, but as a species of death, and that Jesus is to them far more than a physician, viz. One who leads from death to life.

SAMARIA, SAMARITANS. - 1. Description. 'Samaria,' originally the name of the city built by Omri (I K 16<sup>34</sup>), became in a very short time a common name for the Northern kingdom (Am 3°, Jer 314, 2 Ch 2514), but during the Greek period it became limited to the province of Samaria, and so in NT times it is the designation of the district that lies between Galilee and Judsea (Jn 44). The limits and extent of the Samaritan territory varied from time to time (Jos. Ant XII iv. 1; 1 Mac 11th, and it is impossible to define with absolute certainty the boundaries in Gospel days. These, how-ever, may be known generally. We learn that Ginea the modern Jesia on the south edge of the plain of Esdraelon, was its northern boundary (Ant XX. vi. I); and this is confirmed by the fact that (aphar Outheni now Kefe Adan 4 miles distant, was in Galilee (M. Outlin i. 5). The southern boundary is stated as 'the Acrabbene tojarchy' (BJ III. iii. 4), and a village named Anuath or Borkeas was on the border (16) As these have been identified with the modern villages of Armbe and Berukin, we conclude that this boundary ran westward to the Shephelah along Wady Ish'ar In that case it would then naturally run eastward to the Jordan down Wady Zamar. There seems, however, good reason to fix it farther north at this point, as Karn Sartabeh seems to have been in the hands of the Jews (M. Rosk, n. 4), unless, indeed, it was a border hill accessible alike to Jews and Samaritans. This seems the more likely, as it was the only signalling station in the neighbourhood of Samaritan territory where false lights could be kindled to deceive the Jews on the occasion of the new moons, and this the Samaritans

Jordan, while the hill slopes towards the Shephelah constituted the western-the plain between Caphar Outhern and Antipatris being regarded as a heathen district (Bab. Giffis 76a). This gives us a territory of about 20 miles from north to south, and 30 from east to west.

The region consists of scattered mountain groups and rounded hills with plains between, the chief of these being Merj el-Mahna, to the east of Nablus, Merj el-Ghuruk or the plain of Sanur (a lake in the winter and spring), and the plain of Dothan, which last opens into the plain of Esdraelon. Samaria presents a striking and beautiful contrast to Judgea with its barren hills. Here they are for the most part covered with fruit trees of every kind, chief among which are the clive, the fig, the mulberry, the orange, the apriect, and the pome-granate. On the Samaritan hills great flocks of sheep and goats find pasture. The whole country is studded with villages, and the fertile plains and walleys produce rich crops of grain. Only to the east, extending along the Jordan boundary, is the country rough and broken, and the mountains, which descend precipitously to the river, naked and barren; and this they have always been (BJ v. viii. 2). The rest of the country is well watered everywhere, and in many places it is extremely beautiful. In the early centuries the gardens of Samaria (2023 mores, M. Erakkin iii. 2) were famous, and to-day the fruit orchards and beautiful gardens of Jenin are equally well known, while all must agree with Thomson (LB ii. 110) when he says. 'One may be excused for becoming somewhat enthusiastic over this pretty vale of Nablus, sparkling with fountains and streams, verdant with olive groves and fig orchards, interspersed with walnut, apple, apricot, orange, quince, pomegranate, and other trees and shrubs.' But, notwithstanding its superiority in richness and beauty to the south country, the Jews of the 1st cent were very unwilling to admit that Samaria was part of the Holy Land. When they spoke of it they reckoned only the three lands,—Judwa, Galilee, and Perwa (M. Shebhuth 1x. 2),—always omitting Samaria, as not being Jewish soil. But even the district we have described is not to be regarded as having been at any time fully occupied by the people we call Samaritans. The name was strictly limited to the religious sect, the metropolis of which was Shechem (Ant. XI. vili. 6). There, and in many of the towns and villages, they were numerous and strong, but almost everywhere there were also Grecian settlers, and with the city of Samaria itself the Samaritans had little or nothing to do.

2. History of the Samaritans in their relation-ahip to the Jews.—Although the Samaritans claim descent from the patriarchs (Jn 411), and present us with an unbroken history, and although it is to some extent true that they represent the spirit of the tribe of Ephraim (Renan, Lang. Semit. p. 230), we must date their characteristic existence as a people only from the time of their conflicts with-Exra and Nehemiah. We regard the Samaritan statement (d-Tolidoth), that 300,000 men besides women and children were brought back from captivity in the days of Sanballat, as baseless; but, on the other hand, when Israel was carried away captive, a remnant must have been left; and that such was the case we have abundant evidence (2 K 230 m. Jer 41). Their appearance as a community dates only from the time of their mingling with the Assyrian colonists settled in the land, and it is from the leading party amongst these that they are frequently designated Cutherans (2 K 17%). There can be no question of the accuracy of the OT narrative of the originally mixed origin of the are accused of having done (Bab. Rosh. 22b and Samaritans, but repeated accessions from Judaism margin). The eastern boundary was, of course, the (Neh 13th; Ant. X1. viii. 2 and 6), probably ultimately outnumbering the original colonists, and the manifest reversion to the pure Semitic type, induce us to believe that the existing Samaritan race has but little connexion with the old Turanian colonists, and is probably now of almost as pure

For their rejection from all participation in the rebuilding of the Temple the Samaritans never forgave the Jews (Ezr 4<sup>3, 4</sup>, Neh 2<sup>30</sup>), and for their attempted hindrance of that work the Jews hore the Samaritanx no less a grudge. The breach became irrevocable when a rival priesthood and temple were set up on Gerizim. Jewish and Samaritan tradition agree as to the date of this event, which Jusephus sets down wrongly in the time of Alexander the Great and Jaddua the high priest (b.c. 332) one hundred years too late (Ast. XI. vin. 2); but, though his account is clearly mixed with fable, there may still be some historical basis for the extra details he gives. About R.C. 200, during the weak rule of the high priest Onias II. (d. B.C. 196), the Samaritans, being then in a flourishing condition, are accused of having harassed the Jews and carried away captives to serve as slaves (Ast. XII. 1v. 1). In his account of Maccabean times Josephus continually accuses them of denying all kinship with the Jews, when they see them suffering and difficulties, and of claiming to be Sidonians (Ant. XII. v 5); but, on the contrary, when good fortune befalls the Jews, they claim to belong to that race, and to derive their descent from Joseph (16, 1X xiv. 3, XI viii. 6, XII iv. 5). John Hyrcanus (c. B.C. 128) made an expedition against Samaria (Ant. XIII. x. 2). After repeated successes against their ally and protector Antiochus Cyzicenus, he took Samaria, ravaged the country, aubdued the Cuthmans who dwelt about the temp at Gerizim, and destroyed their temple (Ant. XIII. ix. 1). During the period of unrest that followed the deposition of Archelaus (A.D. 6), the Samaritans became so aggressive that they came privately into Jerusalem by night, and, when the gates of the Temple were opened just after midnight, they entered and scattered dead men's bodies in the cloisters to delile the Temple (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1). Another incident is later recorded, which led to very serious consequences. A number of Galilasan pilgrims were attacked, and many killed, at Ginea (Jenin), the first Samaritan village on the way (Ant XX. vt. 1-3) This led to civil war for a time, then to the intervention of the Roman authorities, and ultimately to a decision in favour of the Jews by Claudius himself (A.D. 51). At a still later period we find the Jews excluding the Samaritans, as also Christians and pagans, from Capernaum, Nazareth, and Sopphoris (Epiphanius, ade, Har i 11). Nor was it only in l'alestine that the jealousies continued to exist. Alexander and Ptolemy Lagi bad taken many Jows and Samaritans to Egypt (Ant. xi. xiii 6), and there in Alexandria we read of rivalry and disorders between them (Ant XII i D), the disputes being, as usual, regarding the relative merits of Jerusalem and Gerizina

Jewish literature is full of manifestations of the same spirit. Ben Sira speaks of "the foolish! Jik that dwell at Shechem," and characterizes their as a sinat on "(s); folice."). Jissephias literate ably case their "to athreads and with not admit except some times for a porpose that they are of Hillrey blood. Meet slaughtered by a Cuthasan in allowed if an Israelite is present, or if the hamaritan himself eats from it (Hab. Cholin 36). Samaritan literature is, on the whole, less aggressible but that arises from the fact that we have less of it, and the greater occumity the hamaritan had to stand on the defensive. Still, in every proof they bring forward in favour of their sanctuary as the one holy place, there is implied or expressed the idea that the Jew is necksualited, if not heretical. They use the designation 'Israelite for themselves alone, and refuse it to the Jews. Still, they have no objection to be called. Samaritans, a shelp they write firmer or with "Guardians of the Law" (See Letter to Ludolf). They have an intense dulier to Jerusalem, and the bitterness of their hate culminates in their play upon its name, when they describe the Jews as the Tute—'accurred to perfection' or 'perfectly curred' (ct Tutdoth). The more moderate attitude of which we have apoken seems to have been, its name, when they describe the Jews as DNF TIME—"accurated to perfection" or "perfectly cursed" (ct Tisidoth). The more inoderate attitude of which we have spoken seems to have been, on the whole, later than the days of the (coppels, and may have been caused by the Namaritais having made common cause with the Jews against Venpasian (bd in vii '2). At is at time they shared in the Dispersion, and their synagogues were then to be found in Egyst and Rome. At the present monest the relationship between the two races is no closer than in the past. Some twenty years ago, the Famaritans, fearing the extinction of their sect, sought to arrange for intermiserings with the Jews, but this was refused.

3. Religion.—The basis of the Samaritan religion , is the Pentateuch, as they read and understand it : and to this they have been as loyal as the Jews to their Law. Since long before the Christian era they have been strongly monotheistic. Not only are they the enemies of images and every visible representation of the Deity, but they have ever re sented as strongly as do the Jewish Targums every anthropomorphic representation of God; and, so far as we can judge, they have made no concessions to leathenism. They were, indeed, accused by the Rabbis of worshipping a dove on Gerizin Chdin 6c), and also of worshipping the idols duceb buried (Gn 35c) under the oak of Morch (Rec. Rob. § 81); but these were malicious falsehoods. From the Jewish point of view another offence against the Law was that they pronounced the Sacred Name Jahreh with its own vowels (Jerus, Souh & 1; Bab, Sanh, 90) Theodoret seems to confirm this, Bab, Sanh, 20) and tells us that their pronunciation was lake (3 v, as in mod Greek) a point of interest is that scholars for grammatical reasons pronounce it in the same manner. For some centuries, however, they have been accustomed to pronounce it Shimm ('the name'), just as the Jews use hiredran in conversation (Letter to Ludolt - In the matter of their ritual orthodoxy we have even the testi mony of Josephus, for, when he tells of Jewish fugitives accused of ritual irregularities being received by the Samaritans, la adds that they complained of being falsely accused. Let XI vin. 7) To this we may add the remarkable confession of Rabbian Simeon, the son of Guijahel, who says Every command which the Cuthwans keep they observe more strictly that, the Israchtes Cholin 4as They practise circumcision, and keep the Law strictly. They observe all the Mosaic feasts; and, in accordance with their reada; of the Law, they go three times a year to Germin for the feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, and at such times practically the whole community lives in the mountain. Only at the Passover season, however, do they offer sacrifices, and, as the arrangements at that time bring before us much more vividly the occasion of the institution of that feast than the calm order of the Jewish ritual, it claims our attention. The usual order is that seven days before the Passover the whole community camps out on the top of Gerizim in the neighbourhood of the sacred rock, which they regard as the site of their ancient temple. On the evening of the 14th Nisan the whole congregation assembles, and the high priest reads the words of institution in Ex 12<sup>1-12</sup>. Precisely at sunset, as he concludes the sixth verse, a sufficient number of lambs for the community is slain by men dressed in white clothing. Each member of the congrega-tion then marks his forehead with the blood. The wool is removed by scalding with boiling water previously made ready. The bodies are now ex-amined, to make sure that there is no blemish, and thereafter they are spitted and roasted in a pit arranged as an oven. An hour or two later, when they are sufficiently cooked, the Samaritans standing, eat in haste with their loins girded, with shoes on their feet, and with staff in hand. All that remains, together with the right shoulders and hamstrings previously removed, is carefully gathered up and burned in the night. Early on the morning of the fifteenth day they all return to their details in the target. to their duties in the town.

In accordance with the Law, the levirate marriage is practised; but with the difference, that it is not the brother, but the nearest friend that takes his wife. As among the Sephardic Jews also, a second wife is allowed during the life of the first when she has had no children.

Beyond these things their religious ideas are The Pentateuch is their sole canonical vague. book, and beyond its life they never seem to have passed. They were never called upon to go through a stirring national crisis, like the Jews during the Maccabean times, and so they never rose to the same vigour and intellectual life. written sources of their dogma are late, but from these and from Jewish sidelights we can learn something. It is discussed in the Talmud as to whether they are to be classed with the Sadducees in belief, and the Jews seem to have had some ground for thinking so, for they are represented as saying that 'no resurrection is recorded in the Law' (Bab. Sanh. 90b). Still, the modern Samaritan believes in a resurrection, in the distinction between good and evil spirits, in a judgment, and in the creation from nothing. It is to be remarked, however, that Arabic writers in the Middle Ages tell us of Samaritan sects professing the distinctive beliefs of both Pharisees and Sadducees, so that the opinions of both parties must have been held by individuals at an earlier date. In Jn 425 we find that the woman of Samaria looked forward to the coming of a prophet whom she, like the Jews designated 'the Messiah.' That this word should have been used by her has been regarded as peculiar, since it does not occur in the Law, but in the 1st cent. we find Samaritans familiar with and quoting the prophets (Mid. Debar. § 3); and, besides, we must see that it would be impossible for a faith like theirs, continually under the pressure of a foreign bondage, to survive without absorbing many of the elements of Jewish eschatology; and of these the Messianic idea was the most widely spread in the 1st cent., so much so that it was hardly possible for even the Samaritans to escape its influence. It was doubtless in connexion with such a hope that the prophet arose, and tumults occurred which were put down by Pilate, causing him finally the loss of his office (Ant. XVIII. iv. 1); as it also led Simon Magus to give himself out as some great one (Ac 8°). When the Messianic idea took final form, they expected the Messiah's coming in the year 6000 A.M., but did not think little from the Palestinian Aramaic.

that he should be greater than Moses. Whether he should be of the tribe of Joseph does not appear, but they denied the application of Gn 4910 (where their reading varies from the MT) as proof that he should spring from Judah. From the Jews they adopted the synagogue system; and, apart from the feast days kept on Gerizin, all their worship is conducted in Kenîset es-Sâmiré, the synagogue of the Samaritans, in the S.W. of the town (Nâblus). The high priest, who is said to be of the tribe of Levi, conducts their services, and, according to the Law, he receives tithes from his people.

4. Literature.—The most ancient and important document the Samaritans possess is the (Hebrew-) Samaritan Pentateuch; and this they seem to have become possessed of at a very early date—indeed, before the Babylonian (""") alphabet had supplanted the older Hebrew, for, like all the later books of this people, it is written in a character that is now peculiar to them, — the Samaritan alphabet,—but which in itself is nothing more or less than a cursive form of the old lapidary script of Hebrew, Phœnician, and Mosbite. Another testimony to their early reception of the Torah is that it is not divided into parāshahs like the MT, but, on a totally different principle, independent alike of the Rabbis and the Alexandrian critics, into ketzin. These number in all 962, Genesis containing 250, Exodus 200, Leviticus 134, Numbers 218, and Deuteronomy 160. While the language of this recension of the Pentateuch is Hebrew, it supports in the matter of various readings rather the LXX than the MT, the number of agreements being not less than 2000, while in the ages of the patriarchs it differs from both the LXX and the MT. But more to be considered than all these taken together are certain variations that have had an important bearing on their religion. The Jews were wont to accuse the Samaritans of having corrupted the Law; and the charge was well founded. In Dt 274 (cf. also v.7) we find the substitution of 'Gerizim' for 'Ebal,' and at the close of the Decalogue in both Ex 2017 and Dt 521 a long passage is inserted-

'And it shall be when the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanite, whither thou goest in to possess it, thou shalt set up for thyself great stones, and thou shalt plaster them with lime, and thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law; and it shall be when ye pass over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, on Mount Gerizim, and thou shalt build there an altar to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt offer upon it sacrifices to the Lord thy God, and thou shalt sacrifice peace-offerings, and thou shalt eat there, and rejoice before the Lord thy God. That mountain is beyond Jordan after the way from the rising of the sun, in the land of the Canaanite, who dwelleth in the West, over against Gilgal, near by the oak of Moreh, over against Shechem.'

This, according to the Samaritan division of the Decalogue, was reckoned the Tenth Commandment, and, like the others, of perpetual obligation, so that the Samaritans regarded not only the Temple at Jerusalem, but also the tabernacle at Shiloh, though in Ephraim, and the whole Jewish priesthood after the settlement of the land, as schismatical.

Other books of the OT they do not consider canonical. They do, indeed, have a deep veneration for Job and the Psalms, and they read Joshua and Judges, but they are all regarded as apocry-

The synagogue system, which among the Jews led to the formation of the Targunis, was also the means of producing an Aramaic-Samaritan Pentateuch (תרנות שמרות), which, however, Nöldeke dates at not earlier than the 4th cent., though it may contain earlier elements; and in favour of this it is to be noted that in general it agrees with το Σαμα-ρειτικόν of Origen. It closely represents the Heb.-Sam. Pentateuch, and in language it differs but Their later works consist of material directly connected with their religion and life as a people. They possess over a dosen rolumes, mostly simpublished, which they designate Terries ('chanting'). These are in Hebrew mixed with Aramaic, and contain the services for the various assesses of the year, and they are probably ancient. Another dosen volumes are made up of connuentaries on various portions of the Pentateuch text, and, although these also are written in Hebrew, they are usually accompanied by an Arabic translation. The best known Bamarian commentary is that of Markah, which was published in Europe by Heidenbeim in 1886. The author probably lived in the 4th century. In addition to these they possess a few historical works — **Atab as Sactir, a history of the period from Adam to Moses, at Tubakh, an account of judgments which briefle the Jews, the Book of Joshua (in Arabic, but probably in parts from a Heli, original), which closely follows the vanonical Joshua, but has many spocryphal additions and eight concluding chapters, bringing the history down to the time of Alexander Beverus, Chronicle of Abul Fath, at Tubakh, a short Hebrew history from Adam till the present high prises, accompanied by an Arabic translation.

So far as MSS are concerned, the only one that, on account of its antiquity, merits our considera tion is the jealously guarded Pentateuch roll in Nablus. It is preserved in a covering of crimson satin in a silver case engraved with a plan of the tabernacle. The roll itself is written on parchment much discoloured by age. The Samaritans claim that it was written by Abishus the son of Phiness, thirteen years after the settlement of the land; but this is incredible, though they show an acrostic made by the thickening of certain letters in the roll itself as proof Socia thinks it may belong to the 6th cent.; but other scholars with the present writer has discussed the question, would carry its date back even to a short time before the Christian era, so that there is a bare possibility of its having been in use when Christ passed through the streets of Shechem . like ordinary synagogue rolls, the MS is written in columns. These are 7 in, wide, and contain 70 to 72 lines. The writing is small, and the letters are of the oldest Samaritan type.

pronunciation of both Hebrew and Aramaic this people differs widely from the Jews and Syrians. The gutturals, which the Galilaans confounded with one another, are altogether omitted by the Samaritans. The vowel system also at first sight seems to have nothing in common with the Mas soretic pronunciation, so much so that a recent writer on the subject expresses the opinion that it follows certain laws of language as yet un-known to us' (Rosenberg's Lehrbach, p. 11). How ever, when we come to compare the modern Samaritan pronunciation of both Hebrew and Aramaic with that of the Jews and the Syrians, we see that the former in nearly every detail bears to the latter the same relationship as the vulgar Palestinian Arabic dialects bear to the older class sical speech. It thus appears that, in the absence of yours to preserve the memory of the sounds when Arabic supplanted these languages as the colloquial, and in the absence of any formulated grammar till the year 1400, the Samaritan pronunciation was allowed to go through the same processes of decay as the common sister Semitic dialects on the same soil. A careful consideration

5. Relationship of Christ to the Samaritans.

To understand even imperfectly the beauty and tenderness of the attitude of Jesus to this despised race, we must remember that His ministry occurred during the period when the separation of Jew and Samaritan was most absolute, and the bitterness of feeling most intense. Yet they were invariably town on the route, probably Jericho, He visited treated with respect and forbearance by Christ, as also by His Apostles after the Resurrection; and just as His gentleness won the affection and gained the gratitude of publicans and sinners, so also did His treatment of the Samaritans. It was the one Samaritan and not the nine Jews who returned to gave thanks (Lk 1716), and who was contented to wast for the official verdict, and the freedom it would bring, that he might continue in the com-pany of Jesus; and all that is related of the conversation at the well, and of the relations with the villagers of Sychar, reveals the same attractiveness and consideration. True it is that at the beginning of His ministry, and when sending out the Twelve, He directed them not to enter into 'any city of the Samaritans' (Mt 10s); but we can well understand the reason for that, when we see that not even the same circle of the Twelve sufficiently understood the nature of the gospel to be entrusted with such a mission (Lk P*). We must also bear in mind the nature of the gospel to be entrusted with such a mission (Lk Bth). We must also bear in mind that Samaria was designated by our Lord as the first circuit, beyond Judea proper, that He meant to receive the gospel message. In the parable of the Good Samaritan, too (10<sup>26-17</sup>), He has taken and ennobled that name which till His time was almost a synonym for devil (Jn 846), and which no self-respecting Jew would pronounce—even the lawyer evading it (Lk 10<sup>27</sup>) when forced to confess that he 'showed mercy on him.' In view of such feelings between the two peoples, it would have been, in any mere man, an act of almost unpardonable mahness to have depicted to a Jewish audience the Samaritan as an example of noble generosity and of disinterested neighbourliness; and not only and of disinterested neighbouriness; and not only is this what Christ does, but He goes much further. Priest and Levite are put into the balance and outweighed by this waylaring stranger, and every later point in the picture is incalculably in favour of the Samaritan. He is in the country of the Jews, in a place of bad repute—Tala'at cd dam, the Ascent of Blood,-in danger from the Jewish people-robbers, friends of the man assisted, -even of insult and rejection by the khan-keeper, and of perhaps being taken and treated as the robber himself. He had every reason for excusing himnumear. He had every reason for excusing nim-self. He and his provisions, especially the wine, were impure, and there was every prospect that it would be an ungrateful task. What must we think of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, in opposition to every racial prejudice and purely human feeling, depicts with such beauty the hated Cuthæan, and that just after He had been rejected (Lk 9<sup>23 h)</sup> by the Samaritane in such a manner that the hearts of His disciples were billed with bitter indignation?

Controlled by circumstances, or a product of the age in which He lived, could He have risen to this?

SAMARITAN, THE GOOD (Lk 10<sup>23</sup> <sup>2)</sup> Jesus had bidden His last farewell to Galilee, and was travelling to Jerusalem (Lk 951). He had passed through Samaria and reached Judga, and in some the synagogue, * as He was wont (cf. Lk 416), and discoursed to the congregation. It was customary for the hearers, when the preacher had concluded, to ask him questions, † and so it happened on this occasion. One of those whose business was the interpretation of the sacred Law, rose and asked, 'Teacher, what shall I do to inherit "eternal life"?' He was no anxious inquirer. He thought to display his superior knowledge, and humble Jesus before the congregation; and his question was a foretaste of the dialectical warfare which awaited Jesus in Jerusalem, and which reached its climax in that succession of encounters with the rulers in the Temple court during the Passion week. Nor was Jesus deceived. 'What stands written in the Law?' He asked, 'how readest thou?' Glad to display his theological proficiency, the lawyer glibly replied, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength, and with thy whole mind, and thy neighbour as thyself.' Jesus accepted the answer: 'Thou hast answered rightly.

This do, and thou shalt live.' The lawyer was an astute controversialist, and he perceived a new opening for disputation. 'Neighbour' was defined both by the Law and by the Rabbis as a fellow-Israelite, 'a son of thy people,' and he expected that Jesus would give the word a larger significance, thus exposing Himself to a charge of hereau cance, thus exposing Himself to a charge of heresy. He clutched at the opportunity. 'And who,' he asked, 'is my "neighbour"?' Jesus answered with a parable.

The road from Jericho to Jerusalem had a very evil reputation. It wound up barren and rugged hills, infested by brigands, who assailed travellers, nills, infested by brigands, who assailed travellers, robbing and sometimes murdering them; and from those deeds of violence it derived a ghastly name—the Ascent of Blood.§ It was much frequented. It was the highway between the capital and the prosperous City of Palm-trees; and, moreover, since half of the officiating 'course' lodged at Jericho, where provision was abundant, || there were continually priests and Levites passing to and fro. Jesus told how a man travelling down the Ascent Jesus told how a man, travelling down the Ascent of Blood, was set upon by brigands, plundered, maltreated, and left half-dead. Presently a priest came down the road, and, when he spied the wretch, he 'passed by on the other side.' Next came a Levite, and he behaved with like in-humanity. Then came one riding on an ass, a merchant probably, who often passed that way in the prosecution of his business. Since the holy men had 'passed by on the other side,' it would have been no marvel had he done the like, especially since he was a Samaritan, one of that hated race with which the Jews had no dealings. But he was moved by the piteous spectacle, and dismounting, he dressed the sufferer's wounds, according to the medical prescription of that day, with oil and wine: ** then he mounted him on his beast, and conveyed him to an inn and tended him. Those offices of humanity detained him from his journey, and he rose betimes 'toward the morrow' (en the adριον), to push forward. But ere he set out he handed the host two denarii, and bade him see to the unfortunate man until he should be fit for the road. Since a denarius was a day's wage,* the two would probably suffice; but in case of need he enjoined that no expense be spared, undertaking to settle the account on his return journey.

'Which of these three,' says Jesus, 'seemeth to thee to have proved "neighbour" to the man that fell in with the brigands?' Only one answer was secrible. possible. The lawyer should have replied, 'The Samaritan'; but he could not endure to utter the odious name, and he reluctantly faltered out, 'The one that took pity on him.' 'Go thy way,' said Jesus; 'do thou also likewise.' It was a masterpiece of dialectic. He had avoided entanglement in an unprofitable and perilous controversy, and had forced His adversary to pronounce judgment on himself. See also art. NEIGHBOUR.

SANCTIFY, SANCTIFICATION .- Sanctification is the tr. of αγιασμός, which is one of the group of words that includes ayios, and ayiaζω, and ayiωσύνη. The root idea of the group seems to be 'separation' or 'restricted use' (see HOLINESS). ἀγιασμός denotes primarily a process; but in NT it is used also to describe the state resulting from that process. This wider usage is familiar in our language, and therefore we take 'sanctification' to describe both a state and a process. It is the process by which men are made holy, and it is also the state into which men pass as they become holy. Therefore this article must discuss what state is considered by Jesus Christ to deserve the name 'sanctification,' and what is the process whereby He conceives men are sanctified.

The first fact to be noticed about this entire group of words is that it occupies a meagre place in the teaching of Jesus. The number of times when either of them is put into His lips is very small, and none of these few usages refers to man. dylor is used as follows: He addresses God as 'Holy Father' (Jn 17<sup>11</sup>); He speaks of 'the holy angels' (Mk 8<sup>28</sup>||); He uses the name 'Holy Spirit' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>|| 28<sup>19</sup>, Mk 12<sup>30</sup> 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 12<sup>12</sup>, Jn 14<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>22</sup>); He warns against giving 'that which is holy' unto the dogs (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>); and He refers to the abomination that stands 'in the holy place' (24<sup>18</sup>). dyld'so is used of 'the temple that sanctifieth the gift' (Mt 23<sup>17.19</sup>); and there are three very important usages group of words is that it occupies a meagre place 23<sup>17, 19</sup>); and there are three very important usages in Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>17, 19</sup>. It occurs also in the Lord's In Jn 10<sup>35</sup> 17<sup>11.13</sup>. It occurs also in the Lord's l'rayer in the sentence, 'Hallowed be thy name' (Mt 6<sup>3</sup>). This petition suggests that both the ceremonial and ethical aspects of the word were present to our Lord's mind. The 'name' of the Father is to be reverenced. It casts awe upon the worshipping soul. But also the name stands for righteousness. It is a name whose ethical splendour must not be smirched. The same double dour must not be smirched. The same double reference can be traced in His usage of  $\delta \gamma_{uos}$ . When Jesus employs these words, He seems to give them their true historical sense as implying (1) a state of consecration to the Divine purposes, and (2) a state of ethical holiness.

άγιασμός, the NT word for 'sanctification,' does not occur at all in the recorded sayings of Jesus. But He was constantly speaking about the thing itself. Therefore we are constrained to recognize some special significance in the absence of the familiar words from the Lord's teaching. Probably the explanation is found in the state of religious feeling in His day. מְנִים is the nearest Greek equivalent of the Hebrew קרים. notation. It has been pointed out that the idea of holiness in OT is progressively spiritualized, and receives more and more ethical content. But whilst this is true of OT usage, the Greek period in Jewish history had ushered in a time of reaction in the sig-nificance of religious terms. The struggle of pious Jews to resist Hellenizing tendencies threw the emphasis of religion upon keeping the Law. Thus arose the Pharisaic interpretation of piety as rigid obedience to the Law. Under this influence holionesience to the Law. Under this influence holiness was again interpreted ceremonially instead of morally. When Jesus was born, the religious phraseology of the day was legal rather than ethical. Now this conception of sanctification was the subject of unsparing denunciation by Jesus. One long chapter in Matthew's Gospel gathers up scathing rebukes of those who put the emphasis of religion more what is external 'M' emphasis of religion upon what is external (Mt 231-36; cf. Lk 1130-52). In the Sermon on the Mount He said: 'Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 520). So that, if Jesus had used the current terms, He would have been understood in the current sense. In order to secure new moral contents for the terms, He had to drop them, and to use other phraseology

A further explanation of the absence of the familiar terms is found in Jesus' method of teaching. His teaching was not doctrinal. He did not express His ideals in formulas, but in pictures of what men ought to be. Instead of reiterating familiar maxims, He minted new precepts for men's daily use. Neglecting the outworn dogmas of the scribes, He uttered sharp calls to men as to what they ought to do. His teaching was 'new,' and was 'with authority' (Mk 1<sup>22,27</sup>). When we turn to the Epistles, we discover that, though the familiar terms reappear, they reappear in a new form. They have no longer the Pharisaic connotation. have a new Christian connotation, which lifts them above the highest ethical attainment of OT. NT writers use OT words with the significance that Jesus Christ has given to the idea they repre-

1. Christ's teaching about sanctification.—i.

HIS TEACHING ABOUT THE IDEAL OF SAINT-HOOD.—Jesus Christ's conception of sanctification started from the holiness of God the Father. He started from the holiness of God the Father. He found certain attributes in God that are capable of being the ideal for men. These attributes belong to the Fatherhood of God. He summed up many exhortations in the words, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). This command held out a new ideal of perfection. Hitherto men had found their ideal in various human available of the second extension and the seco human excellences. Jesus fixed attention upon God the Father. There are many Divine attributes that are inaccessible to men. No man can be perfect even as God is perfect. The omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence of God are absolutely beyond human reach. But as 'Father,' God displays certain qualities that may be copied by men; and these qualities unite to form the Christian ideal. Such teaching rested upon the underlying belief of Jesus that man has a capacity for sonship of God, and that he reaches his ideal by realizing his sonship. And Jesus could conceive sonship only in the ethical realm. To give men power to become children of God, is to make them resemble their Father ethically (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>).

The details of the teaching may be summarized conveniently under some of the leading categories of thought used by Jesus:—(1) His own example. He claimed to set forth the moral ideal, because He was the Son of God (Jn 14°). As the Son, He revealed the Father (Mt 11°, Jn 14°); therefore the children of God are those who resemble Him sanctification.

(2) Love. The central and all-pervading glory of the Divine Fatherhood is love (Mt 5<sup>16</sup>, Jn 14<sup>21, 25</sup>). The Apostolic phrase 'God is love' (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>) sums up the irresistible testimony of Jesus to the Father (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>9, 10</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). Therefore holy people must be loving. The first demand is for love towards God. To 'love the Lord' is the greatest commandment (Mt 22<sup>27</sup>||). The character that lacks this devoted love for the heavenly Father is lacks this devoted love for the heavenly Father is fatally defective. But Jesus bracketed the commandment to 'love thy neighbour as thyself' with this 'first and greatest' (22<sup>20</sup>||); and the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>25-37</sup>) has been interpreted as teaching that 'charity is the true sanctity' (Bruce). Likeness to the heavenly Father is impossible without the cultivation of a loving spirit (Mt 5<sup>28-48</sup>, Lk 15<sup>28-29</sup>). This love must be unselfish (Lk 14<sup>18, 14</sup>). It must forgive freely and unweariedly (Mt 18<sup>21, 22</sup>). It must not judge (7<sup>1, 2</sup>). It must be full of compassion towards all needy ones, and must find a neighbour in any one requiring assistance (Lk 10<sup>24-38</sup>). Jesus also inculcated the supreme importance of love by His rebukes of its opposites: of lack of compassion (Mt 18<sup>22-35</sup>, Lk 10); of selfishness (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>); of inhumanity (Mt 25<sup>41-45</sup>). Equally terrible were His denunciations of Pharisain injusting to the weak (224-14 m).

Equally terrible were His denunciations of Pharisaic injustice to the weak (23<sup>4-14</sup>||).

(3) Righteousness. The love of the Father is a holy love. God is the 'righteous Father' (Jn 17<sup>25</sup>).

Jesus came into the world from the Father to save from sins (Mt 11<sup>15</sup>, Lk 15<sup>7-10-18</sup>, Mt 26<sup>25</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16-17</sup>).

Therefore no man can resemble the Father who does not desire supremely to be always for the same who had to be a supremely to be always. neerore no man can resemble the Father who does not desire supremely to be cleansed from sin. Likeness to the Father involves complete consecration to His holy purpose, and readiness to be separated from every evil thing (Mt 5<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>45</sup> 18<sup>8</sup>||). The Christian must seek first the righteousness of the Heavenly Father (6<sup>23</sup>). His goodness must be manifest in deeds as well as words (7<sup>21</sup>). He must be pure in heart (5<sup>5</sup>). His righteousness must be inward and real, not outward and ceremonial inward and real, not outward and ceremonial (5<sup>20</sup> 23<sup>25-28</sup>).

(4) Life. (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). Jesus came that men might have life (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). Moral perfection is conceived as the true self-development (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>, Mk 10<sup>30</sup>). God has made us for Himself; unfailing obedience to the will of God leads to fulness of life (Mt 19<sup>17</sup>, Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). Mutilation is urged in preference to the loss of life (Mk 948.45 ||). But mutilation is only second best.

(5) Citizenship in the Kingdom. Jesus taught that moral perfection cannot be realized by men in isolation. This is the aspect of sanctification. in isolation. This is the aspect of sanctification brought out by His teaching about the Kingdom of God. His ideal man is a citizen as well as a son. He must live as a member of a Society, showing those qualities that help to build the City of God (cf. Mt 59. <sup>13-16</sup> <sup>19</sup>). Such a recognition of other lives will keep men meek (5 <sup>5</sup> 11<sup>29</sup>), and will fill their hearts with humility (18<sup>1-6</sup> ||).

ii. CHRIST'S TEACHING ABOUT THE PROCESS OF SANCTIFICATION.—(1) We note that sanctification is a process having a definite beginning. It is not another aspect of natural development. Its history is distinct from the record of physiological and psychological growth. We note the striking saying about His forerunner: 'Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist: yet he that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 1111). Here two kingdoms are distinguished: the natural kingdom into which men are 'born of women,' and the Kingdom of heaven. The latter kingdom belongs to a higher order than the former, as the animal kingdom is higher than the vegetable, or as the weakest mammal is greater than the strongest reptile. The babe in the higher king dom of men is greater than the tiger in the kingdom of animals. So the least in the Kingdom kingdom of animals. So the least in the Kingdom of heaven belongs to a higher order, and has larger possibilities of spiritual development, than the greatest among those 'born of women,' i.e. produced by natural birth and growth. This implies that entrance into the Kingdom of heaven is secured by a new principle of life. This necessity is further hinted at in the teaching about defilement proceeding from the heart (15<sup>11</sup>). It is not enough to adorn a life with kind actions, to hang bunches of grapes on a thorn bush (7th). Good actions must be the fruit that grows on a good tree (Mt 7<sup>th-10</sup>, Jn 15th). The tree must be made good; the heart must be cleansed; the river of life must be purified at its source. It will not suffice to build a fine house on a wrong foundation. The hidden principle must be made secure if the life is to be saved (Mt 720-27). These hints prepare us for the demand, 'Except ye be converted, and become the kingdom of heaven? (185 ||). Sanctification involves the quickening of a new life in men. The maturing of their physical nature cannot suffice; their spiritual nature must pass through the stages of birth and childhood before it can attain maturity. This teaching finds exact expression in the words addressed to Nicodemus 'Except a man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God' (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>) Man's destiny is not achieved through his physical birth into a physical kingdom. 'That which is birth into a physical kingdom. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh' (3"); therefore no number of reincarnations can produce a spiritual result. Before we can be born into a spiritual kingdom, we must have a second kind of birth corresponding to the kingdom; we must be 'born of the Spirit' (30-0).

(2) A second group of passages hints that sanctification may be a long process before it is com-pleted. This is suggested in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13, Mk 4), the parable of the Seed as growing up—'first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear' (Mk 4"); and in all the figures of fruit-bearing, because fruit-bearing is the late result of a long process (cf. Jn. 15°, Lk. 13°). Another set of parables represents men as servants of a long absent Lord, who have to show diligence in trading with the pounds, fidelity in the use of talents, and patience in watching (Mt 2511, Lk 1912, Probably this thought is contained also in the identification of true life with the knowledge is not merely an intellectual apprehension; it is a spiritual fellowship. It implies ethical likeness through surrender of the whole being to the Divine Such likeness can be seenred only through long conformity of the heart and mind and will to God. A pure heart is the organ of such a vision of God (Mt 5°).

(3) There are definite statements as to the meanwhereby this ethical likeness to the Father is prayer. There are fifteen references to His prayers in the Gospels. It is specially noteworthy that He betook Himself to prayer when any fierce tempta-tion assailed Him (Lk 5<sup>16</sup> 9th, Jn 12<sup>57</sup>, Mt 25th), when any work of critical importance had to be undertaken (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>, Jn 11<sup>42</sup> 17), or when He was exhausted with toil (Mk 1<sup>26</sup>, Mt 14<sup>28</sup>); and that it was while He was praying that He was anointed with the Holy Spirit (Lk 3n), and that He was transfigured (9°). But it is clear also that He was accustomed to pray on all occasions (cf. 10°1 11° 22°2 23°4). It is instructive, therefore, that He nrged men to pray (Mt 5°4 6° 26°4), Lk 11° 18°1 21°4). He encouraged prayer by promising large blessing (Mt 77-11, Mk 1134). He declared that true prayer 'justified' a man (Lk 1814) All these references seem to make it clear that prayer ministers to our sanctification.

(b) Self denial. Jesus had a very definite philosophy of life; but it was clean contrary to worldly wisdom. He summarized it thus. Enter ye in by the narrow gate: . . . for narrow is the gate, and straitened the way, that leadeth unto life and strategiou one way, that readed unto the (Mt 7<sup>18</sup>, 1<sup>4</sup>||). 'Whosoever will lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, shall save it' (Mk 8<sup>20</sup>,), Self-denial is thus taught not for its own sake, but as the only way to reach self-perfection (16°° ||).
(c) Good works. We have noticed the emphasis put by Jesus on works of love and meny. It must be pointed out now that He taught their sanctifying efficacy. The blessed of the Father, who inherit the Kingdom, have qualified by good works (25<sup>31-60</sup>). The young ruler could be perfect if he would keep the commandments (19<sup>24</sup>), and the lawyer could inherit eternal life in the same way (Lik 10<sup>30</sup>). Several times Jesus promised a reward for obedience, fidelity, and diligence (cf. Mt 25th <sup>14-80</sup>, Lk 19<sup>13-37</sup>, Mk 10<sup>23-37</sup>,); and if heavenly rewards are granted to those morally fit, as taught clearly by the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19), these passages imply that sanctification is advanced by a life of obedience to God's will. (d) Faith in Christ. There is a large group of passages in all the Gospels, and there are specially important discourses in John, in which Jesus Christ is offered to men as a means of their sanctification.

(a) Sometimes mancification is promised to those who copy. His example. This is done in the gracious invitation (lift 18-39). Learning of Jesus, we may become meek and lowly in heart, which with Him under the yoke which He wears and which He graciously invites us to share, we may become meek and lowly in heart, which wears and such that the graciously invites us to share, we may been our burden cally. It is also taught by Him claim to be the one Master whom all are to obey (Mt 2315).

(3) Sanctification is bound up with obedience to His teaching. The wise man is one who builds on the words of Jesus (Mt 731). He offered His words as the rock of eternal truth on which mee may build for eternity, in place of the shifting sand of opinious and hypothesis which will not continue. Elemity will put the strain of judgment upon the characters we are building, and only those characters resting on the rock of His words will stand the strain to $2.50. The mans truth is taught in the impressive words of Mt 1025.21. To confess Him and His words will stand the strain to make them the foundation for conduct. The same sentiment is expressed in Jin 52. He that "content no line judgment, because 'he hath passed out of death into life,' is one in whom the sigms of sanctification are recognized. This sanctified man is 'he that hearth my word and televeth him that sent me.

(5) Sanctification is secured by union with Jesus as the 80s.

is one in season in the that bearers my same that sent me that sent me (5) Nanctification is secured by union with Jesus as the Son (5) Nanctification is secured out that 'knowledge of the state of the sent that the sent the sent that the sent that the sent the sent that the sent the sent that the sent that the sent the sent the sent that the sent that the sent that the sent the sent that the sent that the sent the sent the sent the sent the sent the sent that the sent the s

annulfied man is 'he that beareth my word and believeth him that sent me

(2) Sanctification is secured by union with Jesus as the Bost of God. It has been printed out that 'howledge of the Father' is one of Jesus Christ's descriptions of sanctification. And a very solemn claim made by Jesus is that 'none knoweth the Father sore the bod, and he to whomsover the Son wheth to reveal him (Mt 117). The Son willed to reveal the knoweth to reveal him (Mt 117). The Son willed to reveal the Father to all, for the very next word is, Cone unto me all ye that lanour but there is no relaxing of the claim that men must come to Him and learn of Him if they would know the Father; if Jn 88 198.

(b) Separate reference mas be revealed only by One who fulfill perfectly the complementary relationship.

(b) Separate reference may be made to the discourses in John's Gospel, because these amplify the teaching in the Symopties, though the germa are found there. We may note the claim of Jesus to be the light of the world (Jn 812 26 12 8 36 8) and if 18 8 3 3 9), to be the living water (72 8 49), to be the living water (72 8 49), to be the living water (73 8 49). The set figures imply that men must follow Him If they would walk in the ways of holmess and must sustain their life by union with Him, if they would have it string and definitely in the words, 'He that exictly not described quite definitely in the words, 'He that exictly not described quite definitely in the words. 'He that exictly not firsh and draintely in the words as the means of ancidication is described public described quite definitely in the words in the public to the elements offered to the participant in the Lord's suppers. But such an interpreted accramentally as referring solely to the elements of another direct claim on the part of Jesus to be our Sanctification (cf. 146 153.4 10). It leads us naturally to the very important text 1717-19. Jesus prayed for His disciples, 'Sanctify them in the truth: thy word is truth.... For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth.' 'Sanctify' seems to be used here with its full meaning. The idea of consecration is not absent (cf. v.18 and RVm); but vv. 14-18 prove that the ethical significance is prominent. This sanctification is secured 'in truth.' The truth is identified with 'thy word,' which has been given to the disciples by Jesus (v.14) partly by His words (1410), and partly by His character and example (14149). The thought seems to be that the disciples are to be sanctified by abiding in this revelation, and by being led farther and farther into it. 'The "truth"... is (as it were) the element into which the believer is introduced and by which he is changed. The "truth" is not only a power within him by which he is moved; it is an atmosphere in which he lives. The end of the truth is not wisdom, which is partial, but holiness, which is universal' (Westcott, in loco.). This teaching finds more complete expression throughout chs. 14-16. The disciples must abide in Christi, who is the true Vine, if they would bear much fruit (161-8). When the Master is gone, He will send another Conforter, the Spirit of Truth, who will guide 'into all truth' (1416. H. 26 1526 163-10). They are in the truth already; but they will be guided into its deeper recesses by the Spirit of truth. Thus they will be sanctified, knowing the Father more perfectly as He is revealed in the Son (164-9), and bearing much fruit through this knowledge (167). All their consecration of themselves at sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified. You have a series of the words to the rows in the prayer seems to be to His decide (167). All their consecration of themselves and sone of Jesus Christ's sanctification of Himself is primarily His devotion

At the same time the reference of Jn 17<sup>19</sup> cannot be confined to His death, if only because His sanctification of Himself in His death was but the perfect flower of a life that was one long sanctification. His death cannot be isolated from His life. He came into the world to save sinners; and His entire earthly experience ministered to that salvation. At each critical stage He sanctified Himself: the act of the critical moments reflected His daily temper. It is this continued sanctification, culminating in His death, that is the means of the sanctification of His disciples. See, further, on the sanctification of Christ, art. Consecratic, Consecratic, in vol. i.

(3) The passages quoted have led us already to the teaching of Jesus that our sanctification is 'through the Holy Spirit.' Although this teaching is developed in John, it is not absent from the Synoptic tradition. The unpardonable sin is blasphemy against the Holy Spirit—called 'an eternal sin' (Ms 29 ||). Luke's Gospel substitutes 'give the Holy Spirit 'for 'give good things' (Lk 113, cf. Mt 711), All the Synoptists concur in ascribing to Jesus the promise, 'The Holy Spirit shall teach you what you ought to say' (Lk 1212, Mt 1020, Mk 1311). Moreover, a large place is given to the Spirit in the sanctification of Jesus. His miraculous birth is ascribed to the Spirit (Mt 118, Lk 135). The descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at His saptism was the Father's anointing in response to the Son's consecration (Mk 110.11 ). It was the Spirit that drove Him into the wilderness to be tempted (Mk 112 ||). Jesus returned to His work 'in the power of the Spirit' (Lk 414), and He claimed to fulfil the prophecy, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me' (418). In answer to the charge that He cast out devils by Beelzebub, He asserted that He cast them out 'by the Spirit of God' (Mt 1228). These texts furnish considerable material for a doctrine of sanctification through the Spirit.

But the doctrine is stated very clearly in Jn 14-16. The Holy Spirit is described as the alter ego of Jesus: He will do for the disciples, after their Master's departure, what the latter has done for them during His earthly life (Jn 14<sup>16-18</sup>). The Spirit of truth will abide with the disciples and will be in them (14<sup>17</sup>). He will teach them (14<sup>20</sup>), and will guide them into all truth, declaring to them things that are to come (16<sup>13</sup>). He will also convict the world of sin, of righteousness, of judgment (16<sup>2</sup>). The promise of the Spirit is the consolation offered by Jesus in view of His approaching departure (16<sup>2</sup>); and His coming will secure their loyalty and their development. Indeed, it may be said that the language of Jesus suggests that the Holy Spirit will be Himself returning in His glorified spiritual nature, and continuing in more complete form the work He has begun in the disciples during His ministry.

2. Christ and sanctification in the NT outside the Gospels.

(1) The teaching of St. Peter.—The Petrine conceptions are simple and practical. 1 Peter exhorts to the practice of various virtues that go to make up the Christian character. The starting-point for Christian sanctification is entirely reminiscent of the teaching of Jesus: it is found in the obliga-tion of Christians as children of a holy Father, whose holiness constrains theirs (1 P 1<sup>14, 15, 16</sup>). The attainment of holiness is called 'salvation' (1<sup>k.9</sup>); and 'the two pillars of salvation are the sufferings and death of Christ and the resurrection and exaltation of Christ' (Beyschlag). He is the Son of God whose resurrection 'begat us again' (12). He is the Lamb whose offering has redeemed Christians from their old sins (118.19). He is 'the chief corner-stone' of that temple of God in which Christians are placed as living stones (25. 6). He is the Example for all who are suffering (221): especially has He shown us the right attitude to sin by His suffering for sins (2<sup>22-24</sup>). By giving Himself to die for us, He has become the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls (2<sup>25</sup>). He is 'the Lord' who is to be revered in our hearts (3<sup>15</sup>). He is the adorable Saviour whose name is potent enough to secure our devotion (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>). Finally, He is the coming One, whose appearing will consummate the purposes of God, and will perfect us in salvation (17 510). Thus Jesus Christ focusses all Christian effort and hope and faith upon Himself. The Christ who lived, died, and rose again, and was exalted—the Christ of the Gospels, whom Peter had known (13.8)—is the Divine original for our sanctification, and is the Divine Mediator through whom our deliverance from sin is accomplished.

(2) The teaching of St. John.—It is to be noted that St. John makes very slender use of the gyors group of words. In this he is like his Master. In his First Epistle 'sanctify' and 'sanctification' do not occur. 'Holy' is used only once, and then in reference to God (1 Jn 220). In Revelation 'holy is found frequently. It describes God Almighty (48), Jesus Christ (37 610), the City of God (112 212-10 (221), men (2211). Also in Revelation 'saints' is constantly used to describe believers in Jesus Christ. But though the more usual words are absent from the Epistle, it is a passionate plea for sanctification in Christ. John describes sanctificasanctineation in Christ. John describes sanctineation under such phrases as 'walking in light' (17 211), 'not sinning' (21 36 518 [the idea of a prevailing habit being prominent]), 'keeping his commandments' (28 322 24 52 3), 'overcoming the world' (54 5, cf. 213 14 44, and Rev 27 11 23 35 12 21 1211 217), 'having life' or 'having eternal life' (2<sup>25</sup> 3)<sup>14</sup> 15 511. 12. 13. 16. 26, and cf. Rev 2<sup>7</sup> 10 3 13 17 2012. 15 21 16. 27 221. 2 14. 17. 19). The core of sanctification is love ( $4^{16-19}$ ), manifested toward God ( $2^{15}$   $4^{20}$   $5^{1.2}$ ), and towards brethren ( $2^{10}$   $3^{10-18}$   $4^{7-12.$   $2^{30.21}$ ). This sanctification is connected intimately with the Person and work of Jesus Christ. He is the propitiation for sins, through whom believers are forgiven, and by whose blood they are cleansed from sin (1<sup>7</sup>-2<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>). He is the Advocate upon whom we may rely for help in the struggle with sin (21). He is the Ideal towards whom all Christian effort must be directed (3<sup>2, 16</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>). He is the Son of the Father, whose presence in the world manifests the Father's love (3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 10. 14. 16), and through whom believers may become possessed of the Father (2<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). So He brings to men that eternal life which makes sin impossible (3° 518); and He communicates to them that eternal love which is the very essence of goodness because it is the essence of God (4<sup>12</sup> <sup>16</sup>). So intimate is this connexion between Christ and sanctification, that the object of His manifestation is declared to be to take away sins' (3<sup>5</sup>), and to destroy the works of the devil,' which are 'sins' (3<sup>7-10</sup>). It is clear, therefore, that St. John, as well as St. Peter, conceives Christ's redeeming work under the category of sanctification, and also conceives sanctification as possible only through faith in Christ. them view sanctification as a state into which the believer is introduced by an initial act of faith in Christ, through whom he is begotten of God (1 P 13. 18. 23 23. 9, 1 Jn 19 51); but it is also a state which has to be progressively realized by abiding union with Christ (1 P 1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>).

(3) The teaching of St. Paul.—This may be summed up under the chief categories used by St.

Paul to describe Jesus Christ's relation to men.

(a) Jesus Christ as the second Adam.—St. Paul thought of Adam as the pioneer of the race; and he could not escape the responsibility of pioneers. The entire subsequent history of the race is influenced by the course taken by the first man. His sin caused a divergence from the path of rectitude, which grew wider as the race progressed, because the initial direction was wrong. Jesus Christ was introduced into the world as a new pioneer. He was not an ordinary child of the race. He did not inherit the entail of bias to evil. 'The first man is of the earth, earthy' (1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>). He was the child of an animal ancestry, and was weighted by animal instincts: to him holiness was only a possi-bility. 'The second man is of heaven.' His antecedents were spiritual. With Him holiness was the instinct, and evil was only a possibility. So He gave a new start in the direction of holiness. He stopped the race's drift from God, and He began a new movement Godward (Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>20-26</sup>, 45-49). Therefore all who become followers of Jesus Christ are rescued from the fatal effects of Adam's sin. They are led into the right road and are under the direct influence of the Spirit of God (Ro 8<sup>12-17</sup>). Thus they are being sanctified in accordance with the will of God, and will be brought at last to the perfect state He has designed for them (cf. Ro 521 8<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>49, 54</sup>).

(b) A corollary from the previous thought is that men may be 'in Christ.' The second Adam is more than a leader of a redeemed race. He is the Head of a new humanity, which secures its life from Him by vital communion with Him. He brought new spiritual energy into the world: this energy can be communicated to all who are united to Him by faith. The bonds between the first Adam and the race were physical and mechanical; those between the second Adam and the race are spiritual and personal (cf. Jn 5<sup>21-29</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>45</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>. 13). This state of union between Christ and the believer Inis state or union between Christ and the believer is described by St. Paul under the phrase 'in Christ'; and it is mentioned as a condition of sanctification (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>6<sup>11</sup>; cf. Ro 1<sup>6,7</sup>, Eph 1<sup>1,4,7,11,13</sup> 2<sup>10,13</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 1<sup>2</sup>). The idea is the Master's (cf. 'I am the vine, ye are the branches,' Jn 15<sup>5</sup>): He connected it with sanctification (15<sup>4-6</sup>). St. Paul emphasized this message. Thus we are 'complete in him' (Col 2<sup>10</sup>). Every human being competing in him' (Col 210). Every human being comes into the world as a possibility. A process of involution must go forward, by which the germinal life will absorb from its environment those elements that minister to its development. Our moral possibilities can be realized only when we are 'in Christ.' The soul that lives without Him is stunted, or maimed, or becomes a moral freak. The soul that lives 'in him' becomes 'complete.' All the fulness that can realize our possibilities is gathered into Him (Col 2°). He is the way in which men must 'walk' who would attain to holiness, the plant in which men must be 'rooted' who would bear much fruit, the plan according to which men's lives must be 'built up' if they are to become temples of God (Col 2<sup>6.7</sup> 1<sup>22</sup>, and cf. Jn 15<sup>1-10</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>).

(c) Another category used by St. Paul is Jesus Christ's death and resurrection as the source of the believer's renewal. This thought has affinities with the preceding one. But it shows, from another standpoint, how intimately the Apostle connects our sanctification with Christ. The teaching is developed in Ro 6; it occurs also in Ro 8<sup>11</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14-15</sup>, Col 2<sup>12-13</sup> 3<sup>1-4</sup>. The believer is associated with the Saviour in His death and resurrection. These crises are not only an ideal for the Christian, but also an experience which in some real spiritual sense he shares with his Lord. By them Jesus Christ became the Conqueror of sin and death. The believer identifies himself with Jesus Christ in the spiritual significance of these tremendous events: then he becomes 'dead unto sin and alive unto God,' though actually he is rather dying than dead to sin, and though the physical process of dissolution has still to be faced—but without its sting. This union with Christ secures the imparting of eternal life, and makes the believer a 'new creature' (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>), who is renewed in holiness. Such teaching harmonizes with the demand of Jesus for a new birth (Jn 33).

(d) A fourth category is the work of the Spirit using the truth 'as it is in Jesus' as His instrument in sanctification. This is another of the ideas of Jesus emphasized by St. Paul. The Pauline Epistles connect sanctification with the work of the Holy Spirit (cf. especially Ro 8, 1 Co 2, 3<sup>16, 17</sup> 12). 'The Spirit's function is, before all things, to help the Christian to be holy '(Bruce, St. Paul's Conception Christian to be holy' (Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 248). The instrument used by the Spirit in sanctifying men is the revelation made in Jesus Christ. This had been foretold by the Master (Jn 16<sup>14</sup>); St. Paul sees His word fulfilled in all the work of the Spirit. 'The Lord' and 'the Spirit' are identified sometimes (2 Co 3<sup>17, 18</sup>), and the Spirit dwelling in the heart (cf. Eph 3<sup>17</sup>, Ro 8a. 19, 2 Ti 1<sup>14</sup>). Man is pictured as a shrine in which the Spirit dwells. This 'temple of the Holy Spirit' must be kent from all defilement, and must Spirit' must be kept from all defilement, and must ever be made worthier of its Divine guest (1 Co 316. 17 619. 20, 2 Co 616).

(e) The Church as the Body of Christ is an important Pauline conception. It bears upon the problem of sanctification, inasmuch as the moral health of each individual member is influenced by the condition of the body (1 Co 12<sup>12-27</sup>, Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>, Col 219). The Apostle does not contemplate Christians remaining outside the visible Church, and he always assumes that a Christian's sanctification will be perfected within its fellowship. This does not imply any sacramental conception of sanctification. It rests upon the conviction that the Church is indwelt by the living Christ (Eph 123, Col 124). Therefore all believers who remain living members of the Church maintain a vital union with their Lord, through means of His own appointing. This secures their due spiritual development.

(f) Finally, we may note St. Paul's thought of Jesus as 'Lord.' This name was used by the early Church to express their faith about Jesus. All the NT books reflect the usage, except the Epistles of John. But, owing perhaps to the circumstances of his conversion (Ac 95), the designation dominates

3. Church History. It only remains to offer a very brief suggestion as to the historical development of the idea of sanctification in its relation to the Person and work of Jesus Christ. Four outstanding modifications of the idea may be men-

(1) The first is the monastic idea of sanctification. It had affinities with tendencies that are native to man; and it gained ground in the 4th cent., when multitudes of semi-converted pagans were pressing into the Church Although it took its laws from the recorded life and teaching of Jesus Christ, it cannot be recognized as a fruit of vital union with Him. Rather it must be regarded as a product of a restless age of rapid enlargement, reacting upon the longing for reposeful communion with God. During this time the Church's interest in Christ was academic rather than practical, theological rather than religious. Thus men were left to seek holiness by methods of their own devising,

(2) The second idea of sanctification is the mediweal. This has many points of union with the monastic; but it shows a much closer relation to Christ. The restlessness had given place to torpor. This drove earnest souls back to Jesus. Many of the monastic evils permeated Europe, and there was very little imitation of Christ amongst the masses of the people. But the medieval idea of holiness is characterized by a growing devotion to the Lord Jesus, which found expression sometimes in such fervent hymns as those of Bernard, sometimes in such service of the poor as was nobly car-ried through by Francis of Assisi, and sometimes in such seeking after liberty as has immortalized Wyclif.

(3) The third idea of sanctification is connected with the Reformation. That movement placed all the emphasis upon Christ's work for us. One result was the upgrowth of an idea of sanctification as something objective. It was almost identified with justification. Christians are sanctified by receiving the robe of righteousness from Jesus Christ.

(4) The fourth or modern idea of sanctification tends to place the emphasis upon Christ's work in us. Sanctification is much more subjective. This is a development which should be welcomed. But care must be taken lest the reaction from a too objective idea of sanctification by Christ leads to a too subjective idea of sanctification in Christ which fails to give the NT emphasis to both aspects of Christ's work.

It may be pointed out that the modern idea of sanctification in Christ has been approached from the standpoint of the work of the Holy Spirit. What is known as the 'Keswick School' has rendered valuable service by calling attention to the Personality of the Holy Spirit, and to His power to sanctify the human soul. But it must be remembered that the Holy Spirit is Christ's alter ego. Rightly understood, this modern development leads us to the Panline position, that 'Christ Jesus is made unto us . . . sanctification' (1 Co 180).

made unto us..., sanctification? (I Co 120).

BAND (4µµos) .- Sand, which, however closely packed and hard, seems almost to melt at the touch of water, is a foundation on which only a fool would build (Mt 72). St. Luke in the parallel passage gives in the parallel passage gives in the parallel passage of the earth, baked hard in the heat, goes swiftly to soft mud when the rains come.

W. EWING. SARDAL, SHOE,- A covering for the feet was rendered necessary by the burning heat of the ground as well as by the presence of stones and thorns. Such protection was especially required by men on a journey, by shepherds on the hills, and by peasants when cutting wood or collecting thorns for fuel. An Oriental shepherd with bare feet and a crook-headed staff is one of the ignorant traditions of Western sacred art. The sandal consisted of a thick sole of leather attached to the foot by thongs of the same material. The transition to the shoe form was marked by a slipper like cover and a supporting band behind the heel, which latter, however, the wearer often preferred to press down when walking. In the East the foot can only be alluded to apologetically, and reference to the shoe is one of the commonest expressions of contempt. worthy to unloose the latchet of His shoe was an intense repudiation of all thought of comparison with Christ (Jn 1<sup>31</sup>). As the shoe was in immediate contact with the common ground, it was removed at the entrance to houses and sacred buildings. As socks are not usually worn in the East, dust is effectively removed either by taking off the shoe and beating it on a stone, or by projecting the foot with the toes bent upwards so that the dust may fall out from the open heel of the shoe (Mt 1014).

The Roman soldier, like the Eastern shepherd, had nails in the shoe to prevent shipping, and thus the missionary symbolism of Eph  $\theta^{13}$  meant determination as well as direction.

1. Names and Composition. (a) Of the schole hody (a) Greek (1) swellpros, so first, in point of historical reference, in Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 3-5, and thereafter frequent in Josephus and NT (2) yepowrla, first, in point of reference, in Ant. XII. iii. 3; frequent in OT Apocrapha, once in NT, Ac 5<sup>12</sup> (cf. below). (3) βουλή, fairly frequent in Josephus, especially in the BJ, but NT never uses βουλή in this sense, though Solderrie is used of Joseph of Arimathas in Mk 150 and Lk 2300 (4) npeopletion, or saids raw Teporolymrar, esp. in the Fitn, with special reference to the Sanhedrin (3) Hebrew. (1) In the Talmudic literature the commonest word is 17770, a transliteration of serespior, also written the reigning high priest, and presumably designates the Sanhedrin.

These names throw light upon the composition and functions of the court. συνέδριον suggests a court of justice, and so, still more explicitly, does party yepowa is a term applied only to aristocratic councils, and the Hasmoniean '77 suggests an aristocratic body associated with the monarch."

(b) Of its component parts. Quite as suggestive are the names of the various classes of members of the court. The principal expressions, ignor ing minor variations, are of degrees, of degrees, of specification, of specific points, of specific points, of γραμματείτ. Some of these terms are interchange α γραβιτεροι, α συστοι, α πρωτοι, α γρωμαι, α γραμματείτ. Some of these terms are interchange able, or nearly so, and they fall into three main classes. (1) Most important of all were the dρχιερείε, the chief priests, the members of the sacerdotal aristocracy. In Jusephus and NT they are almost invariably mentioned first when the names of the classes composing the Sanhedrin are given (cf. Mt  $27^{41}$ ; Jos. BJ II. xvii. 2, and fre quently). Often they are the only class particularly mentioned (cf. Mk 14th si degrees sat they resulted according to Josephus and NT (cf. Ac 5<sup>17</sup>, which testifies not only to the presidency of the high priest, but also to the fact that the priestly party was Salducee; of also Jos. Ant. XIV. is 3-5, and other passages from both sources). This is in agreement with the general constitution of the post-exilic Jewish community, in which civil-as well as religious authority was in the hands of the high priest. The priestly nobility were the leading persons in the community, and they were the most conspicuous members of the Sanhedrin. See CHIEF PRIESTS, HIGH PRIEST. The doxerres may the roughly identified with the description as the rulers of the community. Occasionally they are mentioned where one would expect description frequently in Josephus (cf. Ac 4° root descriptions). τούν πρασβιτέρουν καὶ τοὺς γραμματείς, v δρχωτες τοῦ λαοῦ καὶ πρεσβίτεροι  $^{1}$  v,  $^{20}$  οἱ δρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ πρεσβίτεροι  $^{1}$  v,  $^{20}$  οἱ δρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ πρεσβίτεροι  $^{1}$ Very occasionally, thowever, the degover wery occasionally, however, the apports are mentioned alongside of the deputable (cf. Lk. 23<sup>13</sup>), showing that the term might be used loosely for 'leaders' or 'mlers' (2) πρισβίστεροι - 0.35°, in the first instance a general name for the principal men of the community, and so, apparently, a general designation of members of the Sanbedrin (cf. προσβυτέριου). But in actual practice it describes those members who were neither dρχωρείς nor γραμματείε. The πρεσβύτεροι made common cause with the agrees against the premaris, it they belonged in general to the Sadducee party (cf. Ac 23<sup>11</sup>). With this class may be identified the δυστοί, πρώτοι, οτ γνώριμοι (unless qualified in some way, an, γνώριμοι τών Φαμεσίων). Josephus frequently uses δινατοί along with άρχαρεῖε, evi dently as the equivalent of wpcosirepos. They were the secular nobility of Jerusalem, closely allied to the secular nobility of Jerusalem, closely allied to the sacerdotal aristocracy. (3) of prammers, the scribes, a class which hardly requires description here. In the main they formed the Pharisee element in the Sanhedrin, though individual members of the other classes may have been Pharisees, and many Pharisees, adhering to the scribal party, were not themselves professional scribes. See SCRIBES.

These names indicate with a Saint classes.

These names indicate with sufficient clearness the general character and composition of the court. It was an aristocratic assembly and high court of justice, in which, alongside of the priestly nobility * Ac 58 presents a certain difficulty in its use of the phrasers encoded as a consistency according to this, the promotes would have a wider meaning than evolution, whereas in OT Apos typha it is the regular word for evolution. The identity of the two terms can hardly be doubted, as there is no exidence of the existence of any other court to which the name yacona might be applied. As it is unnatural to take as in an explanatory wease (1/2) here it must be supposed that the author need one of the words loose x, regarding existence as an inner circle within the general court. and the noble faudles outside the priestly circle, representatives of the more numerous Pharisee party found a place, the Sadduces element, however, retaining the weight of influence.

As to the method of appointment to the San-

As to the method of appointment to the Sanhedrin, nothing definite can be gathered from the Greek sources. According to the Mishna, new members were appointed by the court itself. At trist, membership was confined to the aristocratic families. Subsequently the political rulers of the country seem to have appointed members by their own authority in some cases at least (cf. Salome's introduction of a Pharises element).

country seem to have appointed members by their own authority in some cases at least (cf. Salome's introduction of a Pharises element).

The Greek sources agree in giving one picture of the flanshedrin, while the Mishale representation is radically different. That the representations are notucally treconcilable, and that that of the Greek sources is preferable in all respects, is now generally recognized by echolars, and the point requires to be stated rather than argued here. According to the Greek sources, as appears from the above, the Sanhedrin was composed of their present, elders, and arches, and was presided over by the high preset. The chief priests and elders belonged in general to the Sankdiuces party, while the arches formed the Pharises element, which, however influential among the people, was action in the ascendant in the Sankdium. The Sanhedrin was thus a political assembly and court of Justice, representing in the main the artiforratic elements in the desirable court of Rabbia, presided over by the leading Rabbia of the time, in which the prestity element as much does not appear, while the Saddiuces are inentioned only as hereton to be refuted. The presiden Rabbia breast the title Nam (otherwise a political title), and another, apparently the vice-president, in called Abbita Just. It was an evilentatival rather than a nolitical assembly. The irreconcilability of the two representations is most marked in the answer they give to the question, Who was the President of the Sanhedrin? We have into of Rabbia filling the offices of Nam and Abbita-line during the period the high priest president according to the Mishna, but in a 54 he appears supply as "General existing the actual time totally changed conditions. 3. History. The Mishne tradition connects the Sanhedrin with Moses' seventy elders, then with the alleged Great Synagogue of Exras time, then with such names of leading Rabbis as had escaped oblivion (cf. opening sections of Picky Aboth), and so gives the Sanhedrin of Jammia an appearance of historical continuity with the past. In point of fact, however, the Sanhedrin emerges into authentic history first in the Greek period. It must have existed earlier, but its origin is covered by the darkness which obscures all Jewish history from the time of Nehemiah (and even earlier) till the Maccabean rising. The poet-exilic Jewish community was nominally a theocracy, enjoying a certain measure of independence under foreign rule. At its bead was the high priest, who was awisted by a proceed consisting chiefly of members of the aristocratic sacerdotal caste. The administration of secular affairs tended to produce in this caste a certain worldliness, a more or less exclusive interest in worldly business and culture, and con-sequently a readmoss to fall under the influence of Hellenism. Passively opposed to them were the Hashlim, the pious students of the Law and the legal tradition, whose interests and aspirations were exclusively religious and ecclesiastical. When the crisis came under Antiochus Epiphanes, the aristorratic caste, and consequently the reposets, or Sanhedrin, was in the main ready to yield completely to the pressure of an enforced Hellenism. The Hastdim continued to offer steadfast but passive resistance to the persecutor. There areas, however, a third group, consisting of men who, while not specially in sympathy with the Handton, wished to maintain the ancient religion and also the liberties of the people. The Hannonean family led them in armed revolt, and under the skilful leaders by the lader. Macaning and his brothers leadership of Judas Maccabens and his brothers they not only regained religious liberty, but achieved the political independence of the Jewish State, of which the Hasmonicans and their loyal followers became the rulers. The old aristocracy was practically destroyed, and the remnants of it were forced to acquiesce in the rule of the new dynasty. The Hasildian, who had supported the Hasmons and until liberty of religion was secured, drifted away from them as the political aspect of the struggle became more prominent, and resumed towards them the same attitude of passive opposition which had characterized their relation to the older aristocracy. They were especially incensed at the Hasmonean assumption of the title and functions of the high-priesthood, which they re-garded as usurpation and as a secularizing of the theoracy. At the time of John Hyrcanus, there-fore, the Sanhedrin consisted of adherents of the Hasmongan dynasty the new aristocracy combined with the remnants of the old, representing two of the three elements of the later court, the chief priests and the elders and was overwhelmingly, if not exclusively, Sadduces. The Pharisees, the representatives of the earlier Hasialian, stood and devoted themselves to the cultivation of their moral and religious influence with the people it became necessary to concluse them, and Hyrcanus made an effort to do so.* But their terms were too high. They demanded that Hyrcanus should resign the high presthood, and thus destroy the constitution and government which his father and uncles had established. His refusal to concede the demand made the opposition of the Pharisees to the ruling party more acute, and under Alexander Janneus there was open war. The Sanhedrin, composed as it was of the Hasmonean nobility, supported Jannaus. But the attitude of the people showed that the Pharises could no longer with safety be left in opposition. But the Salone reversed the policy of her predecesors, and admitted them to a share in the government—for a time the dominant share—and to the Sanhedrin.

From that time onwards the Sanhedrin conmisted of chief priests, elders, and scribes. It was a house divided against itself, and the bitter conflicts of Sadducee and Pharisee contributed in no small degree to the confusion and decay of the century and a half preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. The path of the Romans and of the Herodian house was made smooth by the inability of the Sanhedrin to act in unity and lead a united people. Pompey abrogated the kingship, but left the high priest at the head of the people and of the Sanhedrin, as heretofore. Gabrius went further, and established five one for in place of the single court, thus largely destroying its influence (57-55 B.C.). Some years later, however, the Sanhedrin was restored to its former position, and resumed the exercise of authority over the whole Jewish territory. Herod is stated to have commonced his reign with a massacre of the members of the Sanhedrin (Jos. Ast. XIV. ix. 4). According to another account (ib. XV. i. 2), he put to death 45 members of the party of Antigonus. His object was to destroy the influence of the Sadducee nobility, his consistent opponents and only possible rivals. With the same object in view, he reduced the dignity and importance of the high-priesthood by making it no longer hereditary and tenable for life, and by frequent changes. Under his rule the Sanhedrin had but little influence,—less probably than at any other time. Herod's death was followed by the dismemberment of his kingdom, and the authority of the Sanhedrin ceased to extend beyond the limits of Judges.

The government of the Roman procurators was on the whole favourable to the Sanhedrin. They had not the Herodian jealousy of the local nobility, and were content to leave considerable powers of internal control in their hands. Josephus and the NT bear witness to the influence and authority of the Sanhedrin during this period. So long as it rotained control of the people, there was a fair measure of peace and good government. Ultimately, however, the people, under the influence of the Zealots, became unmanageable, and, against the advice of the older and more experienced aristocrats, embarked on the fatal revolt against the Roman authority. Even then the Sanhedrin, had it been left to itself, might have saved Jerusalem from total destruction. But the Zealots usurped its authority, rid themselves of those who connselled moderation, and inaugurated a Reign of Terror, which was terminated only by the entry of the Roman troops into the city.

Under the totally new conditions which prevailed after the destruction of Jerusalem, a new court established itself, bearing the name 'Sanhedrin,' but differing in essential features from the older body. The new Sanhedrin had no political authority, and was composed exclusively of Rabbis, whose discussions and decisions were mainly theoretical. It exercised considerable judicial authority over the Jewish people, owing to its moral influence, but was quite without governmental importance. The real Sanhedrin fell with

3. Panctions and anthority. The trustworthy sources give only incidental indications of the functions of the Sanhedrin and the extent of its authority. The changes in the constitution, also, from the time of the Maccabean rising to the fall of the city, were so great and so frequent, that it is difficult to say how much authority was actually vested in the Sanhedrin it any one time. Under the Hasmoneaus it must have been considerable, both in administration and jurisdiction, though the stronger kings, like Janneus, may have tuled very independently. It was nough nore limited under the Herodian kings, whose authority was quite independent of the Jewish constitution. By the Romans the constitution was as far as possible respected, and the Sanhedrin, though subordinate to the Roman authority, had again considerable powers, perhaps greater than at any other time. The system of short tenure of the high priestly office would throw more influence into the hands of the permanent body. In these later days also, its moral authority over the Jewish people was much wider than its actual power. Territorially its actual authority extended under the procurators over Judæa only. On the other hand, its recommendations were regarded by orthodox Jews outside Judgea as possessing the force of commands (cf. Ac 92). In general, it may be said that under the procurators the Sanhedrin exercised such authority as was not either within the competence of local councils or reserved by the Romans, and that, while it had considerable powers of police administration and in the levying of taxes, and a certain responsibility for the maintenance of order, its main function was that of a supreme judicial tribunal. Except in the case of capital sentences, its authority was absolute, and it had the power to carry its decisions into effect. An effective sentence of death could be pronounced only by the procurator's court. The stoning of Stephen (Ac 7571) without the sanction of the procurator was an illegal act, not an execution but a 'lynching.' the case of one offence, that of profanation of the sanctuary, even Roman citizens might be tried and condemned by the Sanhedrin, subject, of course, to the procurator's revision of the capital sentence. In spite, however, of the constitutional powers conceded to the Sanhedrin, the Roman authority was always absolute, and the procurator or the tribune of the garrison could not only summon the Sanhedrin and direct it to investigate a matter, but could interfere and withdraw a prisoner from its jurisdiction, as was done in the case of St. Paul (Ac 22<sup>80</sup> 23<sup>23f.</sup>).

&quot;Josephus (Ant viii x 5-6) relates a story which tells how Historius broke with the Phartsees to whom he had hitherto been attached and went over to the Sachiness. But a critical evan nath n of the story, and a comparison of its presuppositions with the presupositions with the presupositions with the Phartsees but an unsuccessful after pit to one had been them. There is no evidence that they sat in the Sanhedrin before Salome's change of policy Cf. Wellhausen, Phartsees and Sadduceses.

4. Sessions and procedure. — The Sanhedrin could sit on any day except the Sabbath and holy days; and as sentence of death could be pronounced (according to the Mishna) only on the day after a trial on a capital charge, such charges day after a trial on a capital charge, such charges were not heard on the day preceding a Sabbath or holy day. The place of meeting is called by Josephus the  $\beta \omega \lambda \dot{\eta}$ , and was near the Xystus, which appears to be indicated in the Mishnic right happears right ha livened by stirring debates, and by the stormy scenes which occasionally take place even in the most dignified political assemblies. In the case of ordinary trials, the procedure may have resembled that described in the Mishna. According to its account, the proceedings were conducted according to strict rules, and the members gave judgment in regular order. Twenty-three members formed a quorum, and while a bare majority might acquit, a majority of two was necessary to secure condemnation. If a majority of one gave a verdict of guilty, more members were summoned, until either the requisite majority was obtained for a legal verdict, or the full number of seventy-one members was reached, when a majority of one was decisive on either side.

The accounts of the trial of Jesus present considerable difficulty, and it is not easy to accommodate them to the regular procedure of the Sanhedrin. See art. TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST.

which in the NT is invariably used as a proper name denoting the arch-enemy of God and man, occurs in the Hebrew of the OT originally as a synonym of the common words for 'adversary,' as the verb pow is used simply in the sense of withstanding, taking the opposite side. In this sense it is used in Nu 2222 even of the angel of the Lord, who is said to go forth to be a Satan to Balaam. In other pasgo forth to be a Satan to Balaam. In other passages it is applied, with no sinister meaning, to David, who, as the Philistines feared, might desert Achish and turn against them in battle (1 S 294); to Abishai when he opposed David's purpose of clemency towards Shimei (2 S 1922); and again to a foreign enemy in general (1 K 54); and to Hadad and Rezon in connexion with their revolt against Solomon (1 K 114-23.25). Elsewhere, as in the Book of Pa (1095) in the first two cleanters of the Book of Ps. (1096), in the first two chapters of the Book of Job and in Zec 3 it is used in a technical or legal sense as the equivalent of drtloikos, an opponent in law, an advocate, whose function it is to plead for the condemnation of an accused person. In Job 23 Jehovah taxes 'the Satan' with over-officious zeal in his efforts to test the motives of the righteous man whom he is permitted to accuse; and again in man whom he is permitted to accuse; and again in Zec  $3^2$  He distinctly rebukes him for pressing his charge against Joshua. But notwithstanding such suggestions that an evil spirit, a malicious accuser, is described (like the Satan, the accuser of the brethren,  $\delta\iota d\beta o\lambda os$ ,  $\kappa a\tau \eta \gamma o\rho os$  of the NT), there is no explicit indication that this is the case. The being thus described as 'the Satan' or the Advergance appears in Zocherich as an official accuser. sary appears in Zechariah as an official accuser, and in the Book of Job he takes his place among 'the sons of God' in the court of heaven as one having a right to be there, and that in connexion with the function attributed to him of 'going to and fro upon the earth,' and 'considering' and reporting upon the conduct of the sons of men. He is recognized as a minister of the Divine justice, although God does tax him with overdoing his part. All that appears to be indicated there is the thought that there is in the Court of God one whose office it is to plead for the condemnation of sinners. Of a malignant enemy of God and His cause, a personal spirit of evil called Satan, there is no express mention in the OT. The temptation of our first parents is ascribed in Genesis to 'the serpent,' and no interpretation is offered of the serpent,' and no interpretation is offered of the symbolism of the story. Again, though in one passage in Chronicles (1 Ch 21') we read that Satan tempted David to number the people—a presumptuous offence for which the king was severely punished—the parallel passage (2 S 24'), much the older narrative, attributes David's conduct to trial at the hands of God, not to the temptation of the Evil One. Similarly the deception of the 'lying spirit' who lured Ahab to his destruction (1 K 22')1°-23' his said to have had the express sanction of 2219-23) is said to have had the express sanction of God. Altogether it is one of the most noteworthy features of the theology of the OT, that so little reference is made to Satan as the great adversary of God and His people, or as the malignant tempter and accuser of man. The Satan of the Book of Job and of the prophecies of Zechariah is described in language very different from that in which the arch-enemy is spoken of in the NT.

This fact, together with the circumstance that references to Satan as an accuser of mankind occur only in those books of the OT which belong to a comparatively late period, has been taken as a proof of the theory that the Jewish belief in Satanic agency was introduced into the Hebrew theology from a foreign source. Traces appear elsewhere of early beliefs current among the Hebrews in the existence of demons, satyrs, liliths, and the like, as in the use of the name 'Azazel,' a mysterious being mentioned in the Pentateuch in con-SATAN. — 1. The word 'Satan' (μρ. Σατανάς), nexion with the ordinance of the scapegoat (Lv 16). 570 SATAN SATAN

It has been supposed that upon those popular beliefs of early Semitic religion there was grafted, from Persian sources, the conception of a Prince of Darkness whose agency is similar to that which, in the religion of Zoroaster, is ascribed to the demon-god Ahriman, and that the belief in Satan and his angels as fallen spirits was thus introduced into Hebrew theology. But, as a matter of fact, the connexion between Satan and the Zoroastrian Ahriman is more apparent than real. A simpler explanation of the history of the doctrine of the personality and agency of Satan is that it has been the subject of development under the influence of a progressive revelation. The complete revelation of such a being as the malignant author of evil was reserved for the time when, with the advent of Christ's Kingdom, the minds of God's people were prepared, without risk of idolatry, or of the mischievous dualism of such a religion as that of Zoroaster, to recognize in the serpent of Eden and in the Satan who appeared as the adversary of Job and of Joshua, the great Adversary of God and man, whose power is to be feared and his temptations resolutely resisted, but from whose dark dominion the Son of God had come to deliver mankind.

2. If the OT is remarkable for its reticence on this subject, we find in the NT the doctrine of Satanic agency very fully developed. It meets us on the threshold. It is one of the most conspicuous elements of NT teaching. Jesus and His disciples distinctly assume the reality of Satan and his kingdom as a mighty power for evil, opposed to the Kingdom of God in the world and in the hearts of men. This is nowhere more noticeable than in the Gospels, and there in the direct teaching of our Lord. At the outset of the Gospel narrative Satan appears as the antagonist of Christ. The story of the Temptation, which must have been communicated to the disciples from the lips of Jesus Himself, is related by the three Synoptists. St. Mark (113) informs us that Jesus was forty days tempted of Satan, using that word or title as a proper name. St. Matthew (ch. 4) and St. Luke (ch. 4), who relate the incident with clear circumstantiality of detail, note three distinct temptations, in which they quote the arguments used by the Tempter and the answers returned by Jesus. They describe the Tempter as  $\delta$   $\delta d\beta o \lambda o s$ , 'the devil,' using the recognized word for betrayer or malicious accuser. According to St. Matthew's account, Jesus addresses him as 'Satan.' St. Luke concludes the narrative with the significant words, 'When the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season, as if to indicate that the conflict with Satan was renewed and continued throughout our Lord's ministry. St. Matthew tells us that when the devil left Him, angels came and ministered unto Him. Thus the Synoptic Gospels distinctly describe the source of the temptation as the direct suggestions of a person, and that one who is variously called Satan and 'the devil.'

Again, these same Gospels, as also the Acts of the Apostles, take notice of Christ's works of healing, and especially of those wrought upon persons possessed with demons, as illustrating the nature of His mission, which was to heal 'all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). St. Luke (22<sup>3</sup>) no less clearly than St. John (13<sup>2</sup>) informs us that Satan entered the heart of Judas and prompted him to betray his Lord.

In the recorded utterances of Jesus, in His express teaching, allusions are clearly made to the power and activity of Satan as a personal being, and the great Adversary of God and man. He attributes the trouble of the woman who had the spirit of infirmity to the malign power of Satan to afflict even the bodies of men (Lk 1318). Thus, so far from discouraging the popular belief which ascribed to Satan and his angels power over soul and body, Jesus distinctly acknowledged it. Accused by the Pharisees, representatives of those to whose speculations in angelology and demonology that popular belief has been traced, of casting out demons through Beelzebub the prince of demons, Jesus, so far from controverting or throwing doubt upon the current opinions of the time, repels the charge by the argument that if Satan should cast out Satan, he would only be defeating his own ends and destroying his own work. Then He proceeds to say, 'But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you' (Mt 1228, cf. Lk 1129), illustrating His argument by the similitude of the strong man and the Stronger than he, implying that Satan is the strong man who would enslave mankind, but that Jesus Himself is the Stronger than he, who has appeared for the deliverance of the victims of Satanic power. That Jesus should thus have argued in controversy with the Pharisees has its own significance. We cannot explain it away on the principle of accommodation. We cannot Jesus could and did rebuke the spirit of Pharisaic traditionalism which led them to introduce all manner of mischievous subtleties, making void the Law by their unauthorized traditions, but never once did He even cast suspicion upon this part of the doctrine of the Pharisees. He accepted it without question.

Again, when the Seventy expressed their joy at the success of their mission, and exclaimed, 'Lord, even the demons are subject unto us,' Jesus replied, 'I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven,' and went on to say, 'Behold, I give you power to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy' (Lk 10<sup>17-19</sup>). Passing over such passages as those in the Sermon on the Mount, 'Whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil' or 'the evil one' (Mt 5<sup>57</sup>); 'Deliver us from evil' or 'the evil one' (6<sup>13</sup>), which have been explained, and even, as in the RV, translated as referring to the personal Author of Evil, we find Jesus in His discourses and in warnings addressed to His disciples making distinct allusion to Satan as the great adversary whom they have cause to fear. In the parables of the Sower and the Tares, the Evil One, variously termed 'the devil,' 'Satan,' 'the enemy,' 'the wicked one,' is described as seeking to frustrate the work of Christ by catching away the good seed sown in the heart (Mt 13<sup>19</sup>, Mk 4<sup>15</sup>, Lk 8<sup>12</sup>); or by sowing tares among the wheat (Mt 13<sup>38</sup>. <sup>39</sup>), the tares denoting the children of 'the wicked one' as the enemy that sowed them is 'the devil.' Here we see clearly illustrated the New Testament doctrine of the irreconcilable antagonism between the Kingdom of Christ and that of Satan.

Again, Jesus warns Peter on one occasion that Satan has asked and obtained the Divine permission to sift the disciples as wheat; and indicates that their only hope lies in the intercession of Christ Himself, who has prayed for Simon that his 'faith fail not' (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>).

Once more, in Christ's discourse on the Last Judgment, it is expressly stated that the everlasting punishment to which the unfaithful are condemned was 'prepared for the devil and his angels' (Mt 254), a passage which well illustrates the manner in which, in the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus is consistently represented as alluding to Satan and his power and kingdom. That is, that the doctrine is not so much set forth by way of dogmatic statement as assumed, taken for granted. Jesus does not enlarge upon it, but quietly accepts it, presupposes it as a matter about which there is no dispute. The belief is there, and Jesus sets upon it the seal of His authority.

To these examples from the Synoptic Cospels must be added the very emphatic testimony of the discourses of Christ according to the Fourth Gospel. The darkness under whose dominion, according to the introductory verses, the world is held, the dead weight, the res increase of human insensibility to the Divine light, is no negative thing, but itself a power, a kingdom in deadly opposition to the Kingdom of Christ, and under the rule of Satan. Jesus directly attributes the opposition of His antagonists to the malice of the devil. So He says to the Jews, 'Ve are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do (Jn 84). The false accusations of Scribe and Pharisee, and the untiring malignity of their persecuting zeal, show the spirit and are the work of him who was a liar and a niurderer from the beginning Again, He speaks of Satan as the Prince of this world, and represents as the aim and the certain result of His own work, the judgment and the casting out of Satan and his kingdom (12<sup>61</sup>; cf.

3. The other portions of the NT confirm but do not materially add to the testimony of the Gospels on the subject of the personality and the power of the Evil One. Thus St. James (4') merely counsels his readers to resist the devil, assuring them that he will fice from them; while in another passage (219) he speaks of 'the demons' ("d daupora"), evidently meaning by the term the subordinate agents of Satante power, as believing that there is one God-a belief which fills them with terror. St Peter assures us that Satan, whom he describes as deriburos ('adversary,' a technical or official word), and compares to a roaring lion, may be successfully resisted by the power of steadfast faith (1 P 5<sup>8, 9</sup>). St. John in his First Epistle repeats the teaching of his Gospel, and in the Apocalypse identifies Satan with the serpent of Eden, and seemingly also with the accuser of Job and of Joshua (Rev 12<sup>n-18</sup>), and foretells his coming doom. St. Paul accepts the current doctrine; but though in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians he seems to add to the teaching of Christ in the Gospela other elements from the demonology of the Pharisate schools and from other sources (Eph 2*6", Col 2*5), and in his Epistles to the Corinthians and to Timothy (I Co 1 Ti 12) ascribes to Satan a certain power of discipline as a minister of Divine judgment, really contributes to this branch of Christian doctrine no essential element additional to that which is furnished in the Gospels. See, further, articles ACCOMMODATION and DEMON.

SAYIOUR .- 'Saviour,' like 'to save' and 'salvation,' is a word of frequent occurrence in the OT.

It occurs mostly in the form of the ptopi. Hiph, of pri-TWIG. For the specific meaning of 'to mye' in distinction from 270°C. For the specific meaning of 'to make' in distinction from other cognate Reb verbu, of art Salakarow. Most commonly God is called the Naviour of Israel or Individuals. A standing combination is 'titel the Salaour' often with a possessive gentitive (1 (7) 1053, Ps. 243-271-2-02-5-655-709-95, In 123-1710, Mic 77, Hab 318). To be a Saviour in God's exclusive prerogative (Ps 603-10612, Is 4311-4523). As instruments of God, however, human deliverers likewise receive the title (4g. 39-13, Neb 987). There is no passage in the OT where the Messah is called 'Salaiour' Wherever the Messah is connected with the idea of salvation, He is not the subject but the object of it (Ps 288-14419, Zec 99). This is different in Apocryphal and Pseudophyraphical literature, for here it is not merely declared that in the name of the Son of Man the people are saved, and that lie is the Goel of their life (En 44%), or that the righteons in connexion with Him shall be missified with salvation (4 Exr 45%), but also that Christins liberable creaturem (4 Exr 12% 15%), and that from Judah and Levi the Lord will raise a Savour for israel (Test. Ond %). God, however, here also is more frequently called Saviour (re-ram surery, Pa-Sol 67; missis entrue, Ear 45%; hyper revus, 3 Mac 65% 71%). Used of God, surers is synonymous with such terms as high, higherty, highest (En 48%, 1 Mac 413, 3 Mac 75%).

1. In the Gospels corris occurs but three times—Lk 1° 2'1 and Ju 4°. In the Song of Mary, the words 'My spirit has rejoiced in God my Saviour' are a reproduction of the common OT usage. In Lk 2'1 corris is not a formal title, but a descriptive designation of the Messiah, 'a Saviour who is Christ the Lord,' But the word evidently has a deeper meaning to the angels than the noun cornels and the participle posteras have to Zacharias in Lk 12.34; for in the two latter passages the conception moves entirely within the OT limits. The doxology of Lk 214 associates Jesus' saving work with the production of peace on earth among man-kind as the objects of God's good pleasure. Here sweep undoubtedly covers the Lord's Messianic work in the most universalistic sense. And it will be noticed that σωτήρ is synonymous with χριστότ είριος, so that the reference cannot be confined to our Lord's earthly ministry, but extends to His activity as the glordied Messiah. As 'peace' and 'good pleasure' indicate, not the giving of life but the bestowal of reconciliation with God stands in the foreground (for the connexion between ownip and ecconta, cf. Ps Sol 8"). In In 4et à gurthe rou noqueu receives its import from the rich and pregnant meaning suffers and surropes acquire in the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. As Jesus had represented Humself to the woman not as a mere revealer (vv. 18.28), but as the giver of 'living water,' and 'water unto eternal life' (vv. 18.14), so the Samaritans, in acknowledging Him as σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου, prove to have attained a deeper conception of Messiahahip than was commonly current among them, both as to the nature and extent of the Messiah κ calling (cf., however, for σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου, 4 Ezr 1326)

2. The fact has not escaped observation, that St. Luke, who alone of the Synoptists introduces into his record the word oursip, also employs it twice in Acts, where it occurs once in a speech of St. Peter (5th), and once in a speech of St. Paul (13th). In 5th we have the combination dρχηγόι και σωτήρ: Christ was made both by the Resurrection and by the Ascension. down to see so that also in Ar 312, another speech of St. Peter, and is here combined with for; the Jews asked for a murderer to be granted them and killed the Prince of Life, whom God raised from the dead. It is plain that the meaning of ownip in 541 is determined by that of appropriate 314 proves that degrees has specifically to do with Jesus' life-giving power, whence also in both passages the Resurrection is emphasized. Besides Lk., Hebrews is the only NT writing which employs appropriate (2'* 12"). The former of these two passages confirms the close connexion already found between σωτήρ and dρχηγότ, for it calls Jesus άρχηγότ σωτηρίας; in the other passage He is called dρχηγότ σωτηρία: ; in the other passage He is called dρχηγότ και τελεωτής wloreus, 'the leader and perfecter of faith' (For a thorough discussion of dρχηγότ, cf. Bleek, Der Brief α. d. Hebräer, ii. pp. 301-303). The use of the treading mention that the treading mention the treading mention that the word in combination with σωντήρ is interesting, because both are employed in the LXX of the 'judges' sent by God to deliver Israel [Jg 3<sup>2-18</sup> 11<sup>6-13</sup> 12<sup>9</sup> [σωντήρ - Γ. Γ. αρχηγόν - [75]]). In Hebrews, however, the rendering 'captain,' which brings out the idea of military leadership, and the general rendering 'captain,' was the 'captain' and the general rendering 'captain,' was a supplied to the captain' and the general rendering that her 'captain' and action the more delivery. dering 'author,' are inadequate; the word plainly has the connotation of 'model,' 'example,' 'fore-runner,' the leader first experiencing in Himself and receiving in Himself that to which he leads others. Thus Jesus is ἀρχηγὸσ σωτηρία in 2¹⁰, because He Himself is conducted to glory by God, and in His attainment to glory draws with Him all the other sons of God. In 12² Jesus' career of faith is represented as exemplary for believers; by preceding in the exercise of an ideal faith He enables others to follow in the same ἀγών of faith. He 5⁰ proves that where the author does not wish to emphasize this peculiar idea of precession, but merely to express the causal relationship between His work and the salvation of believers, he uses the general term αίτιος: 'He became author of eternal salvation.' The reference to the Resurrection in both Petrine passages renders it probable that the word ἀρχηγόs is here used in the same pregnant sense: Jesus is in virtue of the Resurrection a leader of life, one who has Himself attained unto life, and now makes others partakers of the same. As the murderer in Ac 3¹⁴ inflicts death, so the ἀρχηγὸς τῆς ζωῆς bestows life. σωτήρ, then, is identical with ἀρχηγός so far as the impartation of life is concerned, but leaves the exemplification of the life-content of the σωτηρία in Jesus' own Person unexpressed. In the speech of St. Paul (13²²) the use of σωτήρ clearly attaches itself to the LXX of the Book of Judges, if the reading ἤγειρε of the TR be followed, for this is the verb by which the LXX in Jg 3⁰. ¹⁵ renders the Heb. □ρη. If, on the other hand, we read with WH ἤγαγε, the more immediate reference, seems to be to Zec 3⁰; but even then the word σωτήρ itself points back to the Book of Judges.

3. In St. Paul's writings, apart from the Pastoral Epistles, ourth is found only twice—Eph 5<sup>28</sup> and Ph 3<sup>20</sup>. The interpretation of the former passage is much disputed. The husband's relation as head to the wife and Christ's relation as Head to the Church are compared, and in this connexion Christ is called σωτήρ τοῦ σώματος (of the Church). This last statement seems to imply that Christ's headship over the Church is based on His being the Saviour of the Church body. The question is whether this must be understood in the sense which will likewise be applicable to the relation between husband and wife. In the ordinary sense the husband could hardly be called the saviour of the wife's body. But Wagner (ZNTW) vi. [1905] p. 220) has called attention to a passage in Clement (Pad. ii. 5) where it is stated that the Creator provides man with meat and drink τοῦ σώζεσθαι χάριν, 'for the sake of keeping alive.' Applying this to our passage, he obtains the very congruous sense: As the husband is σωτήρ of the wife, by supplying the sustenance of her physical life, so Christ is σωτήρ of the Church, inasmuch as He endows her with eternal life; and for this reason both hold the posi-tion of head. This secures for σώζειν the sense of 'endowing with eternal life.' The peculiarity of the passage, thus understood, would lie in this, that the ordinary religious use of σώζειν is illustrated by analogy with a natural use of the verb which seems to be without precedent in earlier Biblical Greek. In Ph  $3^{20}$  the word  $\sigma\omega\tau\dot{\eta}\rho$  has a specific eschatological reference: Christ is σωτήρ, because at the resurrection He will transform the body of believers into the likeness of His own glorious body. σώζεω therefore here also is equivalent to the bestowal of life.

4. With sudden and remarkable frequency σωτήρ emerges in the Pastoral Epistles (10 times) and in 2 Peter (5 times). In the Pastorals there is further the peculiarity that the name is applied to both God and Christ: to God, in 1 Ti 1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>3</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>; to Christ, in 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>6</sup>. In 2 Peter the reference is always to Christ. In Jude also God is once called 'our Saviour through Jesus Christ' (v.<sup>25</sup>). The designation of God as Saviour can appear strange only on the basis of our estabcan appear strange only on the basis of our established custom to reserve this title for Christ; on the basis of the OT it was a perfectly natural usage, for here always God, never the Messiah, is called ΥΨΤΟ, σωτήρ. And in the NT itself the act of saving is, where a subject is indicated, as naturally ascribed to God as to Christ (comparatively few passages reflect on the subject). Except perhaps for the one passage, 1 Ti 410, it cannot be said that the meaning of σωτήρ in the Pastorals and 2 Peter differs from its ordinary import, or that of σώζειν in the NT elsewhere. Christ is Saviour, because He NT elsewhere. N1 elsewhere. Christ is Saviour, because He abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel (2 Ti 110); as Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ has an eternal Kingdom into which believers receive entrance (2 P 111). He is called 'the great God and Saviour,' in so far as believers look for the blessed hope and expressing of lievers look for the blessed hope and appearing of His glory (Tit 2<sup>13</sup>). The hope of eternal life comes from God our Saviour (Tit 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>14</sup>). Eschatological also is the reference in 'the commandment of the Lord and Saviour' (2 P 3<sup>2</sup>). In Tit 2<sup>10</sup> the thought is implied that God is Saviour in the ethical sphere, whence 'the doctrine of God our Saviour' becomes an incentive to holy living. But peculiar is 1 Ti 410 where God is called 'the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe.' Wagner proposes to apply here the same sense given to σωτήρ in Eph 5<sup>22</sup>: God is Saviour of all men, inasmuch as He supplies them with natural life; Saviour especially supplies them with natural life; Saviour especially of believers, because He supplies these with the higher life of the Spirit (l.c. p. 222, where Philo [de Mundi Opif. 60: God= $\epsilon i \epsilon p \gamma \epsilon r \eta s$  al  $\sigma \omega r \eta \rho$ ] is quoted). This might seem to be favoured by 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup> 'God who keepeth all things alive,' or 'who giveth life to all things' (cf. the alternative reading  $\{\omega \sigma \gamma \sigma r \rho \sigma \omega \sigma e$  in Lk 17<sup>28</sup>). But it is less in keeping with Tit 2<sup>11</sup> where a similar universalism of God's  $\sigma \omega \epsilon r \omega r \eta s$  affirmed, and vet this is a matter of God's σώζειν is affirmed, and yet this is a matter of redemption, not of nature. Wagner is quite correct, however, in urging against von Soden that 'God σωτήρ of all men' cannot mean 'God is willing to be σωτήρ of all men'; and against B. Weiss, that it cannot mean 'God has made salvation objectively possible for all men, while subjectively He realizes it in believers only.' The solution of the difficulty must be sought elsewhere, viz. in connexion with the pronounced universalism of the Pastoral Epistles in general. The emphasis and frequency with which this principle is brought forward render it probable that something specific in the historical situation to which the Pastorals address themselves lies at its basis, and at the basis also of the frequency with which the words σώζειν, σωτηρία, σωτήριος, σωτήρ are employed. There is absolutely no reason to suspect the writer of any intention to weaken or neutralize the doctrine of predestination. Besides involving denial of the Pauline origin of the Epistles, this would leave unexplained why, in other passages, the principle of predestination is enunciated with all desirable distinctness. The only plausible view is that the passages under review contain a warning against the dualistic trend of that incipient Gnosticism to whose early presence in the Apostolic period the Epistles of the First Captivity also bear witness. In a twofold sense it might become of importance to vindicate, over against this theory, the universalism of saving grace: on the one hand, in so far as Gnosticism on principle excluded from salvation those who lacked the pneumatic character; and, on the other hand, in so far as those belonging to the pneumatici might be considered to carry the power of salvation by nature in themselves. In other words, it might become necessary to emphasize that God saves all men, not merely one class of men, and that no man is by his subjective condition either sunk beneath the possibility or raised above the need of salvation. Perhaps also the emphasis upon the fact that God as well as Christ is Saviour, though perfectly natural from the OT point of view, is specially directed against a system which tended to separate between the Creator God of the old dispensation and the Saviour-God, Christ, of the new. The recent investigations of Friedländer have shown that there existed long before the 2nd cent, of our era a Jewish type of Gnosticism, so that it can no longer be asserted that an anti-Gnostic polemic of this type per se militates against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles.

BAYING AND DOING .- The contrast between 'saying' and 'doing' is based on an axiomatic principle of the moral and spiritual life, which, notwithstanding its simplicity and obviousness, is apt to be overlooked, viz. the importance of character as distinguished from profession, the supreme value of ethical ideals and practice above ritual observance, the vital connexion between creed and The distinction thus suggested necessarily finds a large place in the teaching of our Lord, who, as the Founder of a religion of inward reality, frequently emphasized the importance of doing' rather than 'saying.' 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 72) Not that Jesus by any means underrated the importance of 'saying'; He made confession of His name one of the most solemn obligations of discipleship (Mt 1922 m), cf. l.k. 8 m m). But a profession must rest upon a solid foundation of character. The recurrence, in various forms, of the phrase 'to do the will of God, and the pronument place given to this conception, is a marked feature of Christ's teaching; see Mt 12th; cf. 7<sup>34.77</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>28</sup>, f.k. 10<sup>29.77</sup> 11<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> etc. 'Doing' is the testing quality of the Christian life (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>. <sup>47</sup>), and the sure and only way to spiritual enlightenment (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>). Of this doing of God's will Jesus Himself set the supreme and inspiring example (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>. 5<sup>26</sup>. 6<sup>26</sup>). In contrast with this ideal of 'doing,' Jesus warned men against the subtle dangers of mere 'saying.' Even when an appropriate meant. He checked the insurface of sincerely meant, He checked the impulsiveness of a hasty and ill considered profession (Mt 8<sup>18, 29</sup>; cf. 26<sup>22, 26</sup>, Lk 14<sup>29</sup>); but His severest rebukes were reserved for those who substituted a hollow and obtrusive pretension for the realities of moral and appricual character. It was the great sin of the religious leaders of the time that they were so strong in profession and precept, and so neglectful of practical righteomenes; 'they say, and do not' (Mt 23'); and many too readily followed their example of easy formalism,—'This people honoureth me with their lips' (Mt 15°). The same contrast is boldly presented in the parable of the Two Sons (Mt 21° 21), with special reference on the one hand to the Pharisees and scribes, and on the other to the outwardly unpromising 'publicans and sinners who welcomed the message of the Kingdom of heaven Right action without profession, or even in contradiction to the profession, is better than promises unfulfilled by practice. In this, as in promises unfulfilled by practice. In this, as in other ways, 'many shall be last that are first; and first that are last (Mt 1920). The 'acted parable' first that are last (Mt 1920). The 'acted parable' of the withering of the barren fig tree with its deceptive show of premature leaves, was a solemn warning against the danger and ain of 'asying' without 'doing' (Mt 21<sup>24-29</sup>, Mk 11<sup>23-24</sup>). Better that the 'asying' should follow than outrun the 'doing,' and be inspired by a truthful and humble 'doing,' and be inspired by a truthful and humble 'doing,' and the inspired by a truthful and humble 'doing,' and the inspired by a truthful and humble 'doing,' and the inspired by a truthful and humble 'doing,' and the 'even our best efforts and achieve ments; 'when ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable aervants; we have done that which it was our duty to do' (Lk 17<sup>20</sup>). to do' (Lk 1710).

SAYINGS (UNWRITTEN).—Certain sayings ascribed to Christ, though recorded by early writers, are not found written in the Gospels, and therefore are known as the Agrapha, or Un written Sayings of Our Lord. They are not as numerous as might, perhaps, have been anticipated, in view of the recorded facts of Christ's ministry, and the comparative brevity of the actual reports of His discourses. The active ministry seems to have lasted for nearly three years. The records convey the impression of preachings and teachings, continued from day to day, with only rare intervals of repose. The audiences were frequently very large; they came from all quarters; the interest was widespread and intense. The words of this Gallingan Rabbi, who attracted some and provoked the wrath of others, but could not be disregarded by any, did not die in their utterance. It was an age when the memory was much cultivated Christ's hearers would be ready to retain, and repeat at home, and amongst their friends, what ever had impressed them most in the new doctrines. It was a literary age also. Before the Third Gospel was written, many had already composed histories of Christ (Lk 11). The Fourth Evangelist states that he made a selection from available materials  $(J_{\underline{n}}, 20^{20.31}, 21^{20})$ .

There must once have been a large amount of Agrapha of teachings and sayings which have not reached us in the pages of Holy Writ. While these were for the most part current in Palestine only, a few would spread farther, through the visits of Hellenists, and even Greeks (Jn 12<sup>26</sup>), to Judges. But the work of converting the world was reserved for the preaching of Christ's Apostles; and the converts' knowledge of Christianity was derived from the traditions which were delivered by the Apostles, and which were subsequently superseded by the texts of the written Gospels. Meanwhile, the Hebrew Church of Palestine, which alone possessed first-hand knowledge of Christ's teachings, faded and ultimately perished with the ecattering of the Hebrew race. In these historical conditions we find the reasons why so little of the actual contents of the four canonical records. The entire collection of Agrapha, gathered from all sources, is not large. When what is apocryphal, sources, is not large. When what is apocryphal, or certainly spurious, has been eliminated, the residuum is found to be small in amount, and not very valuable.

The extra-canonical Sayings are preserved in some MSS of the Gospels, and in those religious romances known as the Apocryphal Gospels, also in the Commentaries of the Fathers; but there are, besides, a few sayings which are Agrapha in that they are not included in the written Gospels, but yet possess high attestation as being parts of the text of Acts and 1 Cor. They stand, or fall, with the estimate held of the authenticity of those books. In Ac 20% St. Paul quotes the words of the Lord; how he said, R is more blessed to give than to receive. This is a specimen of the traditions (2 Th 214) which were delivered by the first preachers of Christianity to their converts. In 1 Co 11<sup>26</sup> St. Paul adds a phrase not found in the Evangelistic accounts of the Institution. This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me ; but v. 2 may be interpreted to intimate that the Apostle had joyed a special revelation ('I have received of the Lord'), independently of any tradition of the words heard by the Twelve. The report of our Lord's last commands to His Apostles (Ac 1<sup>6-8</sup>), though in part a repetition of texts in the Gospels, is distinct in some expressions, and v. has no parallel in the Evangelists. This verse is repeated by St. Peter ui Ac 11<sup>10</sup>.

The sayings preserved in some MSS of the Gospels are of the nature of textual variations for the most part. A few are absolutely inadmissible on textual grounds; others are accepted only by certain critics. Those which are not universally admitted may yet be authentic traditions, though extra-canonical: relics of the many sayings which were not recorded by the Evangelists. these, and of others which are handed down by the Fathers, is by comparison with the sentiments which are recognized as elements in the character of Christ's teaching. The very ancient MS at Cambridge known as Codex Bezee, which exhibits many remarkable variations from the usual text of the Gospels, has between Mt 202 and 2 the following:

"But we seek we from little to increase, and from greater to be less, but also when having been united, we interface to the less, but also when having been united, we interface to support to go and art down in the prominent places, lest a more honourable than thou should none in, and the that invited to the supper should come forward and say to thee. "Withdraw still lower", and thou shouldest be just to shame. But if thou shouldest go and at down in the affective place, at done inferior to thee should come in, by that touted to the supper will may to thee, "Braw together still higher", out this shall be to thee profitable."

Between Lk 64 and 5 the following occurs:

'On the same day he beheld a certain man working on the Sabbath, and said to hun, "Man, if noticel thou knowest what thou art doing, thou art Hessed - but if thou knowest not, thou art accurred and a transgression of the law

These paragraphs are not supported by sufficient evidence to warrant their inclusion in the text of the Gospels: whether they are worthy to be considered part of those traditions of Christ's teachings which preceded and for a time accompanied, the written word, the English reader can judge for himself. Textual criticism has no place outside the region of documents

The following Sayings, however, are in a different category. The evidence for them is so weighty that all are received into the text by some critics; but to others the evidence is insufficient; yet it will hardly be denied by any that the presence of the words in so many ancient documents stamps them with distinct authority, and demands their recognition as traditions of the Master's teachings. We refer here to the Doxology (Mt 612): the verse teaching of the Master has survived beyond the Mt 17th; the words, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt' (Mk 9"); 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them' (Lk 985.36); 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23%). All these passages except the last are rejected as parts of the text by the Revisers, and those of the same school of criticism; nor do they accept as undoubtedly genuine the story of the Adulteress in Jn 8, and the concluding verses of Mk.; yet the words attrib-uted to Christ in these two sections, and in the texts cited above, must certainly commend themselves to unprejudiced ears as authentic reminis-cences of the Master's sayings, even if we refuse them a place in the canonical records.

The Sayings of Christ which have been pre-served outside the NT by ecclesiastical writers, though not actually numerous, are too many for quotation in this article. The following are speci-niens; and, in different ways, of interest and im-

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5. 43) quotes Peter thus:

'The Lord said to the Apostles, "If, then, any one of Israel wishes to repent and believe through my name on God, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years go forth into the world, lest any one say, We did not hear."

Origen (in Joan. ii. 6) has:

'If any one goes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour himself saith: "Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor."

Jerome quotes from the same Gospel as follows:

Jerome quotes from the same Gospel as follows:

(a) 'After the resurrection of the Saviour, it records. "But when the Lord had given the linen cloth to the priest's servant, he went to James and appeared to him. For James had then an oath that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see flum rising from them that sleep." And again, a little farther on, "Bring me, saith the Lord, a table and bread." And there follows immediately: "He took the bread, and blessed, and brake, and gave to James the Just, and said to him, 'My brother, eat thy bread, inasmuch as the Bon of Man hath risen from them that sleep." (It I is illust ii.)

(b) 'There is the following story: "Behold, the Lord's mother and his brethren were mying to him: John the Baptist haptizes unto remission of sins, let us go and be baptised by him." But he said unto them: 'What sin have I done, that should go and be baptised by him, unless perchance this very thing, which I have said, is an ignorance'" (dat. I felag. iii. 2).

(c) 'We read, too, of the Lord mying to the disciples: "And never rejoice, except when you have looked upon your brother in love." (in Eph. 5%).

The 'Savincs' contained in a fragmentary pany-

The 'Sayings' contained in a fragmentary papyrus of the 3rd cent., discovered at Oxyrhynchus, are in part equivalent to texts in the Gospels, but the following have no parallels:

(a) 'Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in nowise find the hingdom of God, and except ye make the Sabbath a real Sabbath, ye shall not see the Pather.'

(b) 'I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blud in their heart, and see not.'

(c) 'Wherever there are two, they are not without God; and wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Baise the stone and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood and there and I.'

The so-called 2nd Ep. of Clement of Rome (c. iv.)

"For this cause, if we do these things, the Lord said, "Though ye be gathered together with me in my bosom, and do not my commandments, I will cast you away, and will say unto you, 'Depart from me, I know you not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity "".

Hippolytus (Philosph. v. 7) quotes the Gospel according to Thomas thus.

'He that seeketh me shall find me in children from seven years old onwards, for there I am manifested, though hidden in the fourteenth age '

Many sayings ascribed to Jesus have been collected from Mohammedan sources (cf. art. Christ lected from Mohammedan sources (cf. art. Christ in Mohammedan Litterature [in Appendix]). One such passage is: 'When Jesus was asked, "How art thou this morning?" he would answer, "Unable to forestall what I hope, or to put off what I fear, bound by my works, with all my good in another's hand. There is no poor man power than I am." The last sentence agrees in sentiment with a well-known text; but these Mohammedan traditions of Christ's words are for the present. medan traditions of Christ's words are for the most part of no value.

G. H. GWILLIAM. SCARLET .- 1. Scarlet, as a dye, was obtained from the body of the female kermes insect (Lecfrom the body of the female kermes insect (Lecanium ilicis), a native of B.E. Europe, where it lives upon a species of dwarf oak (Querrus coccifera). The insect is of the family Coccide, to which also the cochineal of Mexico belongs. Its Latin name (derived from its appearance) was grana; hence the dye was called 'grain' (cf. Milton, Peneer. 33, Par. Lost, xi. 242; Spenser, Work and Company of the second section of the second second FQ 1. vii. 1; see Skeat, Etym. Dict. s.v.).

2. The colour is correctly represented by its name. Mt 272 is the only passage in the Gospels where the word 'scarlet' (κόκκυσι) occurs, and it is there a substitute for the 'purple' of || Mk 1512.29, It is the latter word that has changed its resulting less any Purple.

its meaning (see art. PURPLE).

'The Gr. sense of colour seems to have been so comparatively dim and uncertain, that it is almost impossible to ascertain what the real idea was which they attached to any word alluding to hue (Ruskin, Mod. Painters, iil. 225. Ct. also Gladstone, Jun. Munds, p. 540).

Yet the ancients, as a rule, carefully distinguished scarlet from purple (Becker, Gallus, p. 446) Probably Mt. gives the colour actually used, Mk. and Jn. the colour intended.

3. The 'scarlet robe' was undoubtedly a military cloak, either that of a common soldier (sagum) or that of a commanding officer (paludamentum). The latter was longer and of better quality; both were regularly of scarlet (Ellicott, Hist. Lectures, p. 348 n.). Westcott (on Jn 192. 5) emphasizes, in p. 348 n.). Westcott (on on 1877) emphasized, to the crown and robe, the idea of victory as well as of royalty: 'this blood-stained robe was the true dress of a kingly conqueror . . . So He was through life the suffering King, the true Soldier.' F. S. RANKEN.

SCIENCE .- 1. The word 'science,' in the language of to-day, refers sometimes to a process and some-times to the results of that process. The process itself is the representation in thought of the facts and events of human experience. The result of this process is the formulation of statements and doctrines which are regarded as true. We therefore use the word 'science' generally to embrace both (1) scientific method and (2) scientific truth. The object of science is to apply its method to every field of possible knowledge, and so to in-clude within its doctrine all the facts of human experience.

I. STATE OF SCIENCE IN THE CIVILIZATION

Relation to Hollon-IN WHICH CHRIST LIVED. 1. Relation to Hellen-ium. — The civilization of Palestine was complex and syncretic. The two main factors in it were the ancient Hebrew culture (largely tinctured by other Oriental elements), which preponderated,

Other fragments of MSS containing words ascribed to Christ have lately been procured from the same place but the text was not available when this article was printed. It is not unreason-shle to anticipate additions to our store of Agraphs by future discoveries amongst Egyptian ruins.

and Helleniam. This latter was a power extending throughout the Greec-Homan world, and tending to influence every department of life, and so, de apite the unnate conservation of the Jews, the more external elements of Palestinian culture received a strong Heilenistic tincture. The organism of the State was deeply affected, public institutions were modified, and social relations not untouched. The arts, too, were influenced, but, by the time the accence of the Hebrews was reached, the wave of Hellenian had lost much of its vigour. The mind of the Jew was equipped against it. The Greek language was, after all, but slightly known (cf. Ac 21* 222), and, though Herod surrounded himself with Greek literate and many Jews received a Greek education abroad, these facts indicate the limit of the penetration of Greek science into the life of the Jews. This may be illustrated by reference to St. Paul. Though brought up to some extent under Hellenistic influences in Tarsus, his culture was Greek only in its form and in certain of its graces. To the Hebrew mode of thought of its graces. To the Hebrew mode of thought and Rabbanic logic inward and characteristic elements of Jewish culture-he tenaciously clung. His writings are all those of a Jew rather than of a Hellenist. It is, then, unnecessary to attend to Hellenistic thought when considering the 'science that formed the intellectual background of the teaching of Christ. The Aristotelian logic had no nameable influence upon His own thought, or upon the mind of the Synoptists who reported His words, or upon the conceptions of the common people who heard him gladly. The logic of the society in which Christ moved was Rabbinic and not philosophic, and its standard of truth was religious rather than scientific.

2. Hebrew standard of truth.-We recognize that, according to the scientific standard, those propositions are true which accurately and impartially describe observed facts; that is, the test of truth is its logical form as descriptive. This notion truth is its logical form as descriptive. of truth was originally foreign to the Hebrews. The words in the UT which are translated 'true,' truth,' etc., may be traced to roots which have primarily an ethical meaning and convey 'the notion of constancy, steadfastness, faithfulness' (see art. 'Truth' in Hastings' DB). Hence they are more generally applied to a person than a pro-position, and attach to a proposition only in a derivative way, the sayings of God being 'faithful' because His character is beneath and behind them, -they are established in the Divine nature, and so cannot be moved. Thus, that a proposition should tally with facts did not stand out with such importance as it does for us moderns; indeed, to the ancient Hebrew, truth was a matter of motive and character rather than of accuracy. Thus in the Decalogue there is no actual and direct condemnation of lying, but the probabition is directed against the bearing of tidse witness, the dastardly motive being the thing denounced, rather than the failure accurately to describe facts. This comes out in strong rehef in the devish notion of history. The aim of the historian was less to give a record of events than to other. Indeed, by the time of thrist the whole circle of historical ideas had received a fanciful character, because that narrative was deemed to be the best which gave the most laudatory account of the Hebrew hernes Truth then, according to the Hebrew mind, was that which edified, and not merely accurate description of fact. Only from this point of view can we understand many NT sayings with reference to truth. Jesus claimed that He Himself cost the truth. In saying 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life of 14%, He is not referring to what we call scientific truth, but rather edifying and ennobling thought, or, as explained above, religious truth. Pilate, a Roman logician, had quite a different conception of truth. When he said 'What is truth? (Jn 182), he was moving in a universe of thought foreign to the Jews.

3. Hebrew method of attaining truth. — The Hebrew idea of truth being so different from our scientific standard, it is to be expected that their way of reaching it would correspondingly differ from our scientific method,—the observation and description of facts. The Hebrew method did not always seek facts, and, when they were at hand, was not content simply to describe them.

(1) Facts were sometimes 'invented.'

(1) Facts were sometimes 'invented.'

This may be illustrated by reference to Talmudic geography. The Talmud answers the question 'as to which islands belong to leasel and which do not, by maying that if a straight line belong to the land of leasel, etc. But, of course, no islands ever belonged to the land of leasel, etc. But, of course, no islands ever belonged to the land of leasel at all. Again, it is deliberately asserted that there are seven seas in Palestine. Only six are naived, but one of these is named twice in order to make up the number seven, merely so that the holy number may be introduced. And, further, approach this specific enumeration, the Talmud issues only four seas as included in Palestine. These two instances are () pical. In the first, islands are said to exist which have never been observed, and in the other the number of actually existing seas is artificially increased in order to bring in the secred seven.

(2) Mataphysical explanation was sometimes

(2) Metaphysical explanation was sometimes attempted, description in itself being considered inadequate. The introduction of the number seven above is an illustration of this. Ps 24 gives another type, where Jahweh is praised for His power and skill in making the solid and immovable earth to rest upon the fluid and fluctuating sea. The observation is a bad one, but that does not concern The point for us to notice is that to the observation that the land is 'founded upon the sea' is added the metaphysical explanation that this is a miraculous exhibition of the power of God. The fact that this is poetry, and could be paralleled with passages taken from modern Western poetry, does not affect the point, for these modern passages are admittedly and obviously poetical in contradiction to scientific statements, whereas in Hebrew literature there is no such distinction. What is said in poetry is equally true to the Hebrew mind when written in prose, as when the idea of the windows of heaven is repeated in such various hierary styles as are found in tin 7", 2 K 7". Mal 3". Hence the indiscriminate Jewish doctrine of inspiration, which made no distinction between styles of literature, ascribing to all passages of the Canon an equal measure of truth-

SCIENCE

To whatever branch of knowledge we turn, we find that observations are an insignificant part of the system of teaching about nature, and for the method of mere description we have the method of metaphysical explanation.

4. Defects of Hebrew thought. — The history, political and geographical situation, and religious political and geographical situation, and religious political and geographical situation and religious political and geographical situation and religious political and geographical situations. exclusiveness of the Hebrews assisted in the cultivation of a type of thought as characteristic and powerful as any that the world has seen. It is not enough to say that the Hebrew mind was 'Semitic'; for, while it shares many of the characteristics of the thought of other Semitic peoples, in some respects it stands out from them in bold contrast. Among the fine qualities of the Hebrew mind were: (1) a sanity and sobriety of thought which preserved their religion and literature from all those offensive and extravagant traits which mark the popular religions of Syria, Asia Minor, and Arabia; (2) an extraordinary gift for the observation of individual incidents and facts, as appears in the inimitable narratives of the historical books of the OT; the vivid portraiture, satire, and denunciation of the prophets; and the marvellous, if often trivial, minuteness of Rabbinic discussions; (3) unparalleled energy of feeling and sense of individuality; and (4) a strength of will that alone can account for the vitality of a people which has been exposed to a more bitter persecuwhich has been expect to a note that any other race in history. Of these four notable characteristics the third and fourth are obviously not such as tend to the cultivation of the scientific frame of mind. With the first and second it is quite otherwise. wise-sobriety of thought and a keen eye for particulars are necessary to a proper scientific observation. But at the same time they are insufficient for scientific description, which demands certain mental qualities in which the Hebrew mind was notably deficient—breadth of vision, systematic and architectonic power, consistent and persistent thinking. An examination of Hebrew thought discovers, in general, a notable defect, traceable to this failure in breadth of grasp and over-emphasis on the particular and strong develop-ment of the emotional and volitional nature. This defect is the absence of the power of logical abstraction, and it shows itself in two ways that are of considerable importance—first, the Hebrew mind could not frame general definitions; and, secondly, it had no notion of general law.

The Western (Greek) mode of definition per genus et differentiam we commonly assume not only to be the only mode possible, but also to be indispensable to thought. While it is indispensable to our modern thought, especially with its highly developed scientific method, it was not indispensable to the Hebrews, for they did without it. The Hebrews defined, not by reference to a class—as when we say 'man is a rational animal'—but by reference to a type, as when it is implied that natural man is Adam, and redeemed man is Christ,

In the second Adam (Ro 5, 1 Co 15).

In the second place, this inability to think abstractly prevented the Hebrews from arriving at the notion of natural law. The word 'law' in Hebrew literature always meant the arbitrary pronouncement of a ruler (of course a despot) or deity. Law meant nothing general or abstract. The Torah was an actual and definite direction given in Jahweh's name by the priest, and was either judicial, ceremonial, or moral. The various synonyms for torah have in general the same definite, particular character—'judgment,' 'statute,' 'commandment,' 'testimonies,' and 'precepts'

* Respectively mishpat, bullah, miquah, 'sdoch, pilludem.
VOL. II.—37

(see art. 'Law (in OT)' in Hastings' DB). When used in a general sense to indicate a large section of the OT, it is in no way abstract, but only collective.

The nearest approach which Hebrew thought offers to our highly abstract natural laws is to be found in certain proverbial sayings (e.g. Jer 3129, Mt 162-5), and a few rough groupings of empirical facts which we shall notice later on. There is nothing, however, that in any real sense corresponds with the modern idea of law as 'the résumé or brief expression of the relationships and sequences of certain groups of 'perceptions and conceptions, existing only 'when formulated by man' (Karl Pearson). The same characteristic explains the absence of abstract philosophic terms from Hebrew literature. The doctrine of freewill, e.g., though constantly implied in the OT, is never abstractly stated. 'Instead of saying man is free, Scripture says man can choose; he can act; he can do' (Delitzsch, Syst. of Bibl. Psychol. p. 192).

5. Hebrew knowledge of Nature.—It follows from what we have seen that the Jews had no sound body of scientific doctrine. They had no very clearly defined conception of the earth and its very clearly defined conception of the earth and its surroundings, either in early times or at the time of Christ. They regarded the earth as the middle point of the universe. The heavens were a mere material covering or dome (Is 34<sup>4</sup> 40<sup>22</sup>, Ps 104<sup>2</sup>, Job 37<sup>18</sup>), with doors (Gn 28<sup>17</sup>, Ps 78<sup>28</sup>) and windows (Gn 7<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>2, 19</sup>), and the earth rested on the sea (Ps 24<sup>2</sup>). These are obviously little more than shildish reproductions of sense impressions. The childish reproductions of sense-impressions. same is true of every department of physical science, including Astronomy. There is no criti-cism, no classification, no formulation of laws, no cism, no classification, no formulation of laws, no definite effort towards a coherent description of phenomena. When we turn to Mathematics, we find traces of very rudimentary knowledge. The square is mentioned (Ex 27<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>), and the circle (Is 44<sup>13</sup>), the plumb-line and scales were known (Am 7<sup>7</sup>, 2 K 21<sup>13</sup>). The four simple mathematical processes appear also to have been practised: Addition (Nu 1<sup>23</sup> 26<sup>7</sup>), Subtraction (Lv 27<sup>16</sup>, Ex 16<sup>23</sup>), Multiplication (Lv 25<sup>8</sup>, Nu 3<sup>16</sup>), Division (Lv 25<sup>27,16</sup>).

The only department of thought in which the

The only department of thought in which the Hebrews can claim to have elaborated anything at all worthy to be called 'science' is literary criticism. This, however, was pursued, not in a modern spirit of desire for knowledge, but because the disasters which the nation had experienced drove its religious leaders to a more careful analysis and preservation of the Law, in order that, by obeying it, the anger of God might be appeased and the prosperity of the people might return. The scribes 'busied themselves in providing for all conceivable' legal 'cases that might occur, and especially in making a hedge or fence round the Law, i.e. in so expanding the compass of legal precept beyond what was laid down in the Pentateuch and in the oldest form of tradition, that it might be impossible for a man, if he observed all their traditional rules, to be even tempted to transgress the Law' (see art. 'Scribes' in Hastings' DB). Thus the literary and legal 'science' of the scribes had all the defects of the 'scientific' temper of the Jews—the criterion of truth was not descriptive accuracy, but edification, the method was inventive and metaphysical, there was an absence of generalizing and systema-tizing power, and an over-emphasis of the particu-lar and concrete.

II. RELATION OF CHRIST TO THE 'SCIENCE' OF HIS TIME AND RACE. - We have now to inquire as to the mind of Christ in respect of the various matters discussed above, that is, we have to ask whether His standard of truth was Hebrew or modern; whether He sought to explain nature by the metaphysical or the descriptive method; whether He shared the mental characteristics of the Hebrews or not, and whether we are to assume that He held those erroneous views of nature which were common among the Hebrews.

1. Among the most obvious characteristics of the mind of Christ is His sense of the radical opposition between Himself and the life of His own day. This opposition expresses itself at every turn in many ways. The political ambitions of the Herodians, the compromising worldliness of the Sadducees, the formalism and pride of the Pharisees, and the carnal carelessness of the generality, alike met with His denunciation and appeal. The traditions of the scribes He altogether rejected, and even the authority of the Law He subjected to a penetrating criticism. Against all existing systems of thought, all Rabbinical teaching all conventional observed. all Rabbinical teaching, all conventional observ-ance, He set up one authority—His own consciousness of God, Himself. In a unique way He lived in the realities of things, never compromising, never with double mind. To the great reality of the Father and of the Kingdom was added the great reality of Himself, in simple deep-founded truth.

2. We have seen that the Hebrew notion of truth differed from the modern notion, in that it rather attached to the nature of a person than to the quality of a proposition. A proposition was true, not so much because it tallied with certain facts as because it had its origin in a certain character. In other words, the Jewish idea of truth was religious, while the modern idea is scientific. But the Jewish idea was never purely religious. It was confused with metaphysical and mechanical elements. In the mind of Jesus, however, this Hebrew notion of religious truth is purified of all foreign elements, and ceases all contact with the accidents of experience, making its home in the soul and in God.

It is noteworthy that the Synoptists report no sayings of Jesus from which these conclusions as to the meaning Christ attached to the word 'truth' can be formally drawn, though, when once they have been drawn, it is seen that none of the sayings of Jesus contradicts them. In the Synoptics the word 'truth' is not used by Jesus except in such phrases as 'of a truth,' the Gr. equivalent for 'Amen' (Lk 9" 12" 21"). When we come to the Fourth Gospel, however (which we assume to be of sufficient historicity to allow us to use the words ascribed to Jesus as representing His thought), we find the words 'true' and 'truth' continually in the mouth of Christ. Now, while the criterion of truth in the mind of Christ does not vary, we must not be surprised if different shades of meaning are expressed from time to time by the same words 'true' and 'truth.' Indeed, Jesus does not use the word 'truth' always with the same nuance of meaning. In the first place, it represents a quality in a person (423 1877), then a quality which attaches to actions (321), and, finally, that which may be communicated from God to man in thought so as to affect the life and give the quality referred to above (8<sup>32</sup> 14<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>13</sup> 17<sup>17</sup>). The whole conception is summed up in 14<sup>6</sup>, where Jesus says, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life'—the Personality of Jesus is a revelation that is ethical and vitalizing, and that comes to men to quicken consciences, illumine minds, and arouse There is, indeed, in this thought an affections. element answering to our modern notion of accuracy; it is not, however, explicit, but implicit in the idea of a faithful or reliable character. Thus Jesus carries the Hebrew idea of religious truth to its final expression, and in so doing neither anticipates nor challenges the modern notion of scientific truth. To the modern mind truth is description of phenomena—to Christ it meant spiritual insight: by the modern mind it is reached through demonstration and reasoning — for Christ it was instinctive or inspirational: to the modern mind it is part of a system of thought-with Christ it was an element or moment in life.

'ἀλόθυω,' says Beyschlag, 'is to Him not this or that worldly and finite truth, but the truth of God, the revelation of God as the eternally good, who, as such, is open-hearted to the world... it is the sister of χώων, for every revelation of God is a revelation of holy love' (NT Theol. ii. 429). See also TRUTH.

3. But although 'truth,' according to the mind of Christ, was a Hebrew and religious concept and not the modern scientific notion, the thought of Jesus was free from all the extravagances which we have seen to be characteristic of the Jews, though it shared some of their conceptions as to natural phenomena.* If His thought was not scientific, neither was it pseudo-scientific. Neither the midrash of the Jewish annalist nor the magical metaphysics of the Rabbis has any place in His teaching. While He was a keen observer of nature (Mt 6<sup>26, 28</sup> 13<sup>31, 23, 26-43</sup>, Mk 4<sup>26-29</sup>, Lk 13<sup>6-9, 20, 21</sup>), His utterances about nature never attempted explanations beyond the reach of observation; and while His judgment was to an unequalled degree independent, He neither criticised the scientific opinions of His day nor attempted to add to humanity's in-adequate store of knowledge. Whether this abstinence from scientific speculation and instruction was intentional (as Wendt suggests), or the natural result of His unwavering and complete concentra-tion of soul upon 'His Father's business,' is not important in this connexion. It is sufficient to notice that He eschewed alike Rabbinical explanations and scientific research, dealing finally only with 'those matters which are naturally the objects of spiritual intuition, and which, unlike natural phenomena, cannot be adequately investigated by the human understanding.

So far as nature is concerned, then, we may say that the knowledge which Jesus exhibits in His sayings is just such as a free mind with great natural powers of fresh observation might gather from a joyous intercourse with the ordinary aspects of the material world.

4. One matter of considerable controversial importance, however, in this connexion demands brief portance, however, in this connexion demands brief attention. What was the attitude of Jesus to the literary 'science' of the Rabbis? It was a double attitude. First, He abolished certain precepts of the Law itself (Mt 5<sup>32</sup> <sup>38</sup>), and added others on His own authority (vv. <sup>32</sup> <sup>34</sup> <sup>39</sup>); and, secondly, He disparaged and discredited the learned societies of scribes, and, by the weight of His own authority, overthrew their teaching. But this repudiation overthrew their teaching. But this repudiation of the teaching of the schools and criticism of the Law was not conceived in any modern scientific temper, or achieved by means of modern critical apparatus. It was the inevitable outcome of Christ's conception of Divine truth as a living reality within Himself. His utterances concerning the OT were all from this point of view. He judged them according to their spiritual and religious value, not according to any canons of textual criticism, modern or ancient. This is true even in the case of the quotation from Ps 110. 'He did not weigh a truth,' says Bishop Moorhouse, 'in what we should call critical balances . . . the question of the age or authorship of any passage in the OT was never either stated by our Lord Himself or raised by His opponents.

5. We have next to ask whether we may conclude from His recorded sayings that Jesus shared those logical characteristics which we have seen to be at the foundations of Hebrew 'scientific' thought. We noticed two main marks of the Hebrew mind -its vivid, simple, and temperate apprehension of the details of life and nature, and its inability to take such a wide and comprehensive view of fact and experience as would make the generalizations of modern science possible. The first of these is pre-eminently characteristic of the thought of Jesus. The vivid originality, profound simplicity, and pictorial impressiveness of His speech make every reader of His words agree that 'never man so spake.' His insight into the human soul, His parables so true to life, His startling paradoxes, His telling object-lessons, all show the best traits of Jewish thought carried to their highest power. The concrete, stirring, and simple elements of life are seized and appreciated with the imagination of the poet and the practical sense of the workman. Jesus is never abstract, never modern—but always particular and Hebrew. But, on the other hand, it is impossible to speak of the mind of Jesus as defective in the sense given above. While He always expresses Himself with the simple concrete-While He ness characteristic of Hebrew thought, it cannot be said that He is limited by it, for it is the best possible medium or dialectic in which to enunciate religious truth. It is scientific truth which demands abstraction, with definitions per genus et differentiam and laws. We have seen that Jesus remained always and wholly within the world of religious truth, and always and wholly outside the world of scientific statement. He was not a theologian who theorized about religious truth—He was the Truth. He was not a philosopher who tried to prove the being of God—He declared God. And so the apparatus of scientific description was for Him unnecessary. It would be futile to speculate as to whether He could have used it had He wished. All we need say is that He was a Jew with a Hebrew mind of the highest possible type, and so in the fullest possible sense equipped to utter the highest revelation of God which has been vouchsafed to man.

SCORN.—Of scorn pure and simple there is remarkably little trace in the recorded words and actions of Jesus Christ. Whereas other teachers of lofty morality have usually treated with some contempt those who made no effort to approach their ideals, Christ's attitude towards the sinner was uniformly one of sympathetic help. He alone recognized the intimate relation which exists between the Creator and the human race, and His knowledge of this relation and of the possibilities of each individual prevented Him from despising man, whom the Father had made in His own image, however much that image might have been defaced. Thus it is that we never find Him using sarcasm, a form of scorn calculated to wound rather than to improve. Even the elparela of Socrates, the affected self-depreciation which threw ridicule upon the egotism of others, has no counterpart in the Gospels. When Jesus used scorn, He employed it as a skilled physician, who wounds with the intention of healing. It is thus that He uses it to the Pharisees, whose cloak of self-righteousness needed to be pierced through with some sharp weapon, if they were to be brought to the state of mind in which they might be capable of any improvement.

1. The scorn of contempt.—A single word of

1. The scorn of contempt.—A single word of unmitigated contempt is recorded by St. Luke as used by Christ. It occurs in His answer to the threat used by certain Pharisees of danger from Herod Antipas (Lk 13<sup>81, 23</sup>). 'Go ye,' He said,

'and tell that she-fox.' The phrase τŷ ἀλώπεκι ταύτη is certainly surprising at first sight, and unlike any other phrase employed by our Lord, not even excepting His comparison of the scribes and Pharisees to 'whited sepulchres,' 'serpents,' and 'offspring of vipers' (Mt 23<sup>27.53</sup>). The fact of the word ἀλώπεκι being in the feminine gender is perhaps only an accident. The word is found, it is true, in the masculine gender in Ca 2<sup>18</sup>, but it is generally found in the feminine, e.g. Jg 1<sup>25</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>10</sup>, Mt 8<sup>25</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>. The fox was and is a type of knavish craftiness. The particular offence of Herod on this occasion was his crafty endeavour to get rid of an influential preacher of righteousness by uttering a threat by the mouth of others, which he had not the courage himself to carry into effect. He was unwilling to add to the unpopularity caused by his treatment of John the Baptist by a repetition of it in the case of Jesus. No doubt the general character and conduct of Herod helped to suggest the application of the expression,—his unscrupulous nature (Lk 3<sup>19</sup> περί πάντων ων ἐποίησε πονηρῶν), his tyranny (13<sup>21</sup>), his weakness (Mk 14<sup>9</sup>), his profession of Judaism, combined with his heathen practices, his adultery and incest, and his murder of the prophet John. Such is the character which elicits the one recorded word of contemptuous scorn from the lips of Jesus.

2. The scorn of denunciation.—While remarkably free from any contempt for those people who had ideals and failed to reach them (c.g. the young man with great riches and the Apostle Peter), or for those who from lack of any ideal were for the time outcast from society (c.g. the despised publicans, Mk 2<sup>15-17</sup>), He showed clearly His contempt for all religious professions and practices which were not of the heart. 'The vain practices which were not of the heart. 'The vain practices which trusted to formality for salvation, had in Him a mortal enemy... He preferred forgiveness to sacrifice. The love of God, charity, and mutual forgiveness were His whole law.' Yet in all His dealings with the systems of the scribes and the teaching of the legal doctors, His words bear little trace of mere contempt, but rather of stern denunciation. His attitude was defined at a comparatively early stage during the ministry in Northern Galilee, when He gave His definition of moral defilement (Mt 15<sup>11</sup>, Mk 7<sup>15</sup>) by saying, 'Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, this defileth the man.' This attitude culminated in the sublime anti-Pharisaic discourse in which the foibles and vices of a degenerate piety were depicted with prophetic plainness and scornful denunciation (Mt 23; cf. also Mk 12<sup>28-40</sup> and Lk 20<sup>46-47</sup>).

3. The soorn of silence.—Of all the occasions of scorn displayed by Jesus, none are more marked than those when He met mere captious questions and criticism either by a definite refusal to answer, or by absolute silence. Such an instance is recorded (Mt 21<sup>23-27</sup>) when Jesus met the question of the chief priests and scribes, 'By what authority doest thou these things?' with a counter question, and on their refusal to answer declined in turn to reply to their question. Still more impressive was the silent scorn with which He met His accusers at the various stages of His trial, refusing in turn to answer the accusation of false witnesses (Mt 28<sup>20-23</sup>, Mk 14<sup>20</sup>) and the questions of the chief priests and elders (Mt 27<sup>13</sup>, Mk 15<sup>2-5</sup>), of Herod (Lk 23<sup>9</sup>), and lastly of Pilate himself (Mt 27<sup>14</sup>,

In comparing these instances, we find no word used simply for the purpose of causing pain. The contemptuous expression used on the occasion of Herod's threat is, we have seen, amply justified by the character of the man, and destined to hold up to reprobation so paltry a device and so wretched a personality. In the rest His silence is an expression of His own dignity, and of His refusal to give an answer to questions and charges which were not intended to bring the truth to light, but merely to raise unreasonable prejudice; while His severe attacks on the character of those who were too blinded by their imaginary virtues to try to amend their lives, are wonderful instances of a acorn unmarred by ill-nature and untainted with cynicism.

On scorn of which Christ was the object, see artt. DESPISE, MOCKERY, REPROACH.

BOORPION (snapples).—A real nuisance in hot countries, especially in Bible lands, scarce and comparatively innocuous in Southern Europe, the scorpion is unknown save from hearsay in Central and Northern Europe. It has, however, left its mark in the familiar expression in cauda venenum, as well as in astronomical science, where it counts amongst the constellations of the Zodiac.

1. Zoological description. The scorpion is an arthropod, of the class of Aracknoide, of the subclass of Arthrogastra, of the order of Scorpionides. It has four pairs of legs, and in front one pair of extremely strong claws (palpi). Its abdomen consists of 7 anterior segments, broad and intimately connected with the cephalo-thorax, and of 6 posterior segments, which are narrower, and constitute the tail (or post-abdomen). The last of these 6 posterior segments is incurved underneath, and terminates in a pointed hook surrounded by two powerful venomous glands. The scorpion catches its prey with its strong claws, curves its tail towards it above its own back, and inflicts the death sting. The scorpion's sting is very painful even for man; it may prove fatal when the insect belongs to one of the big tropical species; and even with minor species life may be imperilled when the throat is concerned; cf. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bibl. 3, p. 303), who has 'known one instance [in Palestine] of a man dying from the effect of the scorpion's sting.'

There occurs in Southern Europe, sometimes even in Switzerland and Southern Germany, a species of scorpion relatively innocuous—the scorpius Europæus. In the Mediterranean peninsulæ as well as in the South of France, another more dangerous species is to be found, the Buthus occionus. In the Eastern lands of the Bible there are six, eight, perhaps even twelve different species of ecorpions belonging to the genera Buthus and Androctonus. They reach a length of 5 to 6 inches (in tropical countries 12 inches; cf. Morris, Bible Natural History, Calcutta, 1896, p. 101) Palgrave (Central and Eastern Arabia, 1883, p. 28) was stung in Arabaa by one of the numerous 'desert ecorpions,' which he describes as 'curious little creatures, about a fourth of an inch in length, and apparently all claws and tail, of a deep reddishbrown colour, and very active.' The Talmud of Jerusalem (Ber. 9a) says that the scorpion's sting is even more dangerous than that of the snake, because it repeats it. Conder (Tent Work's, 1805, p. 113) tells that he was stung by one scorpion 'in six places along the leg.'

Scorpions are exclusively carnivorous, feeding upon insects and worms. They are useful in destroying mosquitoes. Not infrequently they devour each other. The female scorpion eats up the male after fecundation.

Ancient authors (Aristotle, Pliny) report that acceptons devour their own parents. This assertion is connected with a false setymology of the Heb. word NAP (true etymology unknown), as if it were derived from NAP to exterminate, and NAP isthec.' Thomsen (LB il. 480) "tried the superiment of surrounding a scorpion with a ring of fire, and when it despaired of mcape, it repeatedly struck its own head, and soon died either from the poison or its Satanic rage—I could not be certain which—perhaps from both combined."

There are differently coloured scorpions: some are black, others brown, reddish, yellowish, grey or white, some are striped. They are frequently found in Palestine under stones, among ruine, in crevices of walls, in dung-heaps, and empty cisterns. Travellers camping in tents or lodging in the houses of natives, as well as archeologists conducting excavations, have to be careful to guard themselves and their men from scorpions; for even when the sting is not fatal, it is a cause of acute pain, and prevents walking and working.

According to a popular superstition, a man who has eaten a scorpion is immune against the sting of any of these animals, and able to relieve a victim by sucking the wound (Conder, i.e.). It is also believed that by applying to the wound a squashed accepton, or by reading some magic formulas over the patient, a cure is effected.

2. OT references.—In geography, scorpions gave their name to a place mentioned in the OT—the 'Ascent of Scorpions,' ma'dleh 'Atrabbim (Nu 34', Jos 15', Jg 1''), at the limit of the territory of Judah, towards Idumses, south-west from the Dead Sea; it is probably the pass now called Nako ca-Safa, leading to Wady-Fikreh, or another pass near the same wady.

This piace afterwards gave its name to a toparchy (I Mac 55, Jos. Ant. XII vili 1), the Idumman Akrabatters which is not to be confused with another toparchy also called Akrabattene (Jos. BJ. II. XII. 4, XX. 4, XXI. 2, III. iii. 5, IV. ix 3, V), from its chief city. Akrabatta—in the Onomanticon Assassio (cf. Piny, HN v. 14), in the Chromoon Samaritanum Akrabith, in modern times Akrabeh - 9 Roman wiles (8 English miles) cantrom Náblus, on the way to Jericho (Robinson, BRP il. 230, iil. 2961. Guerin, Samaris, ii. 3-5. SFP. h. 386, S81; PEP31, 1876, p. 190). There is also near Damascus a village Akraba, which has given its name to the Akrabani, a canal of the Barada (Robinson, BRP iii. 447, 469).

Once only in the OT is there mention of scorpions in the proper sense, Dt 8<sup>16</sup>, where they are named as one of the plagues of the desert of the wanderings

In I K 1211 14 (and v 24 in LXX, a verse missing in MT) and 2 Ch 1011 14 the word 'scorpion' occurs in the threata of King Rehoboam to his subjects. In the case scorpion may be simply a metaphor, but it is also possible that under this name the larachtes were acquirated with some instrument of torture, either a white consisting of several thongs leaded with knobs and hooks of metal, or a knotty stetle armed with prominent nail heads. The Romans had such an instrument, of Isidorus of Sevilla (Origines, 27). Virga nodows et aculeata.

In Ezk 2<sup>a</sup> scorpions symbolize (with briars and thorns) the vexations inflicted on the prophet by his companions. In Sir 26<sup>a</sup> the wicked woman is compared with the scorpion; in 39<sup>a</sup> scorpions are numbered among the plagues God uses for chastising the ungodly. In 4 Mac 11<sup>a</sup> a man fastened in the torture-wheel is compared with a scorpion curving its body. Finally, in 1 Mac 6<sup>a</sup> a kind of machine of war for throwing projectiles is mentioned under the (diminutive) name of σκορκίδια (cf. Crear, BG vii. 25).

Crear, BG vii. 25).

3. NT references.—The Gospels mention scorpions twice. (1) In Lk 11<sup>11, 18</sup> we have three questions concerning a father giving to his son a stone instead of a loaf, a serpent instead of a fish, a scorpion instead of an egg. In the parallel passage (Mt 78, 18) the third question is omitted (and in certain MSS and Versions of Luke the first question); hence it has been asserted that the saying of Jesus in its primitive form contained only two questions or perhaps one. But Jesus may have given more than one or two illustrations of His meaning, and we have to remember that bread, fish, and eggs were (and are still) the usual food of the inhabitants of Galilee. It has been frequently asked whether a scorpion bears such a likeness to an egg that a confusion between the two would be natural. But there is no question of likeness or confusion in this third case any more than in the case of the loaf and the stone, the fish and the serpent. It is not at all satisfactory to say with Thomson (LB ii. 479), that 'old writers speak of a white scorpion; and such a one, with its tail folded up . . . would not look unlike a small egg.

The Greeks had a proverb resembling the text of the Gospels we are discussing—art) πίρκος σπορατον, and they used to interpret it by easying: iπὶ τῶν τὰ χύρα αἰραμμικα ἀντὶ τῶν βλιτίσκο. The existence of that proverb does not prove that Jesus necessarily associated in one single sentence the fish and the scorpion, and that ψόν has to be corrected into ὄψον.

(2) Jesus says (Lk 1019) that He has given His disciples την έξουσίαν τοῦ πατεῖν ἐπάνω δφεων καὶ σκορπίων. There seems to be in these words an allusion to Ps 91<sup>13</sup>, where the LXX has (90<sup>13</sup>) ἐπ' dσπίδα και βασιλίσκου έπιβήση, whereas the MT has 'lion' and 'adder.' The Hebrew and Greek disagreeing, it is not impossible that in another transmission the scorpion has been substituted for one of the terms signifying serpent. It is certainly more natural to combine Lk 10<sup>19</sup> with Ps 91<sup>13</sup>, than with Dt 8<sup>15</sup> or with Ezk 2<sup>6</sup>: both these texts are more similar ad verbum, not ad sensum.

Another question is whether 'serpents and scorpions' means here animals in the proper sense of the word (Mk 16<sup>18</sup> and Ac 28<sup>3-6</sup> might be quoted in support of this interpretation), or if it is a metaphor indicating the powers of evil. This alternative, however, does not correspond to the notions of the ancients, who did not, as we do, make a rigorous distinction between terrestrial and supra-terrestrial beings. Joh. Weiss (Schriften des NT, ad loc.) says rightly that an excellent illustration of this says rightly that an excellent illustration of this passage of the Gospel is given in the famous verse of Luther's hymn: 'Und wenn die Welt voll Teufel wär . . .' Moreover, we have to observe that Rev 9<sup>2.5-10</sup> describe supernatural destructive beings similar, at least partially, to scorpions. This has to be brought into conjunction with an antique Babylonian conception. In the epic of Gilgamesh (Table IX. cols. ii.-iv.) we find the mention of two scorpion-men, one male and the other tion of two scorpion-men, one male and the other female, terrible giants, keepers of a door (cf. P. Jensen, 'Assyr. Bab. Mythen und Epen' in KIB vi. p. 205 ff., and the same writer's Das Gilgamesch-Epos in der Weltliteratur, i. pp. 24-27, 79, 93). A. Jeremias (Izdubar-Nimrod, 1891, p. 66 f.) and F. X. Kugler ('Die Sternenfahrt des Gilgamesch, 'Sternen aus Marie Land 1991, 1991, 1994, 144 f.) in Stimmen aus Maria Laach, lxvi., 1904, p. 441 ff.) have shown that those two celestial scorpions-reproduced in Babylonian sculptures—were the two zodiacal constellations Scorpio and Sagittarius. We might also see, but less probably, in the second scorpion, the constellation of the Balance, which was called by the ancient Greeks Chelæ, i.e. the 'Claws' of the Scorpion (cf. Ideler, Sternnamen, pp. 174–178).

In Christian art the scorpion has received a symbolical character, as an emblem of the anti-Christian power. Thus a scorpion is to be seen on the shield of a Roman soldier in B. Luini's cele-brated fresco, 'The Crucifixion,' in Santa Maria degli Angeli, Lugano.

SCOURGE, SCOURGING.—In the Gospels the vb. 'scourge' is tr. of two Gr. terms, μαστιγόω (fr. μάστιξ, found in Gospels only in a metaphorical sense [EV 'plague,' RVm 'Gr. scourge'], but used in its literal meaning in Ac 22th, He 11th); and φραγελλίω (fr. φραγελλίω, Lat. flagellum, which occurs in Jn 215). φραγέλλιον denotes the scourge proper as an instrument of punishment, while proper as an institution of pulnishinent, while pulatrik in class. Gr. is often used of an ordinary whip for driving, etc. In NT, however, μαστιγόω is a synonym for φραγελλόω (cf. Mk 10<sup>34</sup> and 15<sup>15</sup>, Mt 27<sup>36</sup> and Jn 19<sup>1</sup>). The subject of scourging comes before us in three connexions.

(1) In Jn 2<sup>15</sup> Jesus makes a scourge (φραγέλλων) of cords (ἐκ σχοινίων) and drives the descerating crowd of traders, as well as their sheep and oxen, out of the Temple. Farrar and others have represented this scourge of Jesus as nothing more than sented this scourge of Jesus as nothing more than a whip twisted hastily out of the rushes with which the floor would be littered—a pure symbol of authority, therefore, not a weapon of offence. In this case, however, we should have had  $\sigma \chi \alpha \nu \omega \nu$ , not  $\sigma \chi \alpha \nu \nu \omega \nu$ ,  $\sigma \chi \alpha \nu \nu \omega \nu$  is a rope, not a rush, and though originally applied to a rope made from rushes, is used in class. Gr. in a general sense. On the only other occasion of its employment in the NT it means a rope strong enough to tow a the NT it means a rope strong enough to tow a ship's boat in a gale (Ac 27<sup>32</sup>). To drive a herd of oxen out of the Temple courts, moreover, someoxen out of the Temple courts, moreover, something more than a symbol of authority would be required. But we need not suppose that Jesus, even in His indignation, struck the merchants themselves. For them the sign of His authority would be sufficient (cf. Jn 18<sup>6</sup>), and, as Bengel says, 'terrore rem perfecit.'
(2) In Mt 10<sup>17</sup> Jesus forewarns the Apostles of a time when men would scourge them in their synagogues; and in 23<sup>34</sup> He predicts that the scribes and Pharisees will thus treat those whom He sends The later history gives ample evidence unto them. of the fulfilment of these words (see Ac 5 to 2219,

2 Co 65 1123. 24).

(3) But, above all, we must think of the scourging endured by Jesus Himself. According to all the Synoptics, Jesus foresaw this as part of the suffering that lay before Him (Mt 2019, Mk 1034, Lk 1838). It was, indeed, almost inseparable from His vision of the Cross, for scourging formed the ordinary accompaniment of a Roman crucifixion (cf. Jos. BJ v. xi. 1). Sometimes it was employed in criminal cases as a means of extracting confession, but regularly as the brutal preliminary to the still more brutal death of the cross. Because of the apparent inconsistency between Mt 27<sup>28</sup>, Mk 15<sup>15</sup>, on the one hand, and Jn 19<sup>1</sup>, on the other, as to the particular stage of the trial at which Jesus was Gospels, however, does not support this idea. The statements of Mt. and Mk., though they convey, when taken alone, the impression of a scourging immediately before the crucifixion, do not necessarily bear this meaning, but may quite well be understood retrospectively, and as implying simply that Jesus had to endure the scourge before going to the cross. Probably the key to the difficulty is to be found in Lk.'s narrative, where Pilate says, 'Why, what evil hath this man done? I have 'Why, what evil hath this man done? I have found no cause of death in him: I will therefore chastise him and release him' (23<sup>22</sup>). These words show that Pilate meant the scourging to be a compromise between the death which the Jews demanded and the verdict of absolute innocence which was called for by his own sense of justice. And this is confirmed by Jn.'s narrative, which shows Pilate scourging Jesus (19<sup>1</sup>) and holding Him up to mockery (vv.<sup>2, 2</sup>) in the evident hope of satisfying the multitude, still insisting that he found no crime in Him (v.<sup>4</sup>), and yielding at last, only with reluctance, to the demand for His crucifixion (v.<sup>82</sup>). See art. TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST.

A Roman scourging might be carried out either in which leather thongs weighted with rough pieces of lead or iron were attached to a stout pieces of lead or iron were attached to a stout wooden handle. St. Paul's three Roman scourgings, as distinguished from his five Jewish ones, were inflicted by means of rods (ἡαβδίζω, 2 Co 11<sup>25</sup>, Ac 16<sup>22, 23</sup>). But Jerusalem was not a Roman town, like Philippi (Ac 16<sup>13</sup> RV), and Pilate had no lictors. Jesus was scourged by soldiers, and the implement they used, as the vb. φραγελλόω (Mt 27<sup>25</sup>, Mk 16<sup>15</sup>) almost implies, would be the dreadful Roman flagellum. St. Peter may have witnessed it all; and what a world of meaning then lies in his words, 'by whose stripes [Gr. 'bruise' or 'weal'] ye were healed' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>, cf. Is 53<sup>5</sup>).

SCRIBES.—The Scribes were a class of learned Jews who devoted themselves to a scientific study of the Law, and made its exposition their professional occupation. The word which we translate 'scribes' is γραμματεῖς, 'the learned,' which corresponds to the Hebrew number. This is their usual appellation, but they are also called in the Gospels, especially in Lk., 'lawyers' (νομικοί) and 'doctors of the law' (νομοδιδάσκαλοι). See LAWYER. They are very frequently associated in the Synoptics with the Pharisees and with the chief rejects and with the Pharisees, and with the chief priests and elders, but there is no mention of 'scribes' in the Fourth Gospel at all, except in the special passage dealing with the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8<sup>3</sup>).

1. Origin, development, and characteristics.—
(1) After the return from the Exile the Jewish community was organized under Ezra and Nehemiah on the basis of the regulations of the so-called Mosaic Law. At a great gathering of the people, of which an account is given in Neh 8-10, the Law was publicly read by Ezra, and a solemn covenant entered into for national obedience to it. Being entered into for national obedience to it. Being thus established as the binding rule of both civil and religious life, it became necessary that the Law should be thoroughly studied and interpreted to the people, who otherwise could not reasonably be expected to comprehend fully its principles and their application. This duty at first fell naturally to the priests, who for a time continued the main teachers and guardians of the Law. But gradually there grew up an independent class of men, other than the priests, who devoted themselves to the study of the Law, and made acquaintance with it their profession. These were the Scribes. Possibly at first their chief duty was to make copies of the Law, but the higher function of interpretation was soon added; and as the supreme importance of the Law came more and more to be recognized, so the profession of a Scribe came to be held in higher estimation than even that of a priest.

(2) During the Grecian period of Jewish history, a strong feeling of opposition was developed between the Scribes and, at least, the higher order of the priests. Even in the time of Ezra a feud had arisen between those who held strictly by the Law-especially in the matter of foreign alliances -and those who, like the aristocratic high-priestly families, had sought to increase their influence by marriage with outsiders. And when, through the influence of Hellenic culture, the priestly aristocracy became infected with heathen ideas, and fell away from the laws and customs of Judaism, the duty of upholding the Law fell mainly upon the Scribes, who from that time forward became the real teachers of the people, and dominated their whole spiritual life. They were still, however, mainly religious students and teachers, and had taken little part in political agitation. Their ideal was not to engage in any political scheme for throwing Their ideal was off the foreign yoke, but to establish the Law of God in their own midst. The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to suppress the Jewish religion compelled them to change their character, and drove them into open rebellion. Among the most strenuous opponents of his endeavour to Hellenize the Jews were the Hasidæans, or party of 'the pious,' who may be taken to represent the strictest adherents of the teaching of the Scribes, and who carried their ideas of the sanctity of the Law to the suicidal extent of refusing to defend themselves when attacked on the Sabbath. But it was only the maintenance of the Jewish religion for which they fought, and they had no objections to alien rule, provided they were allowed freedom of faith. This object they regarded as accomplished by the treaty with Lysias, which provided at once for their political subjection and for their religious the Maccabean party were aiming also at the political independence of the nation, the Hasidæans separated from them, and in the time of John Hyrcanus we find the Pharisees—'the separated' —who practically represented the same party as the Hasidæans, in opposition to the Hasmonæan or Maccabæan dynasty. See Pharistes.

(3) From this time onward to the time of Christ the influence of the Scribes became more and more predominant. They were given seats in the Sanhedrin, and were held in very high respect by the people. They never, indeed, became the governing class, but in the councils of the nation their influence could always be depended upon to outweigh that of the priestly aristocracy, who held the high appointments. They were usually addressed as 'Rabbi,' i.e. 'my master,' an appellation which gradually developed into a title, though not till after the time of Christ. The honour in which they were held by their world and her their problems. which they were held by their pupils, and by others, was extraordinary, even exceeding the honour accorded to parents, and they were very particular in exacting it, claiming generally everywhere the first rank. Their scribal labours were understood to be gratuitous, and, if they had no private fortune, they had to provide for their livelihood by combining some secular business with their study of the Law; but the latter was always regarded as their most important occupa-tion. It is questionable, however, if the theory of gratuitous instruction was always strictly adhered to.

From the earliest period there is evidence to show that they tended to associate themselves in guilds or families—an arrangement which would facilitate the interchange of opinion on difficult points in the study of the Law. Up till the destruction of Jerusalem the main seat of their activity was in Judwa, 'the scribes from Jerusalem' (Mt 15<sup>1</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>) being spoken of as the most important and influential members of the party. But they were to be found elsewhere as well, in Galilee and among the Jews in other lands, wherever the Law and its precepts were held in esteem. As a rule, they may be said to have been Pharisees, although not exclusively. The Pharisees, indeed, were those whose professed object it was to regulate their lives in strict accordance with the Law, written and oral, as that was expounded by its best accredited interpreters. Hence there was a natural affinity between them and the Scribes, whose profession it was to interpret the Law. But it is extremely probable that there were also Scribes who were Sadducees, for the Sadducees also adhered to the written Law, and doubtless had their Scribes to interpret it. Support is lent to this view by the expressions in Mk  $2^{16}$  the scribes of the Pharisees,' and in Lk  $5^{20}$  the Pharisees and their scribes,' which seem to indicate that there were other Scribes than those of the Pharisees. In the time of Christ the great mass of the Scribes was divided into two schools, named after the famous leaders, Hillel and Shammai, about whom little is certainly known. The School of Hillel was distinguished for its mildness in the interpretation of the Law, and that of Shammai for its strictness, corresponding to the traditional characters of the respective founders; but the points of difference between them concerned only the trivial minutiæ, and never touched the weightier matters of the Law.

2. Functions.—The functions of the Scribes are well summed up in the traditional saying ascribed to the 'Men of the Great Synagogue. laid down three rules: Be careful in pronouncing judgment! bring up many pupils! and make a fence about the Law! The professional employment of the Scribes, therefore, fell under three heads:—(1) The study and development of the Law itself; (2) the teaching of it to their pupils; and (3) its practical administration in the Sanhedrin and other courts; that is to say, they acted as students, teachers, and judges.

(1) The study and development of the Law.—The Mosaic Law, as embodied in their sacred records, was definitely recognized by the Jews as the absolute rule of life. To direct his conduct in accordance with it in every minute detail was the ideal of the pious Jew. But there were many subjects upon which the Law, as recorded, gave no precise direction, and much of it, for popular apprehension, required interpretation and exposition. To interpret and expound it, and to fill up what was lacking in the way of casuistic detail, was the business of the Scribes. They devoted themselves to a close and careful study of the Law, to the accumulation of precedents, to the working out of inferences and deductions, and to a general development of legal regulations so as to meet every possible circumstance which might occur in human life, and to keep the Law in harmony with the changing wants of the times. So diligently did they pursue this course, and so extensive and complicated did Jewish Law in consequence become, that only by the assiduous study of a lifetime could a man become an expert in its various branches. The difficulty of doing so was greatly increased by the fact that this mass of accumulated detail was not committed to writing, but was propagated entirely by oral tradition. It was called the Halacha, or Law of Custom, as distinct from the Torah, or Written Law, upon which it was understood to be based.

See, further, art. PHARISEES, p. 353 f.

But the Scribes did not confine their labours to the Law. They studied also the historical and didactic portions of Scripture, and elaborated with a very free hand the history and religious instruction contained therein. This elaboration was called the Haggadah. It ran into various extravagant forms—theosophic, eschatological, and Messianic. Imagination was given free play, so long as its products would fit in with the general framework of Jewish thought, and to its influence was largely due the circle of religious ideas existing in New Testament times.

(2) Teaching of the Law.—To teach the Law was also the professional business of the Scribes. In order that people should obey the Law, it was necessary that they should know it; and an in the Jewish tradition could be learned only with the assistance of a teacher. None of these traditional rules having been written down, the teaching was of necessity entirely oral, and round the more famous of the Scribes there gathered large numbers of young men, eager for instruction as to the proper conduct of life. Of these, some in their turn would become Scribes and teachers of the Law. The chief requisite, for both pupil and teacher, was a capacious and accurate memory. The method of teaching was by a constant repetition of the precepts of the Law, as only by this means could its multitude of minute details be at all kept in remembrance. The disputational method was also followed. Concrete cases, real or imaginary, were brought before the pupils, and they were required to pronounce judgment upon them, which judgment the teacher would criticise. The pupils were also allowed to propose questions to the were also allowed to propose questions to the teacher, and to attend disputations amongst teachers over difficult problems. But the two all-important duties were these—first, to keep everything faithfully in memory; and, second, never to teach anything otherwise than it had been taught by the master. Not even the expressions of the teacher were allowed to be changed. Accuracy in the minutest detail was the most commendable achievement.

For purposes of teaching and of disputation there were special places set apart—'houses of teaching,' as they were called—where the teacher sat upon an elevated bench, and the pupils on the ground. In Jerusalem, lectures were delivered in the Temple, somewhere in the outer court. The the Temple, somewhere in the outer court. The 'houses of teaching' were distinct from the synagogues; but as it was through the influence of the Scribes that the synagogue service originated, so doubtless they availed themselves of the opportunities which the synagogues gave them of teaching the Law to the common people. The Scripture exposition, which usually formed part of the service, might, indeed, be given by any one qualified to speak; but ordinarily it fell to a Scribe, if any were present, as the one most competent to if any were present, as the one most competent to discharge the duty.

(3) The Scribes as judges.—To the Scribes, as specially skilled in knowledge of the Law, it also naturally fell to take a leading part in its practical administration. From the time of the Hasmonæans they had formed a constituent element in the Sanhedrin, being associated in that body with the chief priests and elders, and it was usually the Scribes who exercised the greatest influence in its deliberations. In the local courts they were also naturally looked to for advice and judgment. Any one, indeed, who possessed the confidence of the community might be appointed a local judge, and probably for the most part the small local courts were presided over by unprofessional men. But whenever a Scribe—a skilled lawyer—was available the choice of the community naturally available, the choice of the community naturally was considered best fitted for the post.

3. Relations of the Scribes to Jesus.—The ministry of Jesus could not but excite interest amongst the Scribes. His first call, like that of the Baptist, was to repentance as a preparation for the Kingdom of God. With this they were bound to sympathize. They held that what the nation needed for its salvation was a stricter obedience to the Law, and they naturally thought that the new Teacher, who was calling to repentance for the past, would be calling also to a new and more rigid obedience for the future. There are not wanting indications that at first they were authorities. Jesus followed a different plan. He had a message of His own, which He delivered with conviction and enthusiasm, not appealing to authorities, but speaking with the conscious authority of truth. And the substance of Histoaching was also very different. He condemned the external, mechanical formalism which they encouraged, and declared that only the inward purity of the heart was of value in the sight of God. See, further, art. Phariskes, p. 356 f.

Later history.—Though it does not properly belong to our subject, it is interesting to note that after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the suthority of the Scribes increased in importance. Under much discouragement they undertook the difficult task of the reorganization of Judaism. Working on calmly and peacefully, they were able to avoid extremes, and were successful in keeping what was left of the nation faithful to the religion of their fathers, and in stimulating hope for the future. The ordinances of the Oral Law were at last written down, and to their careful preservation by the Scribes we are indebted for the Hebrew Scriptures we now possess.

Lavanavua. — The literature on the subject is very extensive. Every History of the Jews, every Life of Christ, every Commentary on the Gospels, deals to some extent with the Scribes. Schürer's HJP may be taken as a standard authorit; i Ewald, Kosnen, and Wellhausen are all important, so are Edersheim's LT and W. R. Smith's OTJC. SCRIPTURE.—The scope of this article does not permit the discussion in it of the employment of Scripture, or of the estimate put upon Scripture, by either our Lord or the Evangelists. It is strictly limited to the use of the term 'Scripture' in the NT, particularly in the Gospels: and to the immediate implications of that use.

1. The use of this term in the NT was an inheritance, not an invention. The idea of a canon of 'Sacred Scriptures' (and with the idea the thing) was handed down to Christianity from Judaism. The Jews possessed a body of writings, consisting of 'Law, Prophets, and (other) Scriptures (K*thābhīm),' though they were often called, for brevity's sake, merely 'the Law and the Prophets' or simply 'the Law.' These 'Sacred Scriptures,' or this 'Scripture' (2027) as it was frequently called, or these 'Books,' or simply this 'Book' (2027) they leveled were an originature of their levels were an originature. (1203), they looked upon as originating in Divine inspiration, and as therefore possessed everywhere of Divine authority. Whatever stood written in these Scriptures was a word of God, and was therefore referred to indifferently as something which 'Scripture says' (ארסי בימים אינה, or בימים בימים), or 'the All Merciful says' (אוסי בימים), or even simply 'He says' (יבוא אינה), or even simply that God is the Speaker in the Scriptural word being too fully understood to require explicit expression. Every precept or dogma was supposed to be grounded in Scriptural teaching, and possessed authority only as buttressed by a Scripture passage, introduced commonly by one or the other of the formulas 'for it is said' ("DOD") or 'as it is written' (cross or course, though, of course, a great variety of more or less frequently occurring formulas of adduction are found. Greek-speaking Jews naturally tended merely to reproduce in their new language the designations and forms of adduction of their sacred books current among their people. This process was no doubt facilitated by the existence among the Greeks of a pregnant legislative use of γράφω, γραφή, γράμμα, by which these terms were freighted with an implication of authority. But it is very easy to make too much of this. In derive a fuller and deeper meaning than the most pregnant classical usage could impart to them.

Josephus, and even more plainly in the LXX, the influence of the Greek usage may be traced; but in a writer like Philo, Jewish habits of thought appear to be absolutely determinative. The fact of importance is that there was nothing left for Christianity to invent here. It merely took over in their entirety the established usages of the Synagogue, and the NT evinces itself in this matter at least a thoroughly Jewish book. The several terms it employs are made use of, to be sure, with some sensitiveness to their inherent implications as Greek words, and the Greek legislative use of some of them gave them, no doubt, peculiar fitness for the service asked of them. But the application made of them by the NT writers had its roots set in Jewish thought, and from it they derive a fuller and deeper meaning than the most pregnant classical usage could impart to them.

2. To the NT writers, as to other Jews, the sacred books of what was now called by them 'the old covenant' (2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>), described according to their contents as 'the Law, the Prophets, and the Paslme' (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>), or more briefly as 'the Law and the Prophets' (Mt 7<sup>13</sup>, Lk 16<sup>14</sup>; cf. Ac 28<sup>23</sup>, Lk 16<sup>24</sup>;), or merely as 'the Law' (Jn 10<sup>24</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>21</sup>), or even, perhaps, 'the Prophets' (Mt 2<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> 26<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17 18<sup>23</sup> 24<sup>24</sup>, Ac 3<sup>24</sup> 13<sup>27</sup>, Ro 1<sup>2</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>), were, when thought of according to their nature, a body of 'ascred scriptures' (Ro 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>), or, with the omission of the unnecessary, because well-understood adjective, simply by way of eminence, 'the Scriptures,' 'Scripture.' For employment in this designation either of the substantives γραφή or γράμμα offered itself, although, of course, each brought with it its own suggestions arising from the implication of the form and the general usage of the word. The more usual of the two in this application, in Philo and Josephus, is γράμμα, or more exactly γράμματα; for, although it is sometimes so employed in the singular (but apparently only late, e.g. Callimachus, Epigr. xxiv. 4, and the Church Fathers, pussion), it is in the plural that this form more properly denotes that congeries of alphabetical signs which constitutes a book. In the NT, on the other hand, this form is rare. The complete phrase ispà γραμματα, found also both in Josephus and in Plulo, occurs in 2 Ti 3<sup>13</sup> as the current title of the sacred books, freighted with all its implications as such. Elsewhere in the NT, however, γραφή, in its varied uses, remains the sole form employed in the NT in the sense of 'Scripture,' 'Scriptures,'

3. Thus term occurs in the NT about fifty times (Gospels 23, Acts 7, Catholic Epistles 6, Paul 14); and in every case it bears that technical sense in which it designates the Scriptures by way of eminence, the Scriptures of the OT. It is true there are a few instances in which passages adduced as γραφή are not easily identified in the OT text; but there is no reason to doubt that OT passages were intended (cf. Hühn, Die alttest. Citate, 270; and Mayor on Ja 45, Lightfoot on 1 Co 25, Westcott on Jn 725, and Godet on Lk 1125). We need to note in modification of the broad statement, therefore, only that it is apparent from 2 P 316 (cf. 1 Ti 518) that the NT writers were well aware that the category 'Scripture,' in the high sense, included also the writings they were producing, as along with the books of the OT constituting the complete 'Scripture' or authoritative Word of God. In 20 out of the 50 instances in which γραφή occurs in the NT, it is the plural form which is used, and in all but two of these cases the article is present—al γραφαί, the well-known Scriptures of the Jewish people; and the two exceptions are exceptions only in appearance, since adjectival definitions are present (γραφαὶ ἀγιαι, Ro 1², here first in extant literature; γραφαὶ προφητικαὶ, Ro 16²²). The singular form occurs some 30 times, all but four of which have the article; and here again the exceptions are only apparent, the term being definite in every case (Jn 19²π 'another Scripture'; 1 P 2², 2 P 1²², 2 Ti 3¹², used as a proper name). The distribution of the singular and plural forms is perhaps worth noting. In Acts the singular (3 times) and plural (4) occur almost equally frequently: the plural prevails in the Synoptics (Mt. plural only; Mk. two to one; Lk. three to one), and the singular in the rest of the NT (John 11 to 1, James 3 to 0, Peter 2 to 1, Paul 2 to 5). In the Gospels the plural form occurs exclusively in Mt., prevailingly in Mk. and Lk., and rarely in Jn., of which the singular is characteristic. No distinction seems to be traceable between the usage of the Evangelists in their own persons and that of our Lord as reported by them. Mt. and Mk. do not on their own account use the term at all; in Lk. and Jn., on the other hand, it occurs not only in reports of our Lord's sayings and of the sayings of others, but also in the narrative itself. To our Lord is ascribed the use indifferently of the plural (Mt 21²² 22²² 26⁵¹ 26⁵ Mk 12²⁴ 14², Jn 5²² and the singular (Mk 12¹², Lk 4²n, Jn 7²² 4² 10² 13¹² 17¹²).

4 The history of γραφή, γραφαί, as applied to literary documents, does not seem to have been exactly the same as that of its concener γραφαί.

nexactly the same as that of its congener  $\gamma \rho d\mu \mu a$ ,  $\gamma \rho d\mu \mu a \tau a$ . The latter appears to have been current first as the appropriate appellation of an alphabetical character, and to have grown gradually upward from that lowly employment to designate documents of less or greater extent, as ultimately made up of alphabetical characters. Although, therefore, the singular  $\tau \delta$   $\gamma \rho \delta \mu \mu \mu a$  is used of any written thing, it is apparently, when applied to 'writings,' most naturally employed of brief pieces like short inscriptions or proverbs, or of the shorter portions of documents such as clauses—though it portions of documents such as clauses—though it is also used of those larger sections of works which are more commonly designated as 'books.' It is rather the plural, τὰ γράμματα, which seems to have suggested itself not only for extended treatises, but indeed for documents of all kinds. When so employed, the plural form is not to be pressed. Such a phrase as 'Moses' γράμματα' (Jn 5"), for example, probably ascribes to Moses only a single book—what we call the Pentateuch; and such a phrase as leρά γράμματα (2 Ti 3") does not suggest to us a 'Divine library,' but brings the OT before us as a unitary whole. On the other hand, γραφή, in its application to literary products, seems to have sprung lightly across the intermediate seems to have sprung lightly across the intermediate steps to designate which γράμμα is most appropriately used, and to have been carried over at once from the 'writing' in the sense of the script to the 'writing' in the sense of the Scripture. Kindred with γράμμα as it is, its true synonymy in its literary application is rather with such words as βίβλος (βίβλίου) and λόγος, in common with which it most naturally designates a complete literary piece, whether 'treatise' or 'book.' Where thought of from the material point of view as so much paper, so to speak, a literary work was apt to be called a  $\beta i\beta \lambda i\sigma$ ; when thought of as a rational product, thought presented in words, it was apt to be spoken of as a λόγος: intermediate was apt to be spoken of as a  $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ : intermediate between the two stood  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\dot{\eta}$  ( $\gamma\rho\delta\mu\mu\alpha$ ), which was apt to come to the lips when the 'web of words' itself was in mind. In a word,  $\betal\beta\lambda\sigma$ s ( $\betal\beta\lambda\sigma$ s) was the most exact word for the 'book,'  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\dot{\eta}$  ( $\gamma\gamma\delta\mu\mu\alpha$ ) for the 'document' inscribed in the 'book,'  $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s for the 'treatise' which the 'document' records; while as between  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\dot{\eta}$  and  $\gamma\rho\delta\mu\mu\alpha$ ,  $\gamma\rho\delta\mu\mu\alpha$ , preserving the stronger material flavour, gravitates somewhat towards  $\beta i\beta \lambda os$  ( $\beta i\beta \lambda lov$ ), and  $\gamma \rho a\phi \dot{\eta}$  looks upward somewhat toward  $\lambda \dot{\sigma} \gamma os$ . When, in the development of the publisher's trade, the system of making books in great rolls gave way to the 'small-roll system,' and long works came to be broken up into 'books,' each of which was inscribed in a 'volume,' these separate 'books' attached to themselves this whole series of designations, each with its appropriate implication. Smaller sections were properly called  $\pi \epsilon \mu o \chi \alpha l$ ,  $\gamma \dot{\sigma} \sigma \alpha l$ ,  $\chi \omega \rho l a$ ,  $\gamma \dot{\rho} \alpha \mu \mu a \tau a$  (the last of which is the proper term for 'clauses'), but very seldom, if ever, in classical Greek,  $\gamma \rho a \phi a l$ .

5. The current senses of these several terms are, of course, more or less reflected in their NT use. But we are struck at once with the fact that γραφή occurs in the NT solely in its pregnant technical usage as a designation of the Sacred Scriptures. There seems no intrinsic reason why it should not, like γράμματα, be freely used for non-sacred 'writings. In point of fact, however, throughout the NT  $\gamma \rho a \phi \dot{\eta}$  is ever something 'which the Holy Ghost has spoken through the mouth' of its human authors (Ac 13), and which is therefore of indefectively. ible, because Divine, authority. It is perhaps even more remarkable that even on this high plane of technical reference it never occurs, in accordance with its most natural, and in the classics its most frequent, sense of 'treatise,' as a term to describe the several books of which the OT is composed. It is tempting, no doubt, to seek to give it such a It is tempting, no doubt, to seek to give it such a sense in some of the passages where, occurring in the singular, it yet does not seem to designate the Scriptures in their entirety, and Dr. Hort appears for a moment almost inclined to yield to the temptation (on 1 P  $2^6$ , note the 'probable'). It is more tempting still to assume that behind the common use of the plural at  $\gamma \rho a \phi a t$  to designate the Scriptures as a whole, there lies a previous current usage by which each book which enters into the composition of these 'Scriptures' was designated by the singular  $h \gamma \rho a c \phi d t$ . But in no single passage by the singular  $\dot{\eta} \gamma \rho a \phi \dot{\eta}$ . But in no single passage where  $\dot{\eta} \gamma \rho a \phi \dot{\eta}$  occurs does it seem possible to give it a reference to the 'treatise' to which the appeal is made; and the common employment in profane Greek of ypapal (in the plural) for a single document, discourages the assumption that (like  $\tau \dot{a}$   $\beta \iota \beta \lambda l a$ ) when applied to the Scriptures it has referto be their composite character. The truth seems to be that whether the plural at  $\gamma \rho a \phi a t$  or the singular  $\dot{\eta} \gamma \rho a \phi \dot{\eta}$  is employed, the application of the term to the OT writings by the writers of the NT is based upon the conception of these OT writings as a unitary whole, and designates this body of writings in their entirety as the one wellknown authoritative documentation of the Divine word. This is the fundamental fact with respect to the use of these terms in the NT from which all the other facts of their usage flow.

6. It is true that in one unique passage, 2 P 3<sup>16</sup> (on the meaning of which see Bigg, in loc.), at γραφαί does occur with a plural signification. But the units of which this plural is made up, as the grammatical construction suggests, appear to be not 'treatises' (Huther, Kühl), but 'passages' (de Wette). Peter seems to say that the unlearned and unstable of course wrested the hard sayings of Paul's letters as they were accustomed to wrest rás λοατάς γραφάς, i.e. the other Scripture statements (cf. Eurip. Hipp. 1311; Philo, de Præm. et Pæn. § 11 near end)—the implication being that no part of Scripture was safe in their hands. This is a sufficiently remarkable use of the plural, no other example of which occurs in the NT; but it is an entirely legitimate one for the NT, and in its context a perfectly natural one. In the Church Fathers the plural ai γραφαί is formed freely upon η γραφή both in the sense of 'book' of Scripture and in the sense of 'passage' of Scripture. But in the NT, apart from the present passage, there is in no instance of the use of al γραφαί the slightest hint of a series whether of 'treatises' or of 'passhint of a series whether of 'treatises' or of 'passages' underlying it. Even a passage like Lk  $24^{27}$  forms no exception; for if  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha$  is employed in a singular sense of a single document, then  $\pi\hat{\alpha}\sigma\alpha$  at  $\gamma\alpha\alpha\phi\alpha$  remains the whole of the whole  $\alpha$ γραφαί remains just the whole of that document, and is the exact equivalent of πασα ή γραφή, or (if παια is the exact entracted to make η γραφή has acquired standing as a quasi-proper name) as πάσα γραφή (2 Ti 316). Similarly al γραφαl τῶν προφητῶν (Mt 2666), γραφαl προφητικαί (Ro 1626) appear to refer not to particular passages deemed prophetic, or to the special section of the OT called 'the Prophets,' but to the entire OT conceived as prophetic in character (cf. 2 P 120, Ac 220, 2 P 316).

7. In 2 P 31s, however, we have already been brought face to face with what is probably the most remarkable fact about the usage of γραφή in the NT. This is its occasional employment to refer not merely, as from its form and previous history was to be expected, to the Scripture as a whole, or even, as also would have been only a continuation of its profane usage, to the several treatises which make up that whole, but to the individual passages of Scripture. This employment finds little support from the classics, in which γράμμα rather than γραφή is the current form for the adduction of 'clauses' or fragmentary portions of documents (cf. e.g. Plato, Parmen. 128 A-D, Ep. 3 [317 B]; Thucyd. v. 29; Philo, de Congr. Erud. Grat. 12, Quod Deus immut. 2). It has been customated the control of the control o tomary, accordingly, to represent it as a peculiarity of NT and Patristic Greek. It seems to be found, however, though rarely, in Philo (Quis rerum div. hær. 53, de Præm. et Pæn. 11; cf. Euripides, Hipp. 1311), and is probably an extreme outgrowth of the habit of looking upon the Scriptures as a unitary book of Divine oracles, every portion and passage of which is clothedwith the Divine authority which belongs to the whole and is therefore maniwhich belongs to the whole and is therefore manifested in all its parts. When the entirety of Scripture is 'Scripture' to us, each passage may readily be adduced as 'Scripture,' because 'Scripture,' ture' is conceived as speaking through and in each ture' is conceived as speaking through and in each passage. The transition is easy from saying, 'The Scripture says, namely, in this or that passage,' to saying, of this and that passage, severally, 'This Scripture says,' and 'Another Scripture says'; and a step so inviting was sure sooner or later to be taken. The employment of  $\dot{\eta} \gamma \rho a \phi \dot{\eta}$  in the NT to denote a particular passage of Scripture does not appear then to be a continuation of a classical passage but a new development on Jewish or usage, but a new development on Jewish or Judgeo-Christian ground from the pregnant use of γραφή for the Sacred Scriptures, every clause of which is conceived as clothed with the authority which is conceived as clothed with the authority of the whole. So far from throwing in doubt the usage of  $\gamma\rho a\phi \dot{\eta}$  pregnantly of Scripture as a whole, therefore, it rather presupposes this usage and is a result of it. So it will not surprise us to find the two usages standing side by side in the NT.

8. It has indeed been called in question whether both these usages do stand side by side in the NT. Possibly a desire to find some well-marked distinction between the usage of the plural and singular forms has not been without influence here. At all events, it has every now and then been suggested that the singular  $\dot{\eta}$   $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\dot{\eta}$  bears in the NT the uniform sense of 'passage of Scripture,' while it is the plural al  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi al$  alone which in the NT designates Scripture as a whole. The younger Schulthess, for example (Lucubr. pro divin. discip. ac pers. Jesu, 1828, p. 36 n.), having occasion to comment briefly on the words πάσα γραφή θεόπνευστος of 2 Ti 316, among other assertions of equal dubiety makes this one: 'γραφή in the singular never means  $\beta i\beta \lambda os$  in the NT, much less the entirety of τῶν ἰερῶν γραμμάτων, but some particular passage. Hitherto it has been thought enough to meet such assertions with a mere expression of dissent: Christiaan Sepp, for example (De Leer des NT over de HS des OV, 1849, p. 69), meets this one with equal brevity and point by the simple statement: 'Passages like Jn 10<sup>35</sup> prove the contrary.' Of late, however, under the influence of a trary.' Of late, however, under the influence of a comment of Bishop Lightfoot's on Gal 3<sup>22</sup> which has become famous, Schulthess' doctrine has become almost traditional in a justly influential school of British exegesis (cf. Westcott on Jn 2<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>35</sup>; Hort on 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>; Swete on Mk 12<sup>10</sup>; Page on Ac 1<sup>10</sup>; Knowling on Ac 8<sup>32</sup>; Plummer on Lk 4<sup>21</sup>). The attempt to carry this doctrine through, however, appears to involve a violence of exegesis which breaks down of itself. Of the 30 instances in which the singular condet occurs about a score in which the singular  $\gamma \rho a \phi \eta$  occurs, about a score seem intractable to the proposed interpretation (Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>26</sup> 17<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>, Ac 8<sup>32</sup>, Ro 4<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>, Gal 3<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>3</sup> 4<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>, Ja 4<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>20</sup> [cf Cremer, sub voc., who omits Jn 17<sup>12</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>; E. Hühn, Cremer, sub voc., who omits Jn 17<sup>12</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>; E. Hühn, Die alttest. Citate, etc., 1900, p. 276, who adds Jn 13<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>24.36</sup>, Ja 2<sup>8</sup>; and Vaughan on Ro 4<sup>3</sup>, Meyer on Jn 10<sup>36</sup>, Weiss on Jn 10<sup>35</sup>, Kübel on 2 P 1<sup>19</sup>, Abbott on Eph 4<sup>8</sup>, Beet on Ro 9<sup>17</sup>, Mayor on 2 P 3<sup>16</sup>; EBi 4329; Franke, Das AT bei Johannes, 48; E. Haupt, Die alttest. Citate in den vier Evang. 201]). In some of these passages it would seem quite impossible to refer γραφή to a particular passage of Scripture. No particular passage is suggested, for example, in Jn 2<sup>22</sup> or in Gal 3<sup>22</sup>, and it is sought and conjecturally supplied Gal 322, and it is sought and conjecturally supplied by the commentators only under the pressure of the theory. The reference of Jn 20° is quite as broad as that of Lk 24.6. In Jn 10.35 the argument depends on the wide reference to Scripture as a whole, which forms its major premise. The personification of Scripture in such passages as Ja 4<sup>5</sup> and Gal 3<sup>8</sup> carries with it the same implication. And the anarthrous use of  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\eta$  in 1 P 26, 2 P 120, 2 Ti 316, is explicable only on the presupposition that  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\eta$  had acquired the value of a proper name. Perhaps the two passages, 1 P 26 and 2 P 120, are fairly adapted to stand as the tests of the possibility of carrying through the reference of γραφή in the singular to particular passages: and the artificial explanations which are given of these passages by the advocates of that theory (cf. Zahn, Einleitung, etc., ii. 108; Hort on 1 P 26 may stand for its sufficient refutation. There seems no reason why we should fail to recognize that the employment of  $\gamma \rho a \rho \eta$  in the NT so far follows its profane usage, in which it is prevailingly applied to entire documents and carries with it a general implication of completeness, that in its more common re-ference it designates the OT to which it is applied in its completeness as a unitary whole (cf. Franke, on its completeness as a unitary whole (cf. Franke, op. cit. p. 48). It remains only to add that the same implication is present in the designation of the OT as al  $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\alpha l$ , which, as has already been pointed out, does not suggest that the OT is a collection of 'treatises,' but is merely a variant of  $\dot{\eta}$   $\gamma\rho\alpha\phi\eta$  in accordance with good Greek usage, employed interchangeably with it at the dictation of nothing more recondite than literary habit. Whether al  $\gamma \rho a \phi a l$  is used, then, or  $\eta \gamma \rho a \phi \eta$ , or the anarthrous  $\gamma \rho a \phi \eta$ , in each case alike the OT is thought of as a single document set over against all other documents by reason of its unique Divinity and indefectible authority, by which it is constituted in every passage and declaration the final arbiter of belief and practice.

9. It is an outgrowth of this conception of the OT that it is habitually adduced for the ordinary purposes of instruction or debate by such simple formulas as 'it is said,' 'it is written,' with the implication that what is thus said or written is of Divine and final authority. Both of these usages are illustrated in a variety of forms, and with all possible high implications, not only in the NT at large, but also in the Gospels,—and not only in the comments of the Evangelists, but also in the reported sayings of our Lord. We are concerned here only with the formula, 'It is written,' in which the consciousness of the written form—the documentary character—of the authority appealed documentary character—of the authority appealed to finds expression. In its most common form, this formula is the simple \( \gamma \gamma \rho \text{pros} \gamma \rho \), used either absolutely, or, with none of its authoritative implication thereby evacuated, with more or less clear intimation of the place where the cited words are to be found written. By its side occurs also the resolved formula \( \gamma \gamma \gamma \text{pros} \quad \text{pros} \) derive (peculiar to Jn.; cf. Plummer on l.k 412), or some similar formula, with the same implications. These modes of expression have analogies in profane Greek. of expression have analogies in profane Greek especially in legislative usages; but their use with reference to the Divine Scriptures, as it involves the adduction of an authority which rises im-measurably above all legislative authority, is also freighted with a significance to which the profane usage affords no key. In the Gospels, γγγρατια occurs exclusively in Mt. and Mk., and predominately in Lk., but only once in Jn.; most commonly in reports of our Lord's sayings. In the latter part of Lk., on the other hand, the authoritative citation of the OT is accomplished by the use of the participle γεγραμμένον, while in Jn. the place of γέγρανται (817 only) is definitely taken by the reγέγραπται (817 only) is definitely taken by the resolved formula γεγραμμένο έστω. The significance of these formulas is perhaps most manifest where they stand alone as the bare adduction of authority without indication of any kind whence the citation is derived (so γέγραπται, Mt 44.8.7.18 [1110] 2111 [2638] 2614 Mk 76 912 13 1117 147. Σ. I.k 44.8.16 771 1948 2017 2237 ; γεγραμμένου εντίν, Jn 217 631 1214 [49]. The adjunction of an indication of the place where the citation may be found does not, however, really affect the authoritativeness of its adduction. This affect the authoritativeness of its adduction. This adjunction is rare in Mt. and Mk. (Mt 2°, Mk 1° only), more frequent in Lk. (2° 3° 10° 18° 124° °) and Jn. (6° 3° 10° 1° 10° 13° 1); and by its infrequency it emphasizes the absence of all necessity for such identification. When a NT writer says, 'It is written,' there can arise no doubt where what he thus adduces as possessing absolute authority over the thought and consciences of men is to be found written. The simple adduction in this solemn and decides manner of a written authority, carries with it the implication that the appeal is made to the indefectible authority Affect the authoritativeness of its adduction that the appeal is made to the indefectible authority of the Scriptures of God, which in all their parts and in every one of their declarations are clothed with the authority of God Himself.

SEA OF GALILEE,-i. NAMES.-The OT name Chimereth had disappeared, so far as our purpose is concerned, by the time of the Maccabees, and in its place we find a variety of designations. It is then that the familiar name Gennesaret first makes its appearance in the τὸ όδωρ Γεννησάρ of 1 Mac 11<sup>eq</sup>. 11s appearance in the το comp l'envirage of l'anacti. Josephius uses the forms λίμες l'envirage (BJ 111. x. 1), δατα l'envirage (Ant. XIII. v. 7), λίμες l'envirage (Ant. XIII. v. 7), λίμες l'envirage (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1; l'ita, 65); Pliny has Gennesura (HN v. 15). In the Targums and other Jewish writings the name of the Sea appears as up or upu, these forms supplementing the Heb. Chinacreth. But though the worl Gennesuret was so familiar to contemporary writers, it appears so familiar to contemporary writers, it appears only once in the NT as applied to the Lake, in the ή λίμνη Γενησαρέτ of Lk 5<sup>1</sup>. Following close upon this, however, ή λίμνη ουσικα alone in Lk 5<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>23–28</sup>. The most popular name in the NT is 'the Sea of Galilee' (ή θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας), which occurs live times (Mt 4<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>28</sup>, Mk 1<sup>16</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>, Ju 6<sup>1</sup>). The word 'Sea '(θάλασσα) stands alone in Ju 6<sup>12</sup>. The word 'Sea of Tiberias' (θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεράδοι) occurs in John 6<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>. The modern designation 'Li kha of Tiberias' does not seem designation, 'Lake of Tiberias,' does not occur in the NT. It is found for the first time as λίμεψ Tiffeple in Pausanias (v. 7).

Many explanations have been offered of the origin of the word Genneaurel. Lightfoot (and others) sought to derive it from the UT Chianervih, which it was supposed to replace. Such an origin, however, seems very improbable, not only on philological grounds, but because the latter name also remains emply transitierated in the LXX as $\tau_{inis}$, and was thus quite familiar to the Hallenistic world. Ritter(freeg. of Pal.) suggests that it is derived from "3"% [] or "$\text{P}$ [] "garlen of treasure," which term, of course, he refers to the Plain, deriving thence the name of the adjoining Bea. This process is quite natural, and probably correct, but still we may be permitted to doubt his derivation of the name. G. A. Smith (HGHL 443 n.) has also noted that the form points to some compound of [] "garlen," or "I vallen", and to us this seems indisputable, so that on the or 'I valle) , and to us this seems indisputable, so that on the whole we must admit that either the explanation given by Caspari († 64), "0" '33 ('gardens of the [lake) basin ), or that of the older Rabbin (Ber Rab 98), "b" '22 ("gardens of the prince"), is most satisfactory. The termination in Genesarri might then be regarded as the Aramaic determinative form, and compared with Nauserth from Namera.

With reference to the name 'Galilee,' it has with reference to the name "Califee," it has been said that it originally designated only that small tract of land given by Solomon to Hiram (1 K 9"), and that the name gradually extended till in the days of the Maccabees it included Zebulun and Naphtali, so that only after this took place could the Sea be known by that name. Furrer (Wanderungen) has also drawn attention to the other names. He asserts that Genneser or Gennesaritiz is characteristic of the 1st cent., being found in Josephus, Pliny, and Strabo, while from the 2nd cent. onwards the official designation be-came 'Sea of Tiberias'; and as proof of this statement he cites the Palestinian Talmud. He then ventures to infer that Jn 211 indicates a later date than the rest of the book demands, and at the same time he suggests that Jn 61 has been emended. This reasoning, however, seems inconclusive; for, apart from the fact that the Palestinian Talmud contains much that is old, it seems impossible, in view of the conservatism of the Rabbis, that such a name as 'Sea of Tiberias' should be found in their writings, unless it had been in common use for a considerable time. For the history of the district surrounding the Lake see art. CALILEE.

ii. DESCRIPTION -The Lake presents 'a beautiful sheet of limpid water in a deeply depressed basin' (BRP 1 ii. 380), its average below sea level being 682½ ft.; but with the season of the year the level may vary to the extent of 10 ft. The rise and fall are dependent on the rainy season on the one hand, and, on the other, on the melting of the mows on Hermon as the spring advances; and it is this latter cause that generally, in conjunction with the later rains, brings about the high level at the time of harvest (Jos 315). But as the heavier rains decrease before the melting of the snow begins, there may have been already a fall of as much as 3 ft. even in March. The Sea is 13 miles long by 7 across at its broadest part— between Mejdel and Kersa; but in the clear Eastern atmosphere it looks much smaller than it really is. From no point on the western shore can it be seen in its whole extent at one time; but from the slopes above Tell Hum, or from almost any point on the eastern shore, it is all visible. It is not quite oval, but rather pear- or harp-shaped (http.), narrowing to the southern end. The sea level and the configuration of the shores have not changed to any considerable extent during the past nineteen centuries, so that, in so far as hills and valleys, ravines and slopes to the seashore are and valleys, ravines and slopes to the seasnore are concerned, their present description gives a very true conception of what they were in Gospel days. On the west the hills are not so high and generally not so steep as on the eastern side; but they approach more closely to the shore, and are more rugged and stony. On the western side, from a short distance above what was once the western outlet of the Lake into the Jordan, and stretching some 3 miles up the Lake-side, the hills—here somewhat rounded and tame, and with but little that is picturesque in their form—slope down to the water's edge. Then to the north of this comes a strip (Heb. npn, which seems to justify the identification of Tiberias with the older Rakkath, Jos 19<sup>25</sup>; Megilla, 5b, 6a; G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 447) about 2½ miles long and ½ of a mile broad at its widest part, and at the north end of this is the modern town of Tiberias. Passing it, we have another 3 miles of sloping hills, broken about midway by the Wady Abu el-Amis. At Mejdel we now enter el-Ghuweir, the well-known Plain of Gennesaret. Behind the village to the west is Wady Ḥamām, known in the early centuries as אַרְאָרָה, and containing in its cliffs the once famous caves of Arbela (Ant. XIV. xv. 4). This is certainly the wildest and most impressive gorge around the whole Lake. On its south side it bears some resemblance, though on a far grander scale, to the crags around Arthur's Seat. There is the same perpendicular wall, but here it rises in places to a height of 1500 ft.; and there is also the same mass of broken rocks, making a steep slope to the plain below.

El-Ghuveir curves along the Lake from Mejdel to Khan Minyeh, a distance of 3 miles, and it has a breadth of one mile. In addition to the stream from Wady Hamam, it is watered by three others from Ain Mudauwarah, Wady Rabadiyeh, and Wady Leimon, and these flow throughout the year. Just behind Khan Minyeh and its fountain Ain et-Tin at the N.W. corner of the Lake, the rounded hill Tell Oreime slopes down to the water's edge, ending in a series of sharp rocks—the only place around the Lake where we find anything like a cliff beside the shore. Around the face of Tell Oreime there is a deep rock-cutting now used as a pathway, but in ancient times an aqueduct, as is attested by the discovery of the remains of the old piers of its continuation across the next valley to Ain et-Tabigha. Remains of masonry show that the water was led eastward as well as westward from the towers built around the springs of et-Tabigha (Επτάπηγον of Nicephorus), so that there can be little doubt that this is the spring of Capernaum mentioned by Josephus (BJ III. x. 8). From this point onward to the Jordan the hills again extend down to the shore, but by gentler slopes than even to the south of Tiberias. Between ef-Tabigha and Tell Hum the shore forms a number of semicircular creeks, which, with the sloping embankment at this point, assume the shape of amphitheatres. Studying the subject on the spot, the present author was convinced that one of these must be the place where the sermon from the boat was preached (Mt 13<sup>2</sup> etc.). Something peculiar in the tones of our voices induced we found that a speaker on the boat could be heard far up the slope, while the hum and bustle of a crowd on the shore would not disturb him.

After crossing the Jordan we meet with another plain-el-Batiha-corresponding to the one on the west, but somewhat more extensive. It is covered with green grass (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>, Jn 6<sup>10</sup>) at nearly all seasons of the year. With a breadth of 1 to 1½ miles, it extends 3 miles along the coast, and then narrows, extends 5 miles atong the coast, and then narrows, extending nearly 3 miles more to Kersa, a short distance to the south of which we meet with the only steep place (Mt 8<sup>22</sup>) on the eastern side of the Lake. At this point there is practically no shore, but immediately the eastern rampart of hills—2000 ft. high, now bleak and bare, but showing streaks of green where the springs trickle out between the white sandstone and the black superimposed lava—begins to recede, leaving a plain 1 to 1 mile broad, and this to the south of Kul at el-Husn widens out into the Ghor or Jordan Valley. At the village of Semakh, the southern end of the Lake forms a beautiful circular bay, which is enclosed by earth walls 16 to 32 ft. in height. There is deep water close in to the shore, and the currents manifestly wear away the rich alluvial soil. In so far as physical changes have taken place, we should expect that the land has suffered losses here, while there may have been slight gains by deposits on the shore of the plains of el-Bațiha and el-Ghuweir (Gennesaret). What used to be the western outlet of the Jordan has also become silted up, for it must be remembered that in former times the Jordan flowed out from the two sides of a triangular island, now occupied by the ruins of Kerak—without doubt the remains of the once famous Taricheæ  $(BJ \, III. \, x. \, 1)$ .

Compared with other lakes, the Sea of Galilee cannot be said to be deep. The maximum depth is from north to south along the course of the Jordan, and here it is 130 to 148 ft. according to the season [greater recorded depths have been proved to be in error], and except along the shores of the Plain of Gennesaret, deep water is reached all round the Lake within a few yards of the shore. The steep place at Kersa slopes down at once to a depth of 49 ft., and a short distance farther out the sounding gives 102 ft. A mile to the southeast of Tell Hum the depth is 78 ft., and midway between Tiberia and Kersa it is 114.

between Tiberias and Kersa it is 114.

One more notable feature of the Lake valley is to be found in the hot springs with which it abounds. The best known of these are at Hamabounds. The best known of these are at Hammam (cf. Jos. Vita, 16), south of Tiberias (132° to 144°), 'Ain Barideh (80°), 'Ain Mudawarah (73°), 'Ain et-Tin (82°), and 'Ain et-Tabigha (73° to 86°). Others certainly exist in the Lake itself. A children was be perceived at different places, Others certainly exist in the lake user. A brackish taste can be perceived at different places, and especially at a point \{\frac{3}{3}} across between Tiberias and Kersa, where in the warmer water great shoals of fish are wont to congregate. It was probably the drinking from a spot of this kind that led Strabo (Geog. xvi. 45) to express so bad an opinion of the waters of the Lake (δδωρ μοχθηρόν hupraco). These springs are all more or less sulphurous, and in all the centuries they have been used for medicinal purposes—especially those at Tiberias (BJ II. xxi. 6). A reference to these in the Talmud shows us the relationship of the Rabbis to the Sabbath, and throws some light on their attacks on Jesus (Lk 1314 etc.). The use of the means of bealing was forbidden on the Sabbath, but these baths, though medicinal, were permitted, because in addition they ministered to indulgence in pleasure and luxury, and that was permitted. (Peach. 85).

Complaint has been made by some of the tame ness of the scenery around the Lake, and of the want of picturesqueness of the hills, while, on the other hand, Seetzen (Resea, in loc) has declared that 'in the whole land of Palestine there is no district whose natural charms could compare with those of There can be no doubt that much depends upon the season of the year when the district is first visited, as well as upon the expectations formed. In the present unwooded state, with its uncultivated fields and barren hills often, as at the north end of the Lake, washed down to the bare rock by the rains of centuries, there may be little to attract, especially when the whole country has been blackened by the summer suns and the burning surocces. But even now the earliest rains change the whole aspect of nature. The hills and the valleys on both shores become clothed in a luxuriant greenness, while, as the season advances, the fresh bursting buds of the olive, the fig, the vine, and the pomegranate, with here and there a palm tree, add variety and pleasantness to the landscape. Very soon, too, the fields are covered with great patches of anemones of varied colours—white, red, purple, and deep dark-blue, interspersed with various species of the lily family and stretches of the dark green leaved and yellow flowered mustard, while the watercourses and shores of the Lake are marked out by the red blooms of the cleander with its dark green and silvery-backed leaves; and on the western shore variety is added by the grantic reeds of the papyrus, topped by their reddish-brown waving plumes; on the higher grounds, too, every crevice of the rock is shaded by the blossoms of the cyclamen and many another flower of the field. But men and many another flower of the field. what must it have been in the year A.D. 27-28 ! It had been passing through, was indeed still in the period of transition after, the desolations of war, famine, and pestilence; but the worst was now long past, and 20 years of uninterrupted peace and prosperity had made it blossom like the rose There was nothing in the rule of the tetrarchs Antipas and Philip to discourage perseverance, so that the land was coming more and more under cultivation. It must have been beautiful, indeed, when human industry was developing all its resources and changing the whole scene into a blooming paradise. Nothing can give a letter idea of what the whole district was becoming, than the classic passage in which Josephus (BJ III x 8) describes the Plain of Gennessret in his own day (see art. GENNESARET [LAND OF] in vol. i.).

(see art. GENNESARET [LAND OF] in vol. i.).

With Jumphins' glowing description the Rabbis are in fallest harmons. Rish Lapukh was "It Paradise be in the land of larsel, Beth Shan is its entrained (SEP) [METC). Again we read "Neven seas," spake the Leri God, "have I created in the land of larsel but only one has I chosen for mixelf that is the sea of Gennesar (Midr. Trh. fol. 4). Suphr on in 1250-explains the fulness of the blessing of the Lord as the Plain of Sen nemark. On the fills around the Lake were "direct some and fruitful fields (Mer. to). "It is essuer," as the Rabbi Elezer bein Simon, "to no arish a legion of object in tables than to bring up muchild in the land of Israe," (Mer. Rabbi Elezer bein Simon, "to no arish a legion of object in tables than to bring up michild in the land of Israe," (Mer. Rabbi Elezer Trh. Simon, 250), and the wheat of Chorami is specially commended (the field). An illustration of the products of a single PNDM "MC "half bushel of Arbela" (Jerus, Pedh, vii. 3). The Gertile world also helds to tentimony. To the early rathers the district was as aparture of Labias et, "the rown of tables, while in the Set viii (** Labias Kulmus (Collectanea, xxxx, L.) was "Lacias Tabaria in cent thus anteponitur ingenuo sestu et all annitation user efficaci."

But the district was not yet reduced to the calm beauty of a prosperous agricultural country. There would still be stretches of woodland remaining, tananted by birds of brilliant colonrs and various forms. There would be here and there heautiful cakes, either singly or in groups, that had grown up during the years when the population was small (Baba Bathra v. 1). There would be rocky stretches, especially to the north-east of the Lake, covered with brambles, wild mustard, and coarse grass, or dotted with pickly bushes (nubl.), where the wolf, the jackal, the fox, and the hyana would make their homes, and where the brown serpent and the silvery-breasted poisonous snake would glide about.

The population would not be so dense nor the land so fully cultivated as in the days when Josephus wrote, so that there would be a more equal mingling of the wild beauties of nature with the advancing and taming conquests of agriculture. The landscape, too, was becoming varied by the presence of many buildings. It has been said that the shores of the Lake seem to have borne cities and towns instead of harvests' (Trustram, Land of Israel, 444); and this, understood in the light of what we have already said, is very true. These would for the most part be constructed of black stone, but varied at times by buildings of white marble, while even the polished granite of Syene helped to break the monotony; and although, on the whole, the majority of the buildings would be dull and sombre, still, in the midst of waving fields of green and gold, the presence of the humble village, and the beach sparkling with the houses and the palaces, the synagogues and the temples of Jewish and Roman inhabitants, would present a scene of great beauty, so that we can well understand how the wild desolations of the pre-Christian century, and the calm and peaceful years that followed the advent of the Mesoah, combined to render the district more beautiful when Christ was a citizen of Capernaum than at any other time during its whole history.

iii. CLIMATE.—The climate of the Jordan Valley is in many ways very peculiar. Its low level—the lowest depression in the world—gives it many characteristics which are all its own. The absence of all frost, and the general warmth throughout the whole year, explain to us fully the peculiar open-air life that we meet with in the Gospels. For the most part Christ speaks out of doors So did the Rabbis of His time. Ben Azzar taught on the shores of Tiberias (Erubin, 29a), and Rabbi Jehudah in the open au (Moed Knton, 10a). In the Gospels the sick are freely carried about (Mt 4<sup>20</sup>, Mk 2<sup>3</sup>), are allowed to wait in the crowd (Lk 8<sup>20</sup>), and the people are indifferent if the night find them away from home (Mt 1521, Mk 82. 1). The average temperatures of the air (night and day) in January are 37 and 74 respectively, while in June they are 68 and 108; but in July the thermometer frequently rises many degrees higher. The present writer has seen it at 106° at 6 a.m., and 130° has been recorded on the shore of the Lake at midday in August; and even the soil, the rocks, and the publics around the Lake side be come so intensely heated that the bather must wait till long after sunset if he would enter the water without the risk of burning his feet. In such conditions, under the fiery glow of the sun and with months of drought, we can well under stand that all the grass and berbage are burned up, and so in its present state of naked drearness, visitors at such a season are naturally disappointed, but in other circumstances, and many of universal irrigation, the whole so he would be very different tof Robinson's Researches under 19th Junes. Another noteworthy point is that the ten perature of the body may rise much higher in cases of fever, and without serious results, than would be possible in other climates, e.g. a temperature of 110° is not uncommonly recorded. This may explain the expression 'great fever' (πυρετώ $\mu\epsilon\gamma(\lambda\omega)$  of Lk 438.

The temperature of the waters of the Lake does The temperature of the waters of the Lake does not vary so much as might be expected, and is very little lowered even by the melting of the snows on Hermon. This is to be accounted for by the fact that such waters have already passed through Lake Huleh and have also had a considerable course in the upper Jordan. The average to a depth of 30 ft. is 68°, from 30 to 50 ft. it is 62°, and at a greater depth there is a constant temperature of 59° (PEFQSt, 1894, pp. 211-220).

Rain.—The average number of rainy days during the year is 60, and the rainfall 22.5 inches. There is no rain during the months of June, July, August, and September. Two-thirds of the rainfall occurs in December, January, and February; the other in December, January, and February; the other months having only one to five days on which rain falls, which may mean either now and again, a whole day, or merely slight showers. The degree of humidity is greatest in January, when it stands at 77. It decreases till June, when it is 42; but in August, again, it has risen to 45; while in September it drops as low as 39.

Winds.—From May till October there are often

sirocco days. They generally come 3, 7, or 10 at a time, though sometimes the hot wind lasts but one day, and then the day following brings a delightful sensation of coolness, enjoyment, and satisfaction. On the sirocco days the heat on the Lake and in the surrounding region is intensely depressing, but between the visits of the hot wind, westerly breezes blow in summer, and this makes the east side of the Lake pleasant. The western shore, however, south of Mejdel benefits little, as the winds pass over the protecting hills and strike the Sea far out, leaving the air inshore close and stifling. The north end of the Lake does not suffer to the same extent, because to the west of the Plain of Gennesaret the hills are somewhat lower and farther back, and, besides, the wind blows freely down the Valley of Pigeons, and gives the district around Capernaum all that the east side enjoys at such seasons. These westerly winds usually spring up in the afternoon, they become strong as the evening advances, but generally cease about 10 p.m. During the rest of the year the weather is more variable, and the winds blow from different directions. Strong winds sometimes come from the north-east, and when they diverge to the north and come over Hermon the temperature is still more reduced, and a sensation of chill is felt in the atmosphere. This sometimes occurs till well on in May; while, on the other hand, a hot south wind will sometimes blow up the Ghor (Jordan Valley) in April, bringing with it clouds of dust which dim the sunlight and darken the hills, giving one a premature sensation of the summer's glow.

Storms.—The rainy season is generally intro-duced by thunderstorms. In October and November, small clouds, scarcely larger than a man's hand, gather on Tabor, Jebel Jarmuk, and the other hills of Upper Galilee. They grow in size and in threatening aspect, and generally in three days' time a violent thunderstorm with heavy rains bursts over the valley. This is then usually followed by a time of calm with a clear blue sky overhead. Such storms, but not generally so violent, occur from time to time during the winter, and the rainy season may be closed by something of the same nature. In the beginning of May the sky will be clouded, and there will be one or two sky will be clouded, and there will be one or two days' rain with or without thunder. Sometimes, however, when the valley has been enjoying the most peaceful calm, it will be affected by storms that have occurred elsewhere. The hills of Upper in rowing, for the wind was contrary.' It is also Galilee may have been hidden in dense mists for a day or two, but nothing has disturbed the peace of the Lake. There have been rains, however, on the high lands only a few hours distant, and these, forming themselves into mountain torrents, have come down, sweeping all before them (Mt 727, Lk of the dwarf, sweeping an before them (Mt 1-, Lk of the line) in their descent, and flooding what but a few minutes earlier had been a dry channel. The present writer has personally watched the Wady Rabadiyeh and the Wady Leimon, both of which cross the Plain of Gennesaret, as they became in the little watches the little watches they became in the little watches they became in the little watches the little an incredibly short time changed from little more than dry, stony river-beds to impassable foaming torrents; and, when the hills have been dark with clouds, has heard the warning given to get over these wadys ' before the stream comes down.

Storms may occur on the Lake at any season, and there are few places where changes come so suddenly. The experience of Lynch is that of every one who has spent any time here: 'While pulling about the Lake, a squall swept down one of the ravines, and gave us a convincing proof of how soon the placid sea could assume an angry look' (p. 164). The storms on the Sea of Galilee look' (p. 164). are in many ways peculiar, and sometimes the wind seems to blow from various directions at one time, tossing the boat about. This arises from the fact that the winds blow violently down the narrow gorges and strike the Sea at an angle, stirring the waters to a great depth. Many of the storms, too, are quite local in their character. This may be understood by the fact that when a westerly wind is blowing, all may be smooth along the shores to the north and south of Tiberias and for a mile out, but there we may pass in a moment from the region of perfect calm into a gale so violent that the only chance of safety is to run before the wind to the eastern shore. At other times the south end of the Lake may be comparatively peaceful, but, sailing northward, we no sooner reach Mejdel than the wind from Wady el-Hamam will seize the sail, and, unless it be instantly lowered, overturn the boat. These winds are from the west, but it is generally the wind from the north-east that raises a general storm over the whole Sea. This wind blows right into the Sea from el-Baţiḥa, and from this direction no part is sheltered. The suddenness, too, with which the storms spring up may be illustrated by a storm which came from this direction, and which the present writer observed. A company of visitors were standing on the shore at Tiberias, and, noting the glassy surface of the water and the smallness of the Lake, they ex-pressed doubts as to the possibility of such storms as those described in the Gospels. Almost immediately the wind sprang up. In 20 minutes the sea was white with foam-crested waves. Great billows broke over the towers at the corners of the city walls, and the visitors were compelled to seek shelter from the blinding spray, though now 200 yards from the Lake side. It is further to be noted that the north end of the Lake, being less sheltered than the rest, is more subject to storms. Indeed, only in peculiar circumstances could it escape having a chief share in any storm.

These facts may now be used to illustrate the two occasions on which Jesus is recorded to have been on the Sea in a storm (Mt 8<sup>23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>37</sup>, Lk 8<sup>23</sup>; and Mt 14<sup>24</sup>, Mk 6<sup>48</sup>, Jn 6<sup>18</sup>). On the former of these the journey was from Capernaum to Gergesa, and the wind was from the north-east. Thus the boat was struck on its side, and so 'the waves beat into the ship' and it became 'filled.' On the second made clear to us that, although the wind prevented their getting to Capernaum, it was not such as would prevent boats coming from Tiberias (Jn 6<sup>19-24</sup>). Even in the height of the storm they could have, under the shelter of the western hills, proceeded as far as Mejdel, and thus come early upon the scene at any point at the north end of the Lake when once the storm was calmed.

It might be imagined that the cessation of the storms might mean simply the passing from an exposed and stormy to a calmer and protected region, but in both the cases recorded this is impossible. In the first instance, when the wind was from the north-east, the whole Sea would be disturbed; while in the latter case the Sea to the north of Mejdel would be all affected by the storm; and as the passage was between el-Batiha and the Plain of Gennesaret, the boat would not even approach the region of calm.

iv. INDUSTRIES.—During the peaceful years of Christ's ministry the whole Lake-basin was becoming a focus of life and energy. We have already indicated, by references to Josephus and the Rabbis, what the land was in the process of becoming in so far as agriculture was concerned. The tilling of the soil must have been a tempting occupation where the land was so fertile, so well watered everywhere, and enjoyed so much of the sunshine. Besides, it could be sown two and even three times in the year. At the present time in the plain of el-Bațika this is the case. After the corn harvest is gathered in, Indian corn may be sown; and when this also has ripened and been cleared off, the land and the season are ready for vegetables and water melons. The peculiar climate, too, ripens the harvest a month earlier than on the higher lands of Galilee and Bashan. The melons and the cucumbers are ready for use fully four weeks before those of Acre and Damascus, so that the prospect of greater gain by being able to anticipate the markets in all the larger towns must have been a powerful incen-tive to diligence when the means of transport were easier than now. We know that the fruits of Gennesaret were taken to Judæa (M. Ma'aser Sheni ii. 3), though it is said that they were not allowed in Jerusalem, lest on account of their goodness they should form an inducement, apart from the spiritual one, for pilgrims to journey thither (Bab. Pesach. 8b). With so much activity was this work pursued, that the hiring of day-labourers seems to have been quite common, and they were wont to go from Tiberias to till the lands of Beth-maon (Kul'at ibn Ma'an), which lands we believe to have been in the Plain of Gennesaret (Jerus. Bab. Met. vii. 1; and cf. Mt 201-17). Nor can we overlook the work of the shepherd, so closely bound up with agriculture, and to which there is so frequent reference in the Gospel story; but, just as in modern times, this work would be less pursued by the Lake side than on the neighbouring hills, where we know that even the flocks of Judæa were pastured (Baba Bathra

v. 1).

Then the Gospels set before us a very great activity in fishing. There was a Jewish tradition that the fishing in the Lake was to be free to all, subject to the one condition that stakes were not to be set that might impede the progress of boats; and tradition further said that the freedom had been conferred by Joshua (Baba Qama, 80b). Not only the statements of the NT, but the names of the towns and villages, lead us to the knowledge of activity in this direction. Thus we have two towns of the name of Bethsaida ('Fisherrow'); a village called Migdol Nunia ('Fish-tower'), probably situated at 'Ain Barideh (Pesach. 46a), and the great city of Taricheæ ('Fish factory') at the south end of the Lake. At Taricheæ, as the name indicates, the fish were salted and dried, and to-day the salt |

can be seen here encrusted on the sand like hoarfrost. So far as the Mosaic law was concerned, the fish in the Sea of Galilee were all clean; but, as one passage in the Gospels draws a distinction be-tween 'good' and 'bad' (Mt 13<sup>cf. as</sup>), it may be of interest to note that the Jews of the present day, for some superstitious reason, refuse to eat one kind named burbūt (Lynch, p. 165). Josephus (Vita, 12) found that the fishers were a strong party in Tiberias also, so we may conclude that the boats that came thence were used for fishing (Jn 623).

The chief fishing ground to-day is in the neighbourhood of el-Batika, and here the work is conducted in boats with drag-nets (σύροντες τὸ δίκτυον, Jn 218); but in other places the want of a boat need not prevent a man becoming a fisher. If he simply possess a net and learn to cast it (βάλλοντες simply possess a net and learn to cast it ( $\beta a\lambda \delta \sigma r \epsilon t d \mu \phi (\beta \lambda \eta \sigma \tau \rho \sigma r)$ , Mt  $4^{18}$ ), he may be very successful in places where the water is not deep. Where the warm springs flow into the Lake the fish congregate in great numbers. We have seen shoals at 'Ain Barideh and 'Ain et-Tabigha so great as to cover an acre of the surface, and so compact cover an acre of the surface, and so compact together that one could scarcely throw a stone without striking several. In such cases the handnet is thrown out with a whirl. It sinks down in a circle, enclosing a multitude, and these are then gathered in by the hand, while the net lies at the bottom. The hook  $(4\gamma\kappa\omega\tau\rho\sigma\sigma$ , Mt  $17^{20})$  is also used in our day, and frequently a large quantity is taken in a short time. In the days of Josephus (A.D. 67) there were very many boats on the Lake. —230 at Taricheze alone (EJILXXIS). the Lake, -230 at Taricheæ alone (BJ II. xxi. 8), but in the year A.D. 27-28 they must have been still far below the number they reached in later years.

The fishing industry implied many others. Delitzsch (Handwerkleben zur Zeit Jesu) tells us that the fish from the Lake were sold in Jerusalem; and when we think of the greater refinement of the Apostle John, his acquaintance with the high priest (Jn 18<sup>21</sup>), and his having a house in the Holy City (Jn 19<sup>27</sup>), we feel almost compelled to infer with Nonnus that he had acted there as agent. The sale of fish in Jerusalem and elsewhere would mean the employment of a goodly number of muleteers, and in ordinary circumstances the Apostolic band would travel in such caravans, just as Joseph and Mary had previously done (Lk 244). We must get away from the idea that they always travelled on foot.

Then on the shore of the Lake itself the fishing industry implied boat-building and repairing, and this, amongst other things, may have helped to decide our Lord's settlement in Capernaum, for there, as a carpenter, He could still from time to there, as a carpenier, he could sain from this to time exercise His own calling. At any rate, after He had settled here for some time, He was still known as 'the carpenter' (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). That this should be the case was quite in harmony with the practice of the teachers of those days. We find practice of the teachers of those days. We find Rabbi Abin also working as a carpenter (naggār), while Rabbi Ada and Rabbi Ise are said to have been fishers (zayyadīn). To some extent also the boats may have been used for transport trade; but we are inclined to think that the fact that the two sides of the Lake belonged to two different tetrarchies, each with its own customs and taxation, would militate against this.

The Talmuds and Midrash bring to our notice other occupations carried on beside the Lake, especially at Magdala, a portion of which was named Migdol Zebaya (Erubin v. 7) from the dyeing operations there conducted. So late as the year 1862, Sepp found this work still in existence, and indigo being grown in the fields of Mejdel. Then we read that there were 80 shops in the same town for the sale of linen (Taan. iv. 5), and we learn later that the linen of Galilee was fine (Baba Qama, 119a; Ber. Rab. c. 20). But perhaps of more interest than either of these is the fact that Magdala contained 300 shops for the mile of pageons (Midr Ecks, 75d), which were used for purifications in the Tsmple (Lk 25d). These pageons would be captured among the overlanging rucks of Wady Handm, where they are so plential to-day, or trapped in nooses last out in the adjoining fields (cf. Baba Qama vi.). These would be transferred to Jerusalem, where we learn that there were booths on the Mt. of Olives for the mile of such (Chodin, 53e), as well as in the Temple courts when the sellers had invaded the sacred that when those who sold doves were driven out of the Temple they could not be ignorant of the personality and power of Him who expelled them. Magdals and the Mt. of Olives being thus connected, another item is cast into the lalance in hyour of nome relationship between Mary of Magdals and the family of Bethany (cf. Baronius, Annales, cap. 32). It may also be interesting to note here a stiff further connexion, for in the year a b 07, when the Jewash war broke out, the Jews took occasion to destroy the booths on the Mt. of Olives because the occupants 'established their doings on the Law, and did what was iorbidden by the words of the wise' (Chodin, 53e), and during the same year Magdals and other towns in Gallies were destroyed, and the epithets used in the reasons given seem to indicate that the inhabitants were Christian (Jerus. Teansila is 6, Baba Mer. 88a, Midr. Ecks It. 2). These industries give be lathe valley a trale connexion with the outside world, but, apart from those engaged in these occupations, multitudes would be employed in making articles for bone use, as well as for the supply of the two courts and the various garrison towns. All trades would be represented, and these we sometimes read of incidentally, as in the case of tensing and the manufacture of earthernesics at Migdol Zebaya.

V. GEOGRAPHY — This has long been a vexed

v. Geography — This has long been a vexed question, and is likely to remain so till excavating work is undertaken. The sites of Tiberias, Magdala, and Julius seem alone to be undisputed, so far as the Gospel history is concerned. The questions regarding the various sites will be treated each in its own place. The towns with which we are concerned were for the most part Jewish, but there were also Greek ethes (πόλας Ἑλληκόει) around the Lake. In Tiberias and Julius, built by the tetrarchs, in Gamala, Hippos, Gadara, Taricheet, and in Philoteria (Polybius, v. 70), all trace of which has been lost, Greek influence would be paramount, though, of course, there was a Jewish element dwelling among the Gentile population (Rosh-Hash. ii. 1). These cities would have their own influence on the people of the surrounding districts. It may seem strange that the Gospels never touch them, and that the fact of their existence is no more than recorded, though they were large and important in comparison with the Jewish towns named. We feel justified in believing that Christ never entered these fashionable Greek cities. We know that the pious Jew specially abhorred Tiberias, and would not enter it, as it had been built on an ancient cemetery (Shebhiith ix. 1). We read, indeed, of a circuit through Decapolis (Mk. 72); but in view of Christ's relationship to the nearer towns, and His own statement (Mt. 1524), we are constrained to believe that He confined Himself to the country districts as occupied by the Jewish population. In harmony with this is His desire not to have His works proclaimed in these Greek towns (Mk. 828).

Roads.—The Sea of Galilee was in no sense in the 1st cent. what it is now, something of the nature of a retired mountain lake. On the contrary, it was kept in constant touch with the whole world. The western shore was one of the chief meeting-places of the world's highways. The Via Maris (the Way of the Sea, Mt 4<sup>13</sup>), a well-known trade route, along which the wealth of the East trade route, along which the wealth of the East Passed westward, touched its north-eastern shore. Paved portions of it still remain. Details of the network of highways meeting in this region will be found in their own place (see Roads); but we have to remark that the Jordan could be passed not only at the usual fords, but, during the spring and summer months, also by wading kneedeep along a kind of bar formed by pebbles and sand, where the river enters the Lake (Mt 14<sup>13</sup>, Mk 6<sup>26</sup>). Further, it is to be noted that most if not all of these roads were available not only for mules and camels, as in modern times, but also for vehicles, for we learn that on account of their quantity the contributions were sent from Magdala, Cahul, and Sogane to Jerusalem in senggons (Ta'annth, iv. 5).

vi. POPULATION.—We can now well understand the various classes of people who dwelt in and around this district. In the Greek towns the population would be chiefly Greek-speaking so-journers of mixed race the Levantines of those days. The Roman soldiery would be there in condays. vi. POPULATION .- We can now well understand siderable numbers as well as scattered through the towns, especially where customs were collected. There would be courtiers around the Herods in Tiberias and Julias—'Herodians,' as they were called; and they were, for the most part, Saddu-cess. The publicane would have their head-quarters in the two capitals, but they would be employed everywhere, and would be specially active at the north end of the Lake, on the great trade routes. There, too, the Pharisess and probably also the Essence (BJ II. viii 4) would be chiefly in evidence. It is the population at this north end that chiefly concerns us; for amongst them the Lord dwelt, and there He had His own city (Mt 91). The people here were essentially Jewish, but there was a world of difference from the Judaism of Judaea. Graetz (ii. 148, Eng. ed.) has well de-scribed this when he says: 'Morality was stricter in Galilee, and the laws and customs more rigidly enforced. The slightest infringement was not allowed, and what the Judgeans permitted themallowed, and what the Judgans permitted themselves the Galilgans would by no means consent to. We might almost put it, Judga had much of the semblance of piety, Galilee more of the reality. Indeed, their piety as Jews had already impressed even the heathen world (Lk 7s). The Talmuds tell us that the Galilgan loved honour more than wealth, and that the contrary was the case in Judga (Jerus, Keth. iv. 14); that the marriages was virtually and more departity conducted (Keth. Judga (Jerus, Reth. iv. 14); that the marriages were simpler and more decently conducted (Keth. 12n, with which cf. Jn 2<sup>1 n</sup>; Edersheim, Sketch of Jewish Social Life, p. 152ff.), and also that the widow's right of occupancy of her husband's house was fully recognized (Mishus, Keth. iv. 12 and Jerus, Keth. iv. 14; cf. Mt 8<sup>10</sup>). The Galileans, too, were accused by their neighbours of being too talkative with women; and in this connexion the expression לילאה 'foolish Galilean,' came into use (Erubin, 53b; cf. Jn 427). Josephus also speaks well of the Galileans, commending their courage, and adding that they were inured to war from their infancy (BJ III, iii. 2). There is another remark in noting. In prosp by we the men of Galilee were disputations (Nedgr 48a). This has always been a characteristic of the Jew; he has never been able to argue calmly; and when we add to this acknowledged characteristic of the people the circumstances of a fishing and boating life, we must admit the truth of the accusation; and knowing this, we can well understand that many of the scenes around the Lake were much noisier than the calm words of Scripture would lead us to suspect (Mt 9<sup>34, 35</sup>, Mk 3<sup>35</sup>, Lk 8<sup>37</sup> etc.); and we can appreciate the facility with which Peter relapsed into what must have been an old habit (Mk 1471). Then the inhabitants of the district would not be over cleanly in their habits. We can infer nothing from the neglect of hand-washing (חישו), for it is at best purely ceremonial; but the Jew generally was, in the lat cent., the butt of the Gentile world on account of his uncleanliness, just as he is to day (Senecs, Ep. 5; Perseus, Sat. v.). Apart from the Greek towns, which, like Tiberias and Gamala, were supplied by aqueducts (portions of which still remain), the general water supply was from the Lake; and in consideration of the traffic that existed and the absence of sanitary neighbourhood of a town like Capernaum. Therevery village would have, as at the present time. its own dunghill, a fruitful source of swarms of flier.

Great extremes of wealth and poverty there would not be. We meet, indeed, with a knowledge of wealth (Mt 7<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>56</sup> 18<sup>56</sup>, Lk 12<sup>56</sup> b); but on the whole the life was of the simplest, as we see from the nature of the household furnishings,—the bushel, the candlestick (Mt 5<sup>56</sup>), there being but one; and the mention of the food—bread, eggs, fish (Mt 7<sup>5,56</sup>, Lk 11<sup>16,16</sup>).

Then it is to be noted that the records were to

Then it is to be noted that the people were to a certain extent bilingual. Judging from similar conditions in this district and elsewhere at the present day, we should say that the language of the homes and of the Jewish population among themselves was Aramaic, but that the men would generally be acquainted colloquially with the Hellenistic speech of the larger towns. The new language, too, had its own peculiarities (Mt 2873), the chief of which was a remarkable confusion of the gutturals, which is repeatedly ridiculed in the Talmuds, where a notable example is given of a Galikean being asked, when shouting on the street, whether he wished to sell 'wool,' 'a sheep,' 'wine,' or 'a donkey' (Bab. Erubin, 53b; Berakhoth, 32a).

To sum up, then, the population of this district was as manly, industrious, independent, moral, pious, and experienced in the world as any in Palestine. It was among men who were morally sight that our Lord chose to settle. It was such right that our Lord chose to settle. It was such that He made His first disciples, and finally His Apostles. Had these been willing to compromise conscience, they might easily have passed into easier walks of life. In the full strength of early manhood, they might have had a share in the settlement of Tiberias (Ant. XVIII. ii. 3), but they had resisted that temptation. It is true that Matthew the publican (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>) was among them, but it is to be remembered that here he did not serve an alien like the publicani in Judæa. The taxes he collected would go to the coffers of Antipas in Tiberias (Titus Livius, 32 F; Cicero, in Verr. ii. 72), and they would be drawn from the tax on goods passing along the highways as well as on the fish from the Lake, as at the present day. This latter fact suggests a peculiar relationship between Matthew and the 'fisher-folk' among the Twelve, and a still more interesting one be-tween him and Simon the Zealot, who had fought against these taxes.

We conclude by observing that, as no land in the world save Palestine could have given us the Bible, no part of the land save this, with its wealth of recent historical association and variety in nature, from the torrid heat of el-Ghuweir to the perennial snows of Hermon, could so well have suited the Great Teacher in His appeal to men of every kindred and every clime. In its calm beauty it was in many ways worthy of the presence of the Son of Man, and it presents us with a beautiful picture of many aspects of His life and character. It deserved all that Jew and Gentile said in its praime even in their playing with its names — Tiberias (מברא מברה האייתה (מבריא), 'beautiful of appearance'; Capernaum (συς τους, χωρίον παρακλήσεως), 'land of pleasantness or consolation.' Before the time of the Lord Jesus the Sea of Galilee was to the world an unknown, neglected, and almost unnamed distant inland lake; but He has changed all this. He has rendered it immortal.

SEAL.—The only reference in the Gospels to the arrangements, this could not be satisfactory in the literal use of a seal is Mt 275, where we read neighbourhood of a town like Capernaum. Then that the chief priests and Pharisees, after consultation with Pilate, in order to guard against the removal of our Lord's body by the disciples, secured the sepulchre to the best of their power by setting their seal upon the entrance stone (cf. Dn 6<sup>r</sup>) as well as by placing soldiers to guard it. The process would be accomplished by stretching a cord across the stone that blocked the entrance, and by sealing the two ends of the cord against the wall of rock. Twice in the Fourth Gospel the act of sealing is used figuratively to describe (a) the solemn confirmation by the believer, from his own experience, that God is true (Jn 3<sup>33</sup>); (b) the destination and authentication of the Son by the Pather as the bestower of the food which nourishes eternal life (Jn 6<sup>27</sup>). In all of these three cases it is the verb σφραγίζω that is used, the noun σφραγίς not being found in the Gospels.

SEARCHING.—Searching (of Latin-French derivation) is a richer word than seeking (of Anglo-Saxon origin), because it implies examination as well as looking and asking (cf. 1 P 1*). Thus while γητέω and its compounds are always translated 'seek,' the words corresponding to 'search' are draxpiru (Ac 17<sup>11</sup> only), εξετάζω, and ερεινάω. In Mt 2* εξετάζω is appropriately used for the identifying of the child of Messianic promise: 'Search out carefully concepting the young child' (RV. whereas the child of Messianic promise: 'Search out carefully concerning the young child' (RV; whereas AV tr. as if it were extyrea). In Mt 10<sup>11</sup> it means 'get to know exactly who is genuinely worthy,' rather than settle down with the first man who is spoken of for his piety. In Jn 21<sup>12</sup> the same word is used to suggest that the disciples did not venture to probe the mystery any further. Reverence held them back,—the sense that faith must at such a moment take the place of criticism.

But the exact equivalent of 'search' is épewéw. It is used twice in Jn. (5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>52</sup>) of 'searching the Scriptures.' It may well be believed that it connoted more on the lips of Jesus (529), who knew how to distinguish the spirit from the letter (Mt 712, Lk  $7^{27}$   $10^{26\pi}$ , Jn  $6^{62}$ ), and to bring forth treasures new as well as old (Mt  $13^{52}$ , cf.  $5^{211}$ .  $^{421}$ ,  $9^{13}$   $12^{46\pi}$ ), than it did upon the lips of the chief priests and Pharisees (Jn752).—With Christ it meant to search the Scriptures with a candid mind and reverent spirit to find the will of the holy Father whose name is Love. But there was a 'veil upon the faces' of the Jews (2 Co 3<sup>15</sup>), because they did not look behind a private or traditional interpretation. The priests, who were mostly Sadducees, 'searched' for passages that would serve a casual purpose (Mk 12<sup>1887</sup>), and the Pharisees 'searched' for what would maintain the Pharisees 'searched' for what would maintain their burdensome traditions (Mk 27.24, Lk 1314, Jn  $9^{2e}$ ), or even enable them to evade a moral issue (Mt  $19^{7}$ ).

The former falls into line with the general tenor of Christ's teaching, that the Jews had only to use the means at their disposal in order to see in Himself the fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, Lk 16<sup>31</sup> 24<sup>27</sup>, Jn 7<sup>38</sup>). But the Indicative seems in best accord with the immediate context ('because ye think,' 'and these are they,' 'ye will not come to me') (cf. Westcott, in loc.).

SECOND COMING. - This is the designation commonly given to the final return of Jesus in glory at the end of the ages, to perfect His Kingdom. The term does not occur in the Gospels, but it has long been adopted in general usage to signify the supreme crisis of the Parousia, the most momentous and decisive of the various future comings which Jesus foreshadowed when He spoke of His death at the hands of men, and the manifestations of His triumphant life and power that would follow it. The subject is dealt with under COMING AGAIN, and more fully, with a note on the Literature, under PAROUSIA.

SEED. — Excluding the use of this term as equivalent to progeny, offspring, or race (cf. e.g. Mk 12<sup>19-36</sup>, Lk 1<sup>36</sup>, Jn 7<sup>36</sup>), we find it exclusively employed in the parables of Jesus as an apt symbol for Diving induces on for the approximation of the company o for Divine influence, or for the expansion of the moral and religious life in communities or individuals.

1. In Mk 42-2, a parable peculiar to Mark, Jesus uses the process of sowing and the subsequent conduct of the farmer to illustrate the certain success of His Kingdom upon earth. What He preached about seemed perhaps to the disciples, What He as well as to outsiders, as weak as a grain of seed flung upon a field. Yet neither is an isolated or foreign thing in the world. On the side of the gospel were certain mysterious powers which would ensure it success, apart from human aid or inter-ference. All it required was time. The order of things was a ripening order, and at the proper moment these favourable conditions would bring about the fruit and result of what at present seemed a very precarious and unpromising move-ment among men. Such is the general point of the parable. The seed's vital energy and its appointed correspondence with the powers of nature symbolize features in the gospel which enable Jesus to await the future with quiet confidence and an easy mind. Neither is just what it seems to the outward eye. Each sets in action a slow but sure process of growth, upon which the sensible person will count. 'Fruit grows thus,' said Epictetus; 'the seed must be buried for some time, hidden, and then grow slowly if it is to reach perfection.' It is by an extension, or rather a special application, of this usage that the self-sacrifice of man is compared to the burying of the seed in the furrow (Jn 12<sup>23-26</sup>), with special reference to the death of Jesus Himself. The ultimate effects of such self-immolation depend on the thoroughness of the process itself.

The Kingdom is also compared to seed in the parable of the Mustard Seed (Mk 4<sup>20-12</sup> = Mt 13<sup>13. 22</sup> = Lk 13<sup>13. 19</sup>). A small thing to begin with, it ultimately surpasses all other movements which make a greater show at first to the untrained eye. Here the Kingdom is conceived of, not eschatologically, but historically. When it is likened to cally, but historically. When it is likened to 'seed,' the thought is mainly of the immense possibilities of growth in it, as compared with its initial size, the correspondence between it and the soul of man, and the pledge, which it contains, of some final and splendid issue.

2. Seed, on the other hand, depends to a certain extent upon soil. While essentially designed to co-operate with the vital forces of nature, it may be rendered wholly or partially barren. And in this further sense it forms a symbol for Jesus of the Divine word and its fortunes in the world of men. Consequently we find that in two other parables the seed represents not the Kingdom, but the word (cf. Mt 1316).

The first of these, the parable of the Sower and the Soils (Mk 4<sup>2t</sup> = Mt 13<sup>2t</sup> = Lk 8<sup>5t</sup>.), bears on the difficulties and disappointments encountered in the preaching of the word of God. The latter is compared to the vital germ or grain of the plant, which, through no fault of its own or of the sower, may fail to germinate, owing to the unpromising nature of the ground on which it chances to fall. Nevertheless, the work of the sower must proceed. The partial failure of his efforts is not to render The partial failure of his efforts is not to render his career or calling void. In the parable itself, which is undoubtedly genuine, the original reference is to the experiences of Jesus Himself as a preacher. 'Jesus has to preach; the rest is God's concern' (Wellhausen). But in the subsequent interpretation of the parable, which, like other interpretations, must be held to contain in whole or part reflexions of the Ametalia are and traces of or part reflexions of the Apostolic age and traces of the editor's hand, the scope widens to include the general preaching of Christian evangelists, who are counselled not to let themselves be daunted by finding the unsympathetic and the preoccupied among their hearers. The seed must be sown. The word must be trusted to do its work in congenial hearts. The teaching must be imparted. Such is the supreme lesson for evangelists drawn here by Jesus from the vegetable world.

The other parable is that of the Tares, or darnel (Mt 13<sup>241</sup>), which may be an allegorized variation, and in part an expansion, of the ideas contained in Mk 4<sup>26-29</sup>. Certainly, whatever be the original nucleus, the editorial reflexions indicate a rather advanced period in the history of the early Church's mission and discipline. Growth, here too, is a partial feature of the situation. But the seed or word is further exposed to deliberate and wide-spread corruption and rivalry. Another power of influence is stealthily at work among men. God's message finds no virgin soil, for the growth of the seed is thwarted; and specious, vigorous rivals abound.

Both of the latter parables, in so far as they emphasize the nature of God's word or message as seed, thus touch wisely and earnestly on its mysterious power of growth. The spoken word is essentially fruitful. It is the instrument of the Divine mission. 'We forget too often that lan-Divine mission. 'We forget too often that tanguage is both a seed-sowing and a revelation,' says Amiel. 'Man is a husbandman; his whole work rightly understood is to develop life, to sow it everywhere.' And the supreme method is the contact of one personality with another, especially through the medium of that spoken intercourse the truth of Cod to the soul of men which conveys the truth of God to the soul of man. This, and no external means, is the chosen way of SEEING.—In the Gospels there are three Greek words (βλέπω, θεωρέω, ὁράω) used for 'see,' sometimes rendered in the EV by 'behold,' 'take heed,' 'beware,' 'regard.' The most ordinary significance of the word 'see' is, of course, the natural one—to recognize by the act of vision ordinary external objects, as when the blind are described as seeing (Mt 15<sup>21</sup>, Jn 97), or men are promised that they shall see the Son of Man, or when the disciples think they see a vision, or the multitude disciples think they see a vision, or the multitude see the miracles of Jesus (Mk 14<sup>63</sup>, Lk 24<sup>23</sup>, Jn 6<sup>2</sup>).

The more significant uses of the word are, however, figurative. (1) The first usage under this head is where the verb 'to see' is used of the recognition of objects not strictly visible, as, for example, when it is said of Peter that he saw the wind (Mt 1420); or when men are told that, if they first cast out the beam out of their own eye, they will then be able to see clearly to cast the mote out of their brother's eye (Mt 7<sup>5</sup>); or, again, when it is said that a man shall see death (Lk 2<sup>38</sup>, Jn 8<sup>51</sup>); or when the Lord speaks of a man as 'seeing the light of this world' (Jn 11<sup>9</sup>), where, of course, it is more strictly the vision of objects made possible through the presence of the light of day.

(2) The second figurative sense is a very ordinary one in the Gospels, where the verb 'to see' is employed in the sense of the spiritual vision of the mind and soul. In the Beatitudes, for example, the blessing of the pure in heart is that they shall see God (Mt 58). The angels also possess the same privilege (Mt 1810). The disciples are told that in seeing Christ they have already obtained the vision of the Father (Jn 149); while in another passage of the same Gospel the seeing of Christ and believing on Him are the conditions of possessing eternal life (640). In the Lord's great prayer for His disciples He desires that they may see His glory (17-24), which implies a participation in the understanding of Divine things of the highest and most intimate character. In this connexion also is to be noted the strange utterance of our Lord in Lk 10-18, where, on the return of the Seventy, He speaks of His beholding Satan 'fallen as lightning from heaven,' which must imply His spiritual prevision of the final overthrow of the powers of evil, and the establishment of His Divine kingdom. Most significant of all this class of passages, however, are those found in Jn 92, and Mt 131-16 with its parallels in Mk 42 and Lk 810. The passage in Jn. distinctly states that the purpose of Christ's presence in the world was first to bring light to blind eyes, but, secondly, to make blind those who were able to see; and this last statement is further explained in the passage by the answer given to the indignant question of the Pharisees as to whether they also were blind, that their fault consisted in claiming to possess the power of spiritual vision, while their hearts were closed to the real significance of Christ's message; and so their boast of spiritual perception only magnified their sin. On Mt 131-16 weep Parable Ep. 315 f.

their boast of spiritual perception only magnified their sin. On Mt 13<sup>14-16</sup> || see Parable, p. 315 f.

(3) A third general significance of the word 'see' is that of an ethical warning in the sense of the English phrase 'take heed.' For example, in Mt 24° we read, 'See that ye be not troubled'; and in Mk 8<sup>16</sup> two words are combined in the warning, 'Take heed (ὀρᾶτε), beware (βλέπετε) of the leaven of the Pharisees, and the leaven of Herod.'

When combined with a preposition (els), the verb  $\beta \lambda \ell \pi \omega$  signifies 'regard,' in the sense of 'pay obsequious attention to,' as in Mt 22<sup>16</sup>; and, finally, the word is used of God Himself in His vision of the hearts of men, as in Mt 6<sup>6</sup>, which reads, 'Thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee.'

As a general result of the examination of the above passages, it will be noticed that in Jn. the word 'see' has a special significance. It is, indeed, one of the words that form a leading conception in his writing. Just as the idea of life arises out of the miracle of the feeding of the multitude, so does that of light spring from the miracle of the healing of the man blind from his birth. In Jn.'s spiritual vocabulary, Christ Himself is the light of the world; and the illumination of the souls of men and the blessing of the gospel can be spoken of in terms of light and its enjoyment as suitably as in terms of life and its possession. Thus the miracles of giving sight to the blind become peculiarly significant; but we need not, therefore, assume that, though they are in this way acted parables, the narratives of such miracles are not to be regarded as of any historical value, but as mere pictorial representations of the spiritual truths they are meant to convey.

SELF-ASSERTION.—See CHARACTER OF CHRIST and CLAIMS OF CHRIST in vol. i., and art. RENUNCIATION above.

SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS.—See CONSCIOUSNESS.

SELF-CONTROL.—The Scripture term for selfcontrol is eyapareia, which with its cognates occurs the privative departa is found, with the Gospels only the privative departa is found, with the rendering excess' (Mt 2323). The English word is not used in AV, and in RV is confined to the margin, with the single exception of 2 Ti 33. It denotes (see Chrysostom, Hom. Tit 18 τον πάθους κρατούντα) the exercise of dominion by man over the constituents of character within, as well as over external influences that would tend to baffle or frustrate him. It may be distinguished from self-denial as discipline is from destruction, the one making the self the centre of purpose and effort, the other aiming at its extinction or suppression. The one reduces the self, or certain of its elements, to zero; the other directs and uses it, turning all its powers into the channel of some activity, viewed as advantageous or benign. Mastery within the living organism of man is the principal suggestion of both; but self-denial gives greater prominence to the possible inherence of evil and to the ascetic processes by which it must be purged, whilst selfcontrol implies rather freedom and strenuousness, and involves no depressing view of man or of life (see art. SELF-DENIAL). More particularly, self-control means the control of the temperament, the instincts, emotions, and will, both in themselves and against the various appeals that are made to them in daily life, with a view to the accomplishment of some purpose or the maintenance of some phase of character. In the Gospels it is exhibited in the Man Jesus Christ in a perfect degree, and by Him commended to His disciples, together with the secret of its attainment and retention.

1. Self-control on the part of Christ.—(1) It is rather doubtful whether, in the current, though vague, sense of the word, temperament can be predicated of Christ. Strictly the word denotes a certain general characteristic of a man's temper and moods, by which his progress in intelligence and morality is in various ways promoted or hindered. It means the set of the inner life towards some specific expression or action, and implies both a disproportion in the constituents of character and a consequent degree of imperfection and disapproval. From a very early time the typical temperaments have been classed as four—sanguine, sentimental or melancholic, choleric, and phlegmatic; and in each of them is found in varying measure a surplus of some quality which, by reason of its excess, spoils the proportion, and makes self-control under certain conditions specially difficult. As the humanity of Christ is perfect, and in Him all the virtues meet and harmonize, an excess in any direction is out of the question. He had moods of unbounded hope (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>), of depression and shrinking (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>37</sup>), of indignant anger (Mt 23<sup>13-36</sup>), of equanimity and comparative insensibility to passing impressions (Lk 13<sup>32</sup>, Jn 19<sup>11</sup>); but there was no such long-continued pre-eminence of one good quality over another as would allow the placing of Him, in regard to temperament, in any of the ordinary categories. If He is to be placed at all, a new class must be formed, and He may be regarded as the type of the religious temperament (Lk 249, Jn 638), with the right principles of self-control in action from the beginning. In the same group, though by no means on the same level, may be put all the anima naturaliter Christiana, amongst whom the obligation of self-control, if rendered easier of discharge by their disposition, should be more quickly and actively met (Mt 13<sup>12</sup> 25<sup>28</sup>, Lk

(2) Control over instincts and the entire appetitive life, wherein the ethical rule is indulgence with restraint, is traceable in Christ both in the particulars of His historical manifestation, and as sustained with completeness in times of special temptation. By 'instinct' is meant the impulse and faculty of acting in such a way as to produce certain results, without deliberate or even conscious foresight. Some of these impulses are rooted in the body and aroused into activity by its uneasiness and recurring needs. Christ, for instance, knew weariness and its massive appeals for physical rest, but was so completely master of Himself as to be able to postpone, if not to withhold, the response (Mt 824, Jn 487.); and of sluggishness on His part there is no record in the Gospels. During the week of the Passion the nights were spent at Bethany (the village or its neighbourhood: Mt 2117, Mk 1111), in part probably with a view to bodily rest after the busy days. So, too, with hunger and thirst, whose importunity was sometimes clamorous, yet easily silenced or put off (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>20</sup> 6<sup>21</sup>, Jn 19<sup>20</sup>). In regard to the physical nature, Christ neither practised nor enjoined its suppression, but only the maintenance of its proper relation amongst natural promptings and activities. To this rule there were no exceptions, the apparent ones proving on closer examination to be designed each for a special didactic or ethical purpose. The cursing of the fig-tree was not done unthinkingly under the stimulus of a disappointed appetite (Mk 11<sup>125</sup>.), but in illustration of the doom awaiting Israel, emblem of all who abound in leaves but fail in fruitfulness (cf. I.k 13<sup>5-9</sup>), and of the power of faith in dealing with evil (Mt 21<sup>20t.</sup>). 'A gluttonous man and a wine-bibber' (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>), on account of its very difficulty to some expositors, must not be rejected as chity to some expositors, must not be rejected as an interpolation. It is not meant to indicate Christ's real habit; but it is an almost amused comment by Him on the equal readiness with which certain types of men protest against the severity of one teacher and the graciousness of another. A professed neutrality which is really childish and angry self-will deals of necessity in exaggeration; and in this case its evidence proves production of and in this case its evidence proves no degree of self-indulgence on the part of Christ, but merely magnifies His geniality, and the gentle way in which He moved amongst all innocent forms of human life, into a charge against Him of excess

Of the mastery exercised by Christ over His emotions the characteristics appear to be a recognition of the legitimacy of emotion, sometimes even of free and unrestrained emotion, with the avoidance of all such qualities and extremes as the world has learned to condemn. Sympathy was full at Bethany (Jn 11<sup>25</sup>) and on the approach to Jerusalem (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>), but not allowed to become so sentimental or overwhelming as to interfere with service. The anger of just indignation finds expression and becomes even torrential in Mt 23<sup>13-26</sup>; but there is nowhere any trace of personal rancour. In Gethsemane the sacred anguish transcends analysis, for the vicarious Passion was begun; but if any influence of fear or regret or intolerable burden (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>) is to be acknowledged, the shrinking is quickly mastered, and the Saviour goes forth calmly to die (Mt 28<sup>265</sup>, Mk 14<sup>415</sup>, He 5<sup>767</sup>.). Similarly the cry on the cross (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>, Mk 15<sup>24</sup>) is no sign of a temporary loss of control, the collapse of the human spirit of Christ in the bitterness of approaching death. It should be connected with His work of atonement rather than with His personal experience, and marks the culmination of the pressure of the world's sin (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>). For man Christ passes through the deep valley of sin's doom, and at the supreme moment is compassed about by darkness unrelieved; but He did not falter, nor was the ordered unity of His inner life in His oneness of purpose with the Father broken. At the other extreme of emotion are the sense of relief after long strain, with its associated perils of 'letting oneself go,' and such an exultation of joy as is apt to cause a lapse in vigilance. The relief and the joy are traceable in Christ (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, Jn 17<sup>1.4</sup>), who on the earlier occasion immediately proceeds, according to the one tradi-tion, to offer rest to the weary, and, according to the other, to pronounce a benediction upon His disciples. Joy that becomes exuberant and beyond control, and wastes itself in moods of sheer ecstasy, is nowhere recorded of Him. He preserves consistently the wise mean, well removed from the ordinary dangers, on either side, of excess and of defect. His self-respect was complete, never degenerating into immodest vanity or giving place to servility (Jn 6<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>12-15</sup> 18<sup>21-57</sup>). Fear could not be excited in Him by the antagonism of the people or by His apparent powerlessness in the hands of the authorities (Mt 12<sup>144</sup>., Lk 4<sup>294</sup>., Jn 18<sup>23</sup> 19<sup>11</sup>). He was sociable yet free, interested but not absorbed in nature and in man, subject to every pure emotion but possessed and mastered by none. And the sensitive life of Christ is most correctly viewed as an organized comity of well-graded sentiments and feelings, amongst which due order was maintained vithout either difficult effort or occasional failure.

(3) To this, the negative side of self-control, the subjection of the various instincts and sensibilities, must be added the positive introduction of some controlling end or purpose, without which the main factor in determining the merit of self-control and the moral quality of the life will be absent. Self-control by itself may be simply a tribute to strength of will, neutral in regard to quality, and capable of being turned to bad uses. As exhibited in Christ, it means not only steadiness and freedom from irritability, a calm temper unruffled by influences from without, but the inflexible direction of the spirit and will upon the accomplishment of purposes than which neither ethics nor religion can disclose any worthier. This superiority to disappointment, difficulty, apparent disaster, is shown in many lights; and if there are times when it appears for a moment to be obscured, it is recovered in another moment, and unflinchingly held. The atmosphere in which Jesus lived was often impure, vitiated by the influence of successes that were won by insincerity as well as by the prosperity of many vices; yet by men who are competent to judge, no moral fault or compromise with wrong has ever been charged against Him (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>). There is no instance of His having been diverted from His purpose by the 'gainsaying of sinners' (He 12<sup>3</sup>), the blundering clamour of the people, or their unbelieving disavowal of His mission (Mk 14<sup>56</sup>); and even wide-spread alienation amongst His followers was turned into an occasion for deepening the convictions and strengthening the loyalty of the others (Jn 6<sup>57</sup>). Neither the bitter craft of the religious leaders with their emissaries dogging His footsteps (Mt 22<sup>1567</sup>, Lk 11<sup>581</sup>,), nor the jealousy or fear of the petty overlords (Lk 13<sup>311,4</sup>), could break the inward unity of His spirit or the stability of His will. In the select group of His disciples were dispositions to protest or interfere (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>, Lk 9<sup>54</sup>), sometimes ignorance and unwillingness to learn (Mt 20<sup>3067</sup>, Lk 17<sup>3</sup>

that were discordant and unseemly, with a traitor lurking in the midst; yet Christ never allowed the strain of His work, or the uncongeniality or impotence of the men who were nearest to Him, impotence of the men who were nearest to Him, to divert His sympathy or to ruffle the settled quiet of His demeanant. Death itself, rendered mesonesivably horrible by the concentration upon Him of every man's sin (He 2°), was anticipated without alarm, and undergone in all its shame without loss of personal dignity or any weakening of His loving resolution to save. He set His face steadfastly (Lk 3°) in no sudden bracing of His will in the presence of an unexpected peril; but the perform self-central which made it results for the perfect self-control, which made it possible for If in to become incarnate, was maintained through all the incidents of the historical manifestation, and even on the cross itself. In the freedom of His contact with nature and man, His heart never more than momentarily failed, and His self-control in times of confusion and danger helped to make Him the most consummate Leader of sinful men. serone and strong, and always confident in God and in the leave.

(4) Beyond the action of Christ's own will, two (4) Beyond the action of Christ's own will, two further causes of His self-control may be distinguished. The one was His personal trust in tind the Fitther, and the other the influence of the Holy Spirit in response. (a) At the beginning of His carear the part played both in His practice and in His inner life and thought by the recognition of His Father's claims upon Him, against the attractions that appeal to youth, and the dependence and clinging that earthly parents naturally desire, was indicated in His reply in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>m</sup>), and on later occasions (Jn 4<sup>24</sup> 5<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>28</sup> 14<sup>21</sup>). A sense of security in the remembrance of the I sense of scenrity in the remembrance of the l'ather's power and purpose is part of the secret of Christ's complete self-possession in the final crisis (Mt 20<sup>80</sup>). He entered upon His Agony with litter forebaldings, which in solitude became almost unendurable (Lk 22<sup>24</sup>); absolute acceptance of the l'ather's will (Mk 14<sup>80</sup>) enabled Him to press down any reductance to die (He 3<sup>160</sup>) 'made perfect.' Himself thereby, and fitted to be 'the author of eternal salvation,' So important was His consolousness of this relationship with the Father, that in it by for Him the kernel and germ of all truth, and in its revelation to man the sum of all duty and pleasure. (b) The action of the Holy splitt in sustaining the self-control of Jesus against appetites and evil appeals is conspicuous in the records of the Temptation (Mt 41, Mk 112, Lk 41), and reterred to by each of the Synoptists (see Temptation). But it also appears elsewhere. From this childhood the grace of God was upon him 'at k 2001, and that appears af grace of him' (I.k 24"); and that communicated grace of the Spirit wrought in Him (Lk 225 RVm) all that He as a man accomplished or became. The unction or illapse at His baptism was not temporary, but the Spirit permanently abode with Him (Jn 1<sup>26,1</sup>); and if Ac 10<sup>26</sup> refers primarily to invigoration for service, St. Luke clsewhere represents Jesus as full of the Holy Ghost' (4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Jn 3<sup>24</sup>), and as thereby prepared for personal testing and discipline as well as for His mission of mercy and redemption. For Him, as for His disciples, the soul's thirst for unity and self mastery is assuaged, and all needed reconcess are obtained, in the same way and from the same tountain (Ju. 72 22). 2. Self-centrol on the part of man.— For man self control assumes a double aspect, according as it is a title of restraint or of activity. On the one hand, it keeps the indulgence of the natural appetites and impulses within the bounds of reason. and me chements of the mail as elements of a colorest tational life. On the other, it con-centrates the energies, reversing any original tendency to diffusion, and integrating moral life under the steady pressure of a master conviction and a master purpose. In other words, since Christianity is not an ideal or a theoretical ethic, but a practicable way of living, and since each man's difficulty does not arise from the impulses generally, but from the predominance of some single group of impulses, self-control as exhibited and required by Christ comes to mean the control of individual temperament, the avoidance of the various evil excesses to which each man is prone, and possibly even the substitution of some form of good for some form of evil as an instinctive beset-ment. Symmetrical development of each man's spirit may be said to be the object of the Gospels, which are far from silent either as to the method by which it is to be effected, or as to the pains and satisfactions of the process.

Control of the senses and appetites is to be carried, if necessary, to the point of mutilation, for excess must be prevented, whatever the pain or cost (Mt 5<sup>291</sup>. 18<sup>8t</sup>, Mk 9<sup>45-49</sup>); and not even relationships that are legitimate and pure must be allowed to interfere with the interests of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>, cf. 1 Co 7<sup>22</sup>). Inclinations and impulses are to be distrusted, and the Christian should be their meeting and that their Christian should be their master and not their slave (Mt 5<sup>29-41</sup>, Lk 6<sup>291</sup>.; cf. Ro 12<sup>17a</sup>). The need value (Mt 5<sup>29-41</sup>, Lk 6<sup>291</sup>; cf. Ro 12<sup>17a</sup>). The need of integrating the life by giving supreme sway to some right and rightly conceived purpose at its centre is shown in the conversation with the young centre is shown in the conversation with the young ruler (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 18<sup>22</sup>), where the renunciation of wealth is a necessary preparation for all-absorbing devotion to Christ, the great test of discipleship (as in Jn 10<sup>27</sup> 12<sup>26</sup>), as well as the secret of perfection. The same is the bearing of the sayings as to the 'single' eye (Mt 6<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>24</sup>), the impossibility of serving God and mammon (Mt 6<sup>24</sup>, Lk 16<sup>13</sup>), the necessity of becoming 'as a little child' (Mk 10<sup>15</sup>), as well as the great law of Mt 6<sup>85</sup>, the observance of which not only safeguards Mt 633, the observance of which not only safeguards the spirit from the distressing influence of suspicion and fear, but especially keeps it a well-ordered unity, with quiet strength and readiness to act as its prominent qualities. If the control be threatened from without, it is recovered or retained by recognizing God's superior claims, and counting nothing so important in experience as His good pleasure (Mt 1028, Lk 1226). Against opposition and difficulty of every kind the rule is steadiness (Mt 10<sup>16-58</sup>, 34-32), neither purpose nor self-control being shaken, because of the unrivalled constraint of the love of Christ (Mt 24°, Jn 15<sup>18-21</sup> 16<sup>21, 20-22</sup>). 'For my sake' gives the secret of a self-control that never breaks down; and the love and devotion are continuously fed by the Spirit of the Father (Mt 1020, Jn 1614). By the forgiveness of sins Christ sets the will free from bondage to past evil, and His Spirit, ruling in the life because in the heart, becomes an unfailing source of strength and peace, reproducing in mortal experience the self-control of Him who never wavered from duty, or yielded to temptation. or allowed the Kingdom within to be disturbed by a breach of will between Himself and the Father. His self-control, in its completeness and in its means, is the measure and guarantee of what is possible to man. See also art. TEMPERANCE.

SELF-DENIAL—Self-denial is undoubtedly an essential part of the religious life as set before men by Jesus Christ. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself' (Mt 16%). The word used (dragocount) occurs elsewhere only in the parallel passages (Mk 8%, Lk 9%); in the accounts given by the four Evangelists of St. Peter's denial (Mt 2634. 35. 75, Mk 1430. 31. 72, Lk 2261, Jn 1338); and in our Lord's denunciation of apostasy (Lk 12°). It is used in the LXX to tr. but. It is a strong word, and its meaning is best understood perhaps by comparing it with the corresponding expression of St. Paul, 'I count as loss' (ηγημαι ζημίαν, Ph 3<sup>7.8</sup>). It must be understood to include a conquest of the insistent and unruly demands of the body, denial of the lower self; and a bringing into subjection of the ambitions and emotions of the intellect and spirit, denial of the higher self.

1. The denial of the carnal self.—The practices by which men have sought to accomplish this kind of self-denial pass generally under the name of asceticism. There are five such kinds of discipline recommended or countenanced by our Lord's teaching and example: (1) fasting, (2) celibacy and sexual restraint, (3) almsgiving, (4) vigils, (5) the refusal of luxury in the surroundings of life.

(1) Fasting was practised by our Lord Himself (Mt 4<sup>16,18</sup>). It was presupposed as likely to formpart of the religious life by His disciples (Mt 6<sup>16x</sup>, Mk 2<sup>20</sup>). It was practised by the Apostles and the Church in their time (Ac 10<sup>2,20</sup> 13<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>), and traditions of the severity of their fasting survived into the 2nd cent. (Clem. Recog. vii. 6; Clem. Alex. Pædag. ii. 1; Can. Murat. i. 11). In the sub-Apostolic age, probably as a result of the example of the Pharisees, fasting on stated days became a common form of self-denial days became a common form of self-denial (Did. viii.; Hermas, Sim. v. 1; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 12). The Lenten fast grew from an original 14 days (Tertull. de Jejun. 15) to 40 days, in imitation of our Lord's fast in the wilderness. The Friday fast, the Lenten fast, and the custom of fasting before receiving the Communion, were very general, if not universal, in the early Catholic and the mediæval Church. See art. FASTING.

(2) Celibacy is countenanced by our Lord, but not generally recommended (Mt 1912, Lk 1426). It and temporary sexual restraint are recommended and even deemed specially honourable by the Apostles (1 Co 729. 38, Rev 143. 4). In the sub-Apostolic age the idea of the superior sanctity

Apostolic age the idea of the superior sanctity of the virgin state grew rapidly (Did. xi. 11; Ignat. Ep. ad Polyc. v.; Just. Mart. Apol. i. 15; Athenag. 33, etc.). See art. CELIBACY.

(4) Vigits.—Watching and wakefulness as a

(4) Vigils.—Watching and wakefulness as a form of self-denying service to God were no doubt suggested by our Lord's commands (Mt 244 284). Lk 1287) as well as by His own practice (Mt 1423 Lk  $12^{37}$ ) as well as by His own practice (Mt  $14^{22}$   $26^{28}$ ), and in this sense were understood many of the Apostolic exhortations (1 Co  $16^{13}$ , 1 Th  $5^5$ , Eph  $6^{18}$ ). Examples of vigil services are to be found in the records of the Apostolic Church (Ac  $12^{12}$   $20^7$ ) and in the practice of St. Paul (2 Co  $6^5$   $11^{27}$ ). The heathen Pliny's description (Ep. x. 97) of the Christians as 'meeting before daybreak' probably points to nothing but a desire for privacy and a feeling of the necessity for avoiding public notice, but we have certainly allusions to vigils in the strict sense of the word in the writings of several of the early Fathers (Clem. the writings of several of the early Fathers (Clem. Alex. Padag. ii. 9; Tertull. ad Ux. ii. 5; Cypr. de Laps. 34 ff.; Lactant. vii. 19; August. Ep. ad

Januar. 119; Socr. i. 37, v. 21; Sozom. ii. 29,

(5) Refusal of luxury.—Another region in which self-denial might be exercised was found in the surroundings of life, clothes, household arrangements, etc. Our Lord's own example (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>) was appealed to, and certain hints in His teaching were appealed to, and certain hints in His teaching were felt to have a bearing on the subject (Mt 10<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>8</sup>, Lk 16<sup>19</sup>). The teaching of the Apostles was more detailed and definite (1 Ti 2°, 1 P 3<sup>24</sup>). The question of the amount of luxury permissible to Christians came up in the Montanist controversy (Euseb. v. 18. 4; Tertull. de Coron. Mil. 5, 10, 11). It occupies a considerable part of the Pædag. of Clem. of Alex. (see especially ii. 11, ii. 8–12, iii. 2, etc.), and is discussed by Cyprian (de Virg. vel. and de Cult. fem.).

and de Cult. fem.).

2. The denial of the higher intellectual and psychical self.—When we consider the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, we are at once struck by His definite and marked departure from the ethics of classical antiquity. For Him there is no such word as doern (cf. Apps, and the Lat. vir-tus) with the sense of elevated manliness. Nor has He anything to correspond with the classical tetrad φρόνησις (or σοφία), ανδρεία, σωφροσύνη, δικαιοσύνη. These express the completest development of the higher, better self in man, and proclaim as the ideal the attainment of the truest 'manliness' in the face of an appreciative and admiring world. For our Lord the ideal is a different one. His For our Lord the ideal is a different one. His life fulfils the conception of the prophet. He has no beauty that men should desire Him. He is despised, rejected, a Man of sorrows, acquainted with grief. He is 'meek and lowly of heart' (cf. Zec 9°, 2 Co 10¹, Ph 2⁻). He is 'one that serveth' (Mt 20²8, Jn 13¹²-¹¹). It is 'the poor in spirit,' 'they that mourn,' 'the meek,' and those that 'are reviled' whom He calls blessed (cf. Mt 18³⁴ 19³⁰ 20¹⁴, Mk 10³²¹π. Lk 1⁴⁰). It is quite evident that the Mk 10<sup>278.</sup>, Lk 1<sup>48</sup>). It is quite evident that the ideal here set up is wholly different from that of the classical philosophers. The two are, in fact, in fundamental opposition. The one is the ideal of the development, the other the ideal of the denial of the higher self. The Apostles understood the Master very well and taught as He did took the master very wen and taught as he did (but see the use of  $d\rho\epsilon\tau\eta$  in what may be its classical sense in Ph 4<sup>5</sup> and in 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>). Indeed, they insisted with even more than His iteration on the denial of self (1 Co 1<sup>28, 29</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6-8</sup>, 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, Col 3<sup>13</sup>, Ja 1<sup>21</sup> 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>21</sup>).

J. O. HANNAY. SELF-EXAMINATION.—'Our conclusion, then, is that the state of mind which is now most naturbeen what I should be? Shall I be what I should be, in doing so and so? is that in which all moral progress originates' (T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 337).

1. Duty of self-examination.—Every man's conscience bears witness to the reasonableness and necessity of self-examination. It means taking oneself seriously, and applying to the moral and spiritual life methods analogous to those adopted in all other departments of knowledge and skill.

It is the comparison of our motives and actions with the ideal of what they should be; and all such self-scratiny, as T. H. Green suggests, has a real identity with the reformer's comparison of what is actual with a social ideal. He who would attain excellence in any difficult work must be constantly testing and examining his results. He must be on the alert to overcome slackness, discover errors, ensure progress. In Christian discipleship, the most arduous, as it is the most noble, of all pursuits, there is the same imperative demand. This duty is enforced (1) By Holy Scripture. The mission of the ancient prophet, as distinct from that of the priest, was to apply a constant spur to the con-sciences of men. Much of his message was ex-pressed in the exhortation, 'Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord' (La 3"). He bade men examine themselves in the light of God's known character and will (Is 110-10), Jer 71 m, Ezk 1810-30, Hos 141-6 etc.). If Jesus did not in so many words call on men to examine themselves, yet the necessity and duty of such self-criticism were imnecessity and duty of such self-criticism were implied in all His ministry and teaching. In the Sermon on the Mount, as in so many of His parables, He was holding up before men the ideal by which they must test their lives. And the same may be said of all the Apostolic Epistles (1 Co 11<sup>ab</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>b</sup>).—(2) By the experience of wise and good men. The saying, 'Man, know thyself,' was frequently on the lips of Socrates. He made it the text of his life and teaching. But how shall a man know himself unless he brings his thoughts, his nessions his conduct, into strict, review and his passions, his conduct, into strict review, and scrutinizes them in the light of conscience and duty? What a large place, again, did this work of self-examination fill in the lives of serious-minded men and women of earlier and simpler times than ours. Thomas a Kempis, in the Imsta-tion of Christ, is much occupied with this duty; and Jeremy Taylor, in Rules and Exercises of Holy Dying (chapter ii.), devotes many pages to the reasons and benefits of the habit of the daily examination of our actions. 'He that does not frequently search his conscience, he remarks, his a house without a window.'

2. Difficulties and dangers of self-examination. -(1) There is the danger of a morbid self-conscious-ness hurtful to the spiritual life. An analogy may be drawn with bodily health. A sure way of producing sickness and physical disorder is for a person to be constantly worrying himself about his health, and living, as it were, with his fingers always on his pulse. Is this self-consciousness a good on his pulse. 'Is this self-consciousness a good thing' Does it not hinder action, destroy energy' Does it not cultivate a habit of mawkishness, an indeficate desire to expose the most secret passages of our souls, even to the public gaze? . In how many other ways do men testify that they feel this self consciousness to be a disease which will destroy them if they cannot be cured of it! What numbers does it bring to the feet of the spiritual director (F. D. Maurice). Do we not live our less life when we just go on doing our duty and filling our place, never considering ourselves at all? 'There is a kind of devotion to great objects or to public service which seems to leave a man no lessure and to afford no occasion for the question about him self, whether he has been as good as he should have been, whether a better man would not have acted otherwise than he has done. And again, there is a sense in which to be always fingering one's motives as a sign rather of an unwholesome preoccupation with self than of the eagerness in disinterested service which helps forward mankind (T. H. Green).—(2) A more serious difficulty is that in this work of self-criticism we occupy the clouble position of being both the examiner and the examined. We are nt once the judge, the witness, and the prisoner at the bar. What scope for self-deception, for evasion, for duping ourselves! Are we not in danger of condemning trifles and over-looking serious faults and vices? How easy to confuse the issues in this complicated process! to lose sight of the due proportion of things! to play tricks with ourselves! Is there any escape from this difficulty?

3. Suggestions for self-examination.—If the dangers mentioned above are to be escaped, thus exercise must be conducted (1) with the most humble dependence upon God and desire for His help and quidance. Consider specially Ps 139<sup>20, 20</sup>. The Psalmist could not trust himself. He knew how sin eluded him, how it disguised itself, how it hid in secret chambers where his search could not follow it. He needed the aid of One who could accomplish a deeper and more penetrating work than he himself could undertake. Consider also 1 Ch 28° 29°, Ps 261° 244°, Pr 161° 20°, Jer 17° 10° 12° 20° The examination must be very largely objective, i.e. not merely, or chiefly, a scrutiny of feelings or motives, but an investigation of actual conduct in the light of God's law and of Christian ideals. The desire expressed in the hymn, "Tis a point I long to know. . . . Do I love the Lord, or no? may often be best answered by a reference to such words as are found in Ju 14<sup>10, 21</sup> 15<sup>10</sup>. See also Mt 7°1° Mk 3°1. 'Do you notice how many times our bayiour says: "If ye love me, keep my commandments" It is as if a child should rush passionately to its mother and throw its little arms round her neck, and say convulsively, "O mother! I do love you so!" "Well, my dear child, if you do, why are you not a better child?" (H. W. Beecher, Conduct the Index of Feding), —(3) Special consideration should be given to 2 Co 13° "Jesus Christ is in you." Therein lies the secret by which self-examination may be a reality and not a fiction; therein is found the protection from the dangers already referred to. There is a true Light which lighteth every man; One who dwells with us, near us, in us; One who will save us from self flattery and self deception and from many kish self-consciousness. In the light of His presence self-examination is safe and fruitful.

ARTRUR JENKINSON, SELFIBHNESS. The self sacrifice which Christ demands of all who would be His followers might lead one to imagine that Christianity was a religion of asceticism; that the tenostic dualism of good and evil, matter and spirit, was the logical outcome of the teaching of Josus; that required the renunciation of all carrilly things, and even of life, for the sake of the sacrable itself But it is a total misconception of the religion of Jesus to suppose that He makes asceticism an end. What we find Him teaching is not that the world is evil, but that the soul of man is good that the soul is eternal, not of time, and therefore that in God alone, to whom it is akin, can it attain its complete satisfaction (Mt  $6^{(p)21}$  Lk  $12^{(1)24}$  He demanded self-renunciation (Lk  $14^{20}$  % %), and at the same time He ment attsl the absolute value of the self (Mt 16" Mk 8" ). He sets prorat selflove over against natural selfishness (Mt 1625 Mk 82), and He insists that the perfect, the eternal development of the human personality is to be found not in separation and independence, but in union and communion with universal life,—life as union and communion with universal fire,—fire as it is in God, life as God has put it into the world (cf. Mt 5. 6. 7). To pour out oneself in love, to lose oneself for Christ's sake, to give oneself to God and to the world of men, is 'to find,' 'to save' oneself in Him. To make the law of God, the Creator of the world and the Heavenly Father of each human soul, the fundamental law of one's life, is to render all temporal and corruptible things innocuous. It then becomes possible to employ them, in a way of which the Stoic hardly dreamed, to the end of perfect self-development (Mt 623). 'What is a man profited,' Christ asks, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' To preserve and to save his soul is thus a man's highest profit, his one great task. But to seek to save it in the worldly sense is to lose it in the spiritual and eternal. Natural selfishness is humanity's greatest danger—the great source of sin. It is manifest that our Lord accepts the common division of human nature into its two spheres of flesh and spirit. He has, it is true, no explicit psychology such as St. Paul elaborated; but to Him the natural and the spiritual man are as evidently in continual conflict as to St. Paul. as evidently in continual conflict as to St. Paul. It is the natural self that must be denied, that must be subjected, if the spiritual self is to grow. Each of these Christ calls the 'self,' the 'life'; but it is the latter only—'the soul'—that is of absolute value. The value of the former is but relative; and its good, which has a measure, must always be subordinated to that of the other, which is measureless. Even the graining of the whole. is measureless. Even the gaining of the whole world by the natural self is worthless if it entails spiritual loss; for to lose the true self is to have but the life of time, is to miss that of eternity (cf. the parable of the Rich Fool, Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>, and the profound statement of the same truth in Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>, Lk 4<sup>2-13</sup>). Moral self-love, therefore, consists primarily in love to God; and whenever the good of the natural self conflicts with the distates of that love it with the distates of that love it. self conflicts with the dictates of that love, it must be denied as a temptation of Satan (Mt 16<sup>21-22</sup>). To sink the self in the sensuous and finite, to cultivate the lower nature, to lay up abundant goods, and to imagine that the joy of one's soul is to be found therein, is to lose one's soul; and when death comes, the loss of all is immediately manifest (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>). It is in the light of eternity that man must view the world. It is the aim of the true self to lay up treasure in heaven, that the heart may dwell continually in the atmosphere of the eternal life.

That the denial of selfish desires is not to be regarded as an end in itself, is made clear by a whole series of parables uttered by our Lord upon the subject of labour. An idle faith, an idle self-sacrifice, did not satisfy Christ. To serve God is the soul's great aim, and at the same time its salvation (cf. parables of the Talents, Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>; the Pounds, Lk 19<sup>11-27</sup>; the Servants Watching, Lk 12<sup>36-48</sup>; the Ten Virgins, Mt 25<sup>1-15</sup>; the Labourers in the Vineyard, Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup>). From all these it is clear that the reward is in no sense proportionate to the work done, but to the zeal and fidelity shown; and further, that the reward is the labour itself, and grows out of it. It is true that life eternal is the grand reward, but in that life he is already a sharer who makes God's service his aim in this world. The complete perfection of the self comes only when sin has passed away with mortal life; but there will be no gap between this world and the next. To serve God hereafter will be the heavenly joy of the redeemed, just as it is their chief joy on earth. Heaven is not idleness, but holy service rendered in perfect freedom from the constraints of sin. It is thus manifest that there is not the slightest ground for bringing against Christianity the charge of inculcating a higher form of selfishness; for selfishness implies an opposition between the self and the not-self—that the well-being of the former is sought at the cost of the latter, whereas in the religion of Jesus there is no such opposition. The good of the self is itself the good of the world, the fulfilment of the will of God; and even the reward is nothing other than the enlargement of the human powers so that the man becomes capable of yet greater labour for the world's welfare. Selfishness is hurtful alike to self and to mankind. Spiritual self-love is the self's completion, God's glory and the world's joy. By faithfulness in the unrighteous mammon, in that which is another's, we receive that which is our own (Lk 16<sup>10-12</sup>).

SELF-RESTRAINT.—See SELF-CONTROL.

SELF-SUPPRESSION.—Religion may be thought of as having for its aim either the complete suppression or the development to its highest expression of the individuality of man. In the history of Christianity both these conceptions have been adopted, and each has been regarded as the true interpretation of the spirit of the Lord.

Those Christian teachers whose bent is towards Mysticism have for their ideal the ultimate suppression of self. The elevated expression which their doctrine found in the German mystics of the 14th cent. gives us the clearest view of this tendency. Eckart, and afterwards Tauler, taught that the spiritual life was at its highest when self was annihilated. The complete suppression of self was attempted in a wholly different spirit by certain societies of late origin, notably by the Society of Jesus. In the Jesuit system the individual is completely subordinated to the community, and the suppression of each man's self is of vital necessity for the accomplishment of perfect discipline. The tendency of Protestantism, on the other hand, has been towards the development of individuality. Its teachers have aimed at allowing free play to natural diversities of character, and have even justified the accentuation of the various ways in which men differently constituted have apprehended the gospel message.

Our Lord, in His dealings with men, seems always to have assumed that natural varieties of character and the varied environment of each individual required differences of treatment. His advice changes according to the temperament and circumstances of those to whom it was given. A leper, after his healing, is bidden to 'tell no man' what was done for him (Mt 84). Other lepers are told to go and show themselves to the priests and make the offerings commanded in the Law (Lk 1714). One who wished to follow Him but desired first to bury his father, receives the stern word—'Let the dead bury their dead' (Mt 822). A restored demoniac, anxious 'to be with him,' is told to go home to his friends (Mk 519). One rich man is commanded to sell all that he has (Mt 1921). Others are allowed to continue in possession of the whole or part of their property (Lk 198, Mt 2767). To a certain hard saying the Lord appends the caution, 'He that is able to receive it, let him receive it (Mt 1911). These and other sayings which might be quoted display our Lord's evident desire to develop rather than annihilate individuality. In the training of the Twelve, who were to carry on His work after the Ascension, He aims not at creating a spirit of unquestioning obedience to plain commands, but rather at developing a highly intelligent and spiritually energetic kind of character. We are necessarily ignorant of much that passed between Him and them especially during those forty days when He spoke to them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God' (Ac 12), but we know enough to feel sure that He wished the Twelve to work for His cause with a certain independence and personal responsibility, rather than to suppress in them personal freedom of intellect and will. SEMBIN. - A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3º AV Semei).

ESPARATION. -In discourses descriptive of the present condition and future prospects of the Kingdom of God, Christ taught that the Kingdom in its ideal state of purity would not be realized till the end of the world, when the object in view is to be attained by means of a judicial separation be-tween real members and those who are members only in outward appearance or profession (Mt 13<sup>nd-m, m-qa,</sup> or any). In opposition to prevailing ideas on the subject, Christ plainly indicated that the Kingdom of God, throughout the course of its earthly development, must contain conflicting elements of good and evil, and gravely deprecated any premature attempt at separating them. The intermixture foreshadowed was not a pure kingdom existing amid a corrupt environment, but a kingdom itself invaded and pervaded to some extent by a corrupt element.

We not maintains that Christ rids not 'contemplate an outward separation of the describes from the fellowship of the braschitch nation and religion (Teaching, it 351f.) and that the parables of the Taires and the Brag Net were intended to gracel against any attempt in that direction. But the exit element referred to in the parables is not that who has always existed in the world, and it wis be expected to continue, but that who has entered the langitum in the source of, and as the result of, its own operations, which tend to gather within its pale sparnous and herenits as well as geruine (Mi 1967). A separation, moreover, from the Jewish Charol, as Christ must have foreseen, was miniment and these table if for no other reason, because the splitt and aims of the selects founded to Him were so widely different (Mi 1968), and it is clearly implied in the amounton ment of the approaching downfail of the Jewish State (Lk 1988).

Serious of jection is ustalso be taken to the view, which has

ment of the approaching downfall of the Jewish State (Lis 1948).

Setions of jection is not also be taken to the view, which has often been advicated, in the 1 terests of a pure Church, since the located or trovers in the beginning of the life cent that the erd element is in the world, the grout element in the Kingdom, and the blending of the two merels contiguity or co-existence in space. It is hard to see why our Lord should have been at such james to point out what must be perfectly obvious to everybody, that the world is evil, and why the should have been at such james to point out what must be perfectly obvious to everybody, that the world is evil, and why the should have been at such james to point out what must be perfectly obvious to everybody, that the world is even for the sum of the perfect of the part of the paint of the condition of things had long rested, and was only what must be expected. It could by no possibility give rue to the paint of reference of the circumstance that the sin which exists in the world had been required from the circumstance and the circle in which exists in the world has always free ng the way ance wind the circle in which exists in the world has been and unwelcome addition. The winginess of the field originally mown with good seed is found afterwards to contain large—an alien and unwelcome addition—and their impatent and to begin at one the work of prinfession is, in the originally mown with good seed is found afterwards to contain large—an alien and unwelcome addition—and their impatent and to begin at one the work of prinfession is, in the originally mown with good seed is found afterwards to remark that if the Son of Man at the end of the world is to 'gather out of this kingdom all things that effect (races a amessakel), and their which do inliquity, they must have existed previously within it (MI 134).

The contrast is obviously between the milized state of affairs now prevailing, and the Kingdom as It shall be, when, freed from all admixture, it shims forth in its pure native instre (Mt. 1349). Meanwhile the disciples are directed to screeces a which might result in injuries still more serious to the cause they have at heart (Mt. 1349). Their attitude of tolerance is by no means to be taken, however, as implying macrino or approval of existing shuess. Christ freely admixted that the presence and conduct of unworthy members were inconsistent with the Dvine ideal of the hingdom, and could not but prove injurious to its heat internals (Mt. 137-20). But the possibility of admixture was unavoidable, in view of the fact that the livine Kingdom welcomed all without distinction, on their professed compliance with the conditions of admission to its membership. The wide and sweeping character of its operations exposed it to the risk of gathering into its braunt souse who might do it serious discredit in the eyes of those who had its purity and welfare at heart, as well as of the world a large (Mt. 1349). It would be a mistake to suppose that Christ meant to withhold from His disciples authority to exercise discipline in the case of grave offences against the larm of the Kingdom, discipline which they did, in point of fact, afterwards ever me (Ac 250-21, 10-15-2), but which had for its object the edification, and not the destruction, of believers (2 Co 149). The infection of censures or punishment in the case of grows offences against the larm of the Ringdom, discipline which they did, in point of fact, afterwards ever me (Ac 250-21, 10-15-2), but which had for its object the edification, and not the destruction for the risk object the edification, and the resectoration to these in view. What our leaders were instanced to have a healing effect, and instead of atming at permanent we know the risk of the final Judgment by the absolute separation of offenders from religious fellowship; as paration is substance, in the case of mere had any attempt to forestall the Final Judgment by the absolute separation of offenders from religious fellowship

While the disciples are enjoined to preserve an attitude of patient endurance toward evil within the Kingdom, Christ held out to them the prospect of a day of final sifting in which it would be com-pletely eliminated (Mt 13<sup>26</sup> *). The period of interiningling is at last to come to an end. The great separation to be then effected between the two elements so long opposed, has primarily in view the interest of an ideal purity, for which all earnest ones have anxiously hoped and striven. The burning of the tares does not refer so much to the fate which ultimately overtakes evildoers, as to the fact that they can no longer exert a depressing effect on the fortunes of the Kingdom - Hitherto they have existed as an obscuring medium, but with the removal of the scandals and their authors (v 4) the character of the righteous at last appears, without shadow of eclipse, in all its unsulfied purity and splendour (v. 43). The sifting out of unworthy members results in irreparable loss, at the same time leading, as it does, to their permanent exclusion from heavenly privileges (24<sup>so</sup> 25<sup>lll. 20</sup>). The grounds of separation are quite general, consisting in broad fundamental distinctions of moral character, not clearly apparent at the outset, but becoming incrossingly manifest as time goes on (132), so that at last a division into two classes, the righteous and the wicked, becomes inevitable (vv. 41. 43. 49). Elsewhere the twofold classification is made to turn on characteristics of a more specific kind, such as confession or denial of Christ in times of peril (10 mm.), faithful or unfaithful exercise of stewardship (24 " "), diligence and fidelity in the use of entrusted gifts, or failure to improve them due to unbelief and indolence (25° 22 24°). Profession without practice (7° 21-22), selfish ambition (18<sup>2, 3</sup>), an unforgiving disposition (v. 3d.), mark men out for exclusion from the perfected Kingdom; while childlike humility (v. 3), lowly acts of service (Lk 22<sup>24-26</sup>), preparedness for all kinds of sacrince up to that of life itself (Mt 16<sup>25-27</sup> (19<sup>27-26</sup>), are sure passports to participation in its benefits. SEPTUAGINT. The Version 'according to the Seventy.' 1. This name for the Greek translation of the OT has its origin in the legend that Ptolemy II. Philadelphus was advised by his librarian Demetrius Phalcreus to procure from Jerusalem copies of the Hebrew Scriptures, and men learned in the Hebrew and Greek languages to translate them. Ptolemy accordingly sent ambassadors to Eleazar the high priest, who sent back to Alexandria seventy-two elders, six from each tribe, with magnificent copies of the Hebrew Scriptures. They were treated with the highest honour; they were assigned a quiet and conveni-ent building on the island of Pharos, removed from the distractions of the city; and there, in seventy-two days, they translated the Hebrew Bible into Greek, for the enrichment of Ptolemy's library; and the translation was received with delight by king and people.

thin legend is related in a pseudonymous letter purporting to be written by Aristeas (an Alexandrian, and one of Ptolemy a ambassadors to Jerussien) to his brother Philocrates. The text, edited by St. J. Thackers, is printed at the end of Sweles. Interediction to the OT is Greek, and a translation by Mr. Thackersy appeared in the JQR, April 1903. Other truns of the tradition are given by the Alexandrian writers Aristobulus and Phub, and by Josephine. And the early Pathern of the Christian Church from the 2nd century onwards received the story without suspicion, and amplified it. What amount of truth underlies the legend it is difficult to decide, but the following facts are probable: (1) that the translation was begun at Alexandria; (2) that it was not undertaken officially, by order of the king (though he probable encouraged it), but resulted from the needs of the Alexandrian Jews, who knew no Hebrew and probably little or no Aramas. (3) it mus be true that Hebrew rolls were brought from Jerussien, (4) the translation was, as might be expected, cordully received by Hellenistic Jews, who would be glad to have a Greek account of the origins of the Hebrew people.

The Alexandrian version embraced only the Pentateuch; and the letter of Aristeas professes no more. Josephus and Jerome recognized this, but Christian writers, generally, failed to notice the limitation. It could not, indeed, have embraced more in the reign of Ptolemy II., for the Torah alone was complete by that time, secure in its position as a collection of sacred books and ready for translation (Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 113). But other books would be translated from rime to time when they reached Egypt with Paleatinian recognition of their canonicity. And before the Christian era Alexandria probably pos-sessed the whole of the Hebrew Bible in a Greek translation, with the possible exception of Ec-

2. The importance of the LXX version to the student of Hebrew literature and philology can scarcely be overestimated (see Swete, Introduction, Pt. iii. c. 4). And it is hardly less essential to the student of early Christian writings. Patristic writers for the most part accepted it not merely as the best version of the Hebrew OT, but as no less inspired than the original. Even Augmstine could say. 'Spiritus qui in prophetis erat quando illa dixerunt, idem 1988 erat in LNX viris quando illa interpretati sunt' (de Cir. Dei, xvii. 43). Being entirely dependent on it, and unable to appeal to or form comparisons with any other version, they adopted without suspicion and with tenacity its least defensible renderings, and pressed them into the service of controversy, dogma, and devotion. 'It was argued that the errors of the Greek text were due to accidents of transmission, or that they were not actual errors, but Divine adaptations of the original to the use of the future Church (Swete, Pt. 16, c. 5).

But the present article is concerned with that which is the chiafest importance of the LXX-its relation to (a) the beginnings and the growth of

relation to (a) the beginnings and the growth of Christianity, (b) the expression of Christian doctrines and ideas.

(a) The L.X. was an important factor in preparing the way for the reception of the Christian religion. In our Lord's time the Jews were scattered throughout the known world. And though they preserved their religious connexion with Jerusalem by payments of money and by frequent attendance at the three annual festivals (see art. Dispersion), yet one and all had lost the know-ledge of the classical Hebrew of the Scriptures, with the exception of the learned-the priests and Rabbis of whom the original language of the OT was almost the exclusive property. It may be realized, therefore, what a blessing was conferred upon the Jewish race by Alexandria when she gave them their own Scriptures in the universal language of the day. They were provided with a valuable confroversial weapon, whereby they could be the statement of their leastless of the real limits of their leastless of the real limits. prove to their heathen neighbours the real importance and the hoary antiquity of the Hebrew nation. An army of apologists was raised up, of whom Josephus and Philo are, for us, the chief, because so much of their work is extant; but they must have been well-nigh equalled in weight and influence by such writers as the historians Alexander Cornelius ('Polyhistor'), Demetrius, Eupo-lemus, Artapanus, and Aristeas, the poets Philo, Theodotus, and Ezekiel, the philosopher Aristo-bulus, and Cleodemus or Malchas, small fragments of whose writings are preserved in Clem. Alex. Stromatcis, i. 22, 141, 153 ff., and Euseb. Prep. Eving. viii. 10, ix. 6, 17-34, 37, 39, xiii. 12. But though she knew it not Alexandria prothough she knew it not, Alexandria provided them with something greater. Christianity, by the power of God and by the coming of Christ, sprang out of Judaism 'Novum Testamentum in Vetere latet; Vetus in Novo patet '(Aug.). By enabling Jews and Gentiles to read the OT Scriptures, the Greek version, in spite of all its mistakes and grotesque mistranslations, revealed the guiding providence of God in Hebrew history, and the gradual development of religious ideas of which the OT is the record; and above all it gave a lasting impetus to the growth of Messianic expecta-tions. A train was laid which only needed the Divine spark to burst into flame. Christ came 'to send fire upon the earth,' and the LXX had been instrumental in supplying fuel.

The quotations from the OT in the NT are seldom mere literary adornments, such as a modern writer might introduce from Shakespeare or other classical authors; they are for the most part used as a definite foundation for Christian teaching, or at least weighty illustrations of the writers statements and arguments. Our Lord's teaching atruck His hearers with amazement, because it did not blindly follow the footsteps of the scribes. Against the Jews He used their own Scriptures with conclusive force; and with His loving but fainthearted and ignorant disciples He adopted the same course; beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself (Lk 247). tures the things concerning himself (l.k 24st). And His disciples afterwards followed His example both in their speeches and in their writings (Ac 82).

(b) The LXX played a large part in the moulding of Christian terminology. It is difficult to gauge the extent to which religious conceptions were affected by the results which ensued from the wedding of the Greek language to Hebrew thought. Their offspring the LXX was the parent of a yet nobler heir. There are few more interesting lines of study than to trace the debt which Christianity owed to the LXX in the matter of words and terms, and to see how the borrowed terminology was con-secreted and adapted to higher mess.

3. The LXX must now be studied in two aspects, so far as it affected the four Gospels and the Apostolic conceptions of Christ's Person and work.

(i.) As regards the matter and purpose of these quotations, it is noticeable that of the 46 in the Synoptic Gospels 17 (marked with *) are 'Messianic,' i.e. they are quoted as being predictions of facts connected with the life and work of Christ; and of these, 6 (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 22<sup>44</sup> 26<sup>31</sup> 27.4°, Lk 4<sup>181</sup>. 22.27) are cited by our Lord Himself. With these may be reckoned Mt 22.23°, quoted as a proof of the resurrection of the dead. 6 (Mt 2<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>141</sup>. 15.81. 21<sup>13</sup>. 18 24<sup>13</sup>) are quoted as predictions which have found—or, in the last passage, will find—fulfilment in the lives and characters of persons other than Christ, all except the first occurring in His own discourses. 19 of the remainder are quoted by our Lord (except Mk 12.21°), and consist of legal and moral precepts, mostly from the Pentateuch, which should guide men's actions (with the exception of those in Mt 5, which He quotes in order to contrast with them His own higher moral law). 3 which come under none of these heads are Lk 22°, Mt 48° 2224. Of the 13 in the Fourth Gospel, 7 (marked with *) are 'Messianic,' all being quoted by the writer (except  $15^{25}$ , which is by our Lord). In the rest of the NT, 'Messianic' quotations occur chiefly in the Apostolic speeches in the Acts ( $2^{17-21.20-28.241}$ ,  $3^{221.}$  ( $=7^{27}$ )  $2^{25}$   $4^{251.}$   $8^{521.}$   $13^{23.}$   $3^{4.}$   $3^{5}$ ), and in Hebrews ( $1^{5}$  ( $=5^{5}$ )  $6^{5.}$   $8^{1.}$   $10^{-12.}$   $1^{3}$   $9^{6-8.}$   $1^{2.}$   $1^{3}$   $5^{5}$  ( $=7^{17.}$   $2^{1}$ )  $9^{20}$   $10^{5-9}$ ). In the other Epistles see Ro  $9^{33}$   $10^{11}$   $15^{3}$ , 1 Co  $15^{45}$ , Gal  $3^{13}$ , Eph  $4^{8}$ , 1 P  $2^{8}$ .

(ii.) As regards the form of the quotations, the dependence upon the LXX shown by the NT

(ii.) As regards the form of the quotations, the dependence upon the LXX shown by the NT writers may be seen by the following facts, which are summarized from Swete's Introduction, pp. 391-398.

Every part of the NT affords evidence of a knowledge of the LXX, and a great majority of the passages cited from the OT are in general agreement with the Greek version. In the Synoptic Gospels there is a marked contrast between (a) quotations belonging to the common narrative or to the sayings reported by all three or by two of them, and (β) quotations which are peculiar to one of them. (a) The former (with the exception of Mt 15<sup>81</sup>. 26<sup>31</sup>) adhere closely to LXX. (β) Of the 16 in Mt. which are not found in Mk. or Lk., 4 (5<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>141</sup>. 21<sup>16</sup>) are in the words of the LXX with slight variants; 4 exhibit important variants; and the remaining 7 bear little or no resemblance to the Alexandrian Greek. Neither Mk. nor Lk. has any series of independent quotations; Mk 9<sup>48</sup> 12<sup>82</sup> are from the LXX, but show affinities to the text of A; Lk 4<sup>181</sup>. differs from the LXX in important particulars.

The causes which have produced variation are manifold: (1) loose citation, (2) the substitution of a gloss for the precise words which the writer professes to quote, (3) a desire to adapt a prophetic context to the circumstances under which it was thought to have been fulfilled, (4) the fusing together of passages from different contexts. Further, (5) some variations are recensional. The Evangelists appear to have employed a recension of the LXX which came nearer to the text of A than to that of our oldest uncial B. In some cases it may be argued that the text of the LXX MSS was influenced by the NT; but this objection is greatly minimized by the fact that Josephus, and to a less extent Philo, show the same tendency. And there are occasional signs that NT writers used a recension to which the version of the later translator Theodotion shows some affinities. (6) Some variations are translational, and imply an independent use of the original, whether by the Evangelist or by the author of some collection of excerpts which he employed. Prof. Swete (pp. 396 ff.) prints in full, and annotates, five of these passages from Mt (26 4 126. 817 1339 2796.), together with the corresponding passages in the LXX; and he comes to the conclusion that while 'the compiler of the First Gospel has more or less distinctly thrown off the yoke of the Alexandrian version, and substituted for it a paraphrase, or an independent rendering of the Hebrew,' 'our evidence does not encourage the belief that the Evangelist used or knew another complete Greek version of the OT or of any particular book.'

The writer of the Fourth Gospel quotes from the LXX, with varying degrees of exactness. The citations in  $2^{17}$   $10^{24}$   $12^{28}$   $19^{24}$ ,  $2^{36}$  are verbatim or nearly so; those in  $6^{31}$ ,  $6^{31}$   $15^{12}$  are freer; in  $1^{22}$   $12^{15}$ ,  $4^{9}$  he paraphrased loosely, with a general reminiscence of the LXX wording; in  $19^{37}$ , δψονται είς δν εξεκέντησαν is a non-Septuagintal rendering of Zec  $12^{19}$ , which was perhaps current in Palestine, since είς δν εξεκέντησαν appears also in Theod. (Aq. εξεκέντησαν, cf. Rev  $1^7$ ; Symm. επεξεκέντησαν).

The quotations in the Acts are exclusively from the LXX, but sometimes they are inclined to be free and paraphrastic.

In St. Paul's quotations the same phenomena appear: the majority are verbally exact, but many contain important variants; sometimes the Apostle appears to quote from memory; in some cases he freely conflates two or more passages. In Hebrews, in which the argument is carried on largely by a catena of quotations from the LXX, 'the text of the quotations agrees in the main with some form of the present text of the LXX' (Westcott, Hebrews, p. 476). On 1 P 2s see Hort, St. Peter, in loc.

In this short summary of Prof. Swete's results enough has been said to show the large extent to which the Alexandrian Greek version influenced the direct quotations made by the NT writers. But direct citation formed only a fraction of the im-mense use which they made of the LXX. Their writings, and the utterances of our Lord, abound in expressions and phrases from the LXX which in expressions and phrases from the LXX which are not formal quotations, but which were due to their intimate knowledge of the OT. These are conveniently marked by uncial type in WH's text of the NT. In many cases the force and meaning of the NT passage are multiplied when the OT context is taken into consideration. [N.B.—There are no quotations from the Apocryphal books which were included in the Greek Bible. There are, however, in the Epistles some half-dozen reminiscences; see Wis 7<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>7</sup>, Sir 5<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>24</sup>

B. Borrowed terminology.—It must not be forgotten that the LXX was but a very small part of a large Greek literature whose ideas and vocabulary and grammar differed materially from those of the old classical writers. New philosophical and theological conceptions, changes political and social, developments in the arts of life, increased opportunities of intercourse with foreign nations, all combined to alter the language. The round or Ελληνική διάλεκτος 'was based on Attic Greek, but embraced elements drawn from all Hellenic dialects. It was the literary language of the cosmopolitan Hellas created by the genius of Alexander' (Swete, Intr. p. 294). 'The language used by the writers of the Greek Diaspora may be regarded as a subsection of an early stage of the κουτή' (ib.), and of this subsection the LXX and the NT are the best representatives in Egypt and Palestine respectively. Though a change began to appear as early as Xenophon, the era of the rourh may be said to have opened in the latter half of the 4th cent. B.C.; and its golden age extends from c. B.C. 145 (Polybius) to c. A.D. 160 (Pausanias). The NT vocabulary, then, was derived not only from the LXX but from the current language of the day. See the Appendix in Grimm-Thayer's Gr.-Eng. Lexicon of the NT (pp. 691-696), in which collected a large number of non classical marks collected a large number of non-classical words which find parallels in Greek writings (including LXX) from B.C. 322 to A.D. 100.

For our present purpose, however, a supreme interest attaches to the NT words which, though found in classical Greek, have acquired a new moral or theological meaning. Many words as used in the NT are exclusively Christian, and their special significance is not derived from any literary source (e.g. ανακεφαλαιούμαι, αντίτυπον, αντίχριστος, δύναμις (miracle), πρωτότοκος, σταυρός — όω, χάρις). (miracie), πρωτοτοκος, σταυρος — δω, χάρις). But many others have gained, or at least advanced towards, their new meaning by contact with Hebrew thought. The following are among the more important, and will repay careful investigation with the help of Thayer's Lexicon and the NT commentaries. The short notes here attached to each word are not intended to be in any way exhaustive of their meanings or applications, but may be helpful in suggesting lines for study. Words which do not occur in classical Greek are marked with *.

άγγελος. Classical meaning 'messenger.' Early

Heb. thought conceived of the 'Angel of Jahweh' as a visible or active manifestation of Himself, Gn 22<sup>11</sup>, Ex 3<sup>2</sup>, Mt 1<sup>20</sup>, Lk 2<sup>9</sup>. But the more developed angelology of later times is reflected in the MT, e.g. the names of two great angels appear—Michael (Dn 10<sup>12, 21</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>, Jude , Rev 12<sup>2</sup>) and Gabriel (Dn 8<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>, Lk 1<sup>18, 26</sup>). See also Mt 18<sup>10</sup>.

Gabriel (Dn 8<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>, Lk 1<sup>18, 28</sup>). See also Mt 18<sup>10</sup>. åγιος. Class. 'sacred (to a god)'; 'holy.' Note two special uses: (a) of ἀγιο, the ideal body of consecrated people, Dn 7<sup>18, 28</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>27</sup> (<sup>89</sup>); freq. in St. Paul's writings of Christians. Not in Gospp., but see Jn 17<sup>14-19</sup>. (b) τὰ ἀγια, the holiest part of the Tent; in NT typical of Heaven where Christ our High Priest intersected for us H. 2 1.2

High Priest intercedes for us, He 9. 10.

race, Dt 18<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>8</sup>. Hence in NT a fellow-Christian, Mt 23<sup>8</sup> and freq. in Acts and Epistles.

alμa. Class. 'blood'; 'bloodshed'; always emphasizes the fact of death. In the Jewish sacrificial system the blood is the life, Gn 9<sup>4</sup>, Lv 17<sup>11.14</sup>, Dt 12<sup>25</sup>. On the Christian use of this thought see Westcott, Add. note on 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> and on He 9<sup>13</sup>.

aláw. Class. 'human life-time'; 'eternity.'

Δποκαλύπτειν (*ἀτοκάλυψις). Class. 'reveal.' In LXX and NT freq. Divine revelation of things which man of himself could not know.

Δπολυτρόω (*-τρωσις). Class. 'release on payἀπολυτρόω (*-τρωσις). Class. 'release on payment of ransom.' In the OT the word is applied (with little or no idea of ransom) to the action of God for His people, in delivering them (אוז סד חדש) from trouble or death. This, with the thought of ransom partially restored, appeared in the NT as the Christian 'redemption' from sin. See Westcott, Hebrews, pp. 295 ff.

**Appers.** Class. 'a setting free' (of a captive);

'discharge' (from the obligations of a bond). In

LXX mostly the periodical 'release' of Hebrew slaves. But the Messianic interpretation of such passages as Is 61¹ (cf. Lk 4¹s) was a step towards the NT meaning of 'release from the chain and the guilt of sin.' In Is 22¹⁴ ἀφεθήσεται is used in connexion with ἀμαρτία. See Mt 26²s, Mk 1⁴ 3²s, Lk 177 33 2447.

βαπτίομαι. Class. metaph. 'to be soaked' (with wine); 'to be drowned' (with questions). LXX 2 (4) K 5<sup>14</sup> uses the word in connexion with miraculous cleansing; Sir 34 (31)<sup>30</sup> with cleansing from ceremonial pollution. Both are partial types of Christian baptism.

βεβαιόω. Class. 'confirm' (a statement); 'secure' (a person in one's own interests). In LXX Ps 41 (40)<sup>13</sup> 119 (118)<sup>25</sup> the word is used of God establishing or strengthening man. Hence in NT of Jesus Christ strengthening the soul and character, 1 Co 18.

δαιμόνιον. Class. 'deity'; 'divinity'; also an inferior divine being, 'between divine and mortal' (Plat. Symp.). It needed the OT monotheism to Condemn the thought of divine beings other than Jehovah, Dt 32<sup>17</sup> Ps 96 (95)<sup>8</sup>. Hence in NT 'evil spirit.' [δαίμων (Mt 8<sup>31</sup>), which is very similar, is not found in the LXX ? Is 65<sup>11</sup>].

διάβολος. Class. of one who accuses maliciously or slanderously. LXX (= ין סון 'an adversary,' used of a superhuman agent of evil, Job 16.7 etc., Zec 3<sup>1, 2</sup>, 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup>. Hence in NT 'the devil,' used by every NT writer except St. Mark.

δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, etc. Class. mainly 'just,' See Sanday-Headlam, Add. note on Ro 'The word diracos and its compounds.'

אלפ, אור word olactor and its compounds.

אלפה, אין אלפה אלפה Class. 'opinion'; 'credit' or 'renown.' LXX Ex 2417 al. (בינים), New Heb.

אין אין the 'glory' of God, the visible manifestation of His presence. Hence in NT (a) the manifestation of God's character, Jn 114, (b) the spiritual participation of it by men, Jn 1722. See 2 Co 37-18.

έθνος (* έθνικός). Class. 'nation.' LXX, NT of nations other than the chosen people; 'Gentiles.'

«τδωλον. Class. 'phantom'; 'reflected image';
'fancy.' LXX, NT' the image of a god'; 'idol.'

ἐκκλησία. Class. 'assembly' of citizens. LXX (= ὑηρ) an assembly of Israelites, the chosen people. Hence in NT the body of Christians spiritually called out from the rest of mankind by God; 'the Church.

ἐπισκοπέω, πος (*-πή). Class vb. 'inspect,' 'examine,' 'visit'; subst. 'overseer,' 'guardian.' The use of the words in the LXX (esp. ἐπισκοπή) of the action of God, either for help or punishment, gave rise to the spiritual force acquired in the NT, Lk 19<sup>44</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12, 25</sup>.

cύσγγελίζομαι (*-ζω), εύαγγελιον. Class. vb. 'bring good tidings'; subst. 'reward for good tidings.' In the OT such Messianic passages as Is 40° al. led to the Christian use of the terms. [Sing. εὐαγγέλιον not in LXX, which always has plur.].

colories, -(a. Class. 'praise.' (a) LXX (= ¬) 'bless'; and so in NT of the action of either God or man. (b) 'Consecrate with prayer,' 18 913, Lk  $9^{16}$ , 1 Co  $10^{16}$ . (c)  $\epsilon i \lambda \alpha \gamma l a$  is a concrete blessing or benefit, Dt  $11^{26}$  al., Eph  $1^3$ , He  $12^{17}$  al. (not in Gospp.).

Lon. Class. 'life'; 'existence.' In the LXX In the LXX

(=0.77) it is fred, used of a happy fife, blessed by God. Hence in NT of spiritual life (Jn 524) gained by union with Christ, the source and principle of life (Jn 10<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>). ξωογονίω, ξωοποιίω. Class. 'breed animals, or germs.' LXX 'give life to,' Neh 9<sup>6</sup>; 'preserve alive,' Ex 1<sup>17</sup>, Ps 71 (70)<sup>20</sup>. Hence in NT 'endue with spiritual life,' Jn 6<sup>63</sup>; 'restore to life,' Jn 5<sup>21</sup>

ημέρα. Class. 'day.' In LXX freq. of the 'Day of Jahweh,' a future time of judgment (Am., Is., Zeph. etc.). [Hence in NT of the coming of Christ to judgment, Mt 7<sup>22</sup> αl. (The thought of 'judgment' was so closely attached to the word that St. Paul could use the expression ἀνθρωπίνη τρώσες 1 Co.48) ημέρα, 1 Co 43).

θάνατος. Class. 'death' of the body. From the OT teaching that death is the punishment of sin is derived the NT use of the word for spiritual death, either as a present, unregenerate state (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), or as a future penalty (Wis 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>24</sup>, Ro 132).

\theta\epsilon\delta\varsigma. Class. 'a god.' OT monotheism led to the use of  $\delta$   $\theta\epsilon\delta\varsigma$  for the One God in LXX and NT. (God's representatives are called  $\theta \epsilon o l$ , Ps 82 (81)6, quoted in Jn 10<sup>34</sup>).

* Ιλαστήριον 'the place of propitiation,' 'the mercy-seat.' LXX and He 95. [In Ro 325 masc. adj. of Christ].

adj. of Christ].
κακία. Class. 'badness, depravity'; 'cowardice.' LXX, NT 'evil,' 'trouble,' Am 63, Mt 634.
κατάπαυσιε. Class. 'a putting to rest'; 'a causing to cease.' LXX (= πριχ) 'rest,' 'cessation,' Ps 95 (94)11. NT He 311.18 41.3.5 etc.. κέραε. Class. 'horn.' LXX, NT symbol of strength, 1 S 210, Ps 89 (88)18, Lk 189.
κληρονομέφ, -ία, -οε. Class. 'inherit.' In OT the words are frequently used for the occupation of words are frequently used for the occupation of Canaan by the gift of God. So in NT they are used spiritually for the gaining of the privileges involved in Divine sonship in union with Christ, Mt 55 2584.

Mt 5° 25°.

κλήρος. Class. 'an object used in casting lots.'
LXX 'an allotted portion,' a possession or privilege assigned by God to His people, Wis 5°. NT in Mt 27° ||, Ac 28° ||, Col 1° 2.

κοινόω, -ός. Class 'to make common,' 'to communicate' (opp. tδιοτ). LXX 'to make unhallowed,' 'profane,' 'defile' (= βεβηλόω, -οτ), 4 Mac 7°, 1 Mac 14°. 6°. NT Mt 15° 11. 18. 20, Mk 7°. 5, Ac 10°4. 28.

κόσμος. Class. 'order'; 'ornament'; 'the Universe' (as a system of order). LXX 'the inhabitants of the world,' Wis 2<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>6.14</sup>. NT in Mt 13<sup>26</sup> and frequently. Hence in NT 'the ungodly masses of men,' Jn 7<sup>7</sup> and freq.; also 'things of the world,' 'desires, pleasures,' etc., Mt 16<sup>26</sup> and frequently.

colony, etc.); subst. 'the act of founding.' LXX vb. 'create' (= km), Dt 43, Ps 51 (50)1, Is 457; subst.

Autroupγίω, ·ία. Class. 'render a service to the state at one's own expense.' LXX (vb. n¬v, subst. ¬¬¬¬v, the service of the priests in the Tent and the Temple. So NT Lk 1<sup>28</sup>, He 8<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>. [The classical idea is adopted in 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup> Pb. 8<sup>28</sup> 1 classical idea is adopted in 2 Co 912, Ph 230.]

λυτρόω. Class. 'release on payment of ransom'; 'deliver by payment of ransom.' In LXX of the action of God, 'deliverance' from evils, Dt 13<sup>5</sup>, 2 Sam 7<sup>23</sup>, Ps 49 (48)<sup>9</sup> al. So in NT Lk 24<sup>21</sup> (cf. Ac 7<sup>35</sup>). λύτρου (*λύτρουτε). Class. 'the price paid for ransom.' In LXX λύτρου ψυχῆς (= ¬¬¬¬) 'atonement') Nu 3531, Pr 138, and λύτρωσις coupled with λυτρώσεται έκ πασῶν τῶν ἀνομιῶν αὐτοῦ, Ps 130 (129)71., show that the later writers of the OT were approaching the spiritual use of the words. Hence in NT λυτρόω Tit 2<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>18</sup>, -ρον Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>, -ρωσις He 912

μνστήριον. Class. 'a secret,' a mystery known only to the initiated. LXX 'hidden purpose, or counsel'; of men, To 12<sup>7.11</sup>, Jth 2<sup>2</sup>; of God, Wis 2<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>22</sup>. In NT of God's plan of salvation which was not known until revealed to the Apostles, Mt 13<sup>11</sup> (= Mk 4<sup>11</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>), Ro 11<sup>25</sup> αl.

γόμος. Class. 'usage,' 'custom'; 'law.' LXX 'the Mosaic law.' NT (a) the volume of 'the Law,' Mt 125, or its contents as binding upon Jews, Mt 5<sup>176</sup>; (b) a burdensome and ineffectual system of commands and prohibitions from which Christ has freed us, Ro 3<sup>21</sup> and frequently.

οἰκοδομέω (*-μή). Class. 'build.' LXX metaph. 'grant prosperity to,' Ps 28 (27)<sup>5</sup>, Jer 33 (40)<sup>7</sup>. In NT 'help and prosper spiritually,' 'edify' (this use of the word was rendered easier by the thought of Christians a being the (huilding 'and (troughe)'). of Christians as being the 'building' and 'temple' of God, Ac  $20^{32} al$ .).

δνομα. Class. 'name'; 'fame'; 'pretext.' LXX, all that a person's name implies, his personality and attributes, 1 K 21 (3 K 20)<sup>8</sup>, Ca 1<sup>3</sup>. Very freq. of the Name of God. So in NT, of men Mt 10<sup>41</sup>, Jn 5<sup>436</sup>; of God Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Jn 12<sup>28</sup>, and frequently.

ούρανός. Class. 'heaven,' 'sky.' LXX, a periphrasis used by late Jews for the Divine Name (Dn 4<sup>2α</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>181</sup> and freq.). NT in Lk 15<sup>18, 21</sup> (see Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr. 217-220,

and 91 ff.).

**\pi\( \text{mais.} \) Class. 'child'; 'slave.' In LXX the word acquired a special force as representing a 'servant of Jehovah'; of men, Ps 113 (112)', Wis 213 al.; of the Messianic Figure in Is 41. 42 etc. So in NT of men who devoutly serve God, Lk 154. 62; of the Messiah, Mt 1218, Ac 315. 25 477. 25.

**\pi\( \text{map\delta}\) Elements. Class. 'park,' 'pleasure-garden.' From the story of the garden of Eden (Gn 2. 3) the word came to be used figuratively in the OT for word came to be used figuratively in the OT for Divinely given peace and prosperity, Ezk 28<sup>13</sup>. In Jewish apocryphal writings it acquired the meaning of an upper region in the 'third heaven'; cf. 2 Co 12<sup>2-4</sup>. Hence it was used of the abode of the pious after death, Lk 23<sup>23</sup>, Rev 27.

pions after death, LK 23°, Rev 2'.

\*\*exposite\* (\*- $a\sigma\mu bs$ ). Class. 'test,' 'try.' LXX (=  $\pi p_3$ ) (a) of men trying God, Ex 17², Dt 6¹6, Is 7¹2; (b) of God testing men, Gn 22¹. So in NT (a) Mt 4², Ac 16¹0; (b) 1 Co 10°. Hence freq. of 'temptation' by the Drail's

(a) to Got esting men, General men, and the classical and the Biblical use is that in the classical and the Biblical use is that in the spiritual. (See Hatch, Hibbert Lectures 1888, Eect. xi., and Essays in Biblical Greek, pp. 83–87; Sanday-Headlam on Ro 117, 'The meaning of Sanday-Headlam on Ro 117, 'The meaning of Faith').

πνεῦμα. Class. 'wind,' 'air'; 'spirit,' the life principle of all created things; also 'inspiration,' principle of all created things; also 'inspiration,' 'afflatus'; later 'the all-pervading Soul' of the Stoics. In the OT a moral force is added to the word, a power derived from God, Ps 51 (50)<sup>12, 18</sup>, Job 32<sup>8</sup>, Is 48<sup>16</sup> 61<sup>1</sup>. Hence in NT (a) the 'spirit' of man, the highest part of his trichotomy; (b) the Holy Spirit.

προφήτης, -τεύω (*-τεία). Class. interpret an oracle, foretell. In LXX and NT the words gain a higher meaning than that of interpreting the frenzied utterances of a papers. A 'prophet' is one inspired with a Divine intuition to declare God's will both in historical events and in things spiritual.

φῶς, φωτίζω (*-τυμός). Class. subst. 'light'; vb. 'shine,' 'give light.' In LXX the subst. acquires a moral force (opp. σκότος). Ps 27 (26)<sup>1</sup> 119 (118)<sup>105</sup>.

Is  $5^{20}$  and freq.; and the vb. is used transitively to teach, Ps 119 (118)<sup>130</sup>, Sir  $45^{17}$ . Hence both in NT freq. of spiritual enlightenment and freedom.

xépus. Class. 'kind feeling'; 'a kindness done';
'gratitude' and 'thanks'; 'enjoyment.' In LXX
(=|n|) freq. in the expression 'find favour before God.' In NT this kindness of God becomes a twofold theological conception: (a) the undeserved kindness by which man is saved from  $\sin$ , (b) the state of heart kept alive by the Holy Spirit in one who has received God's grace.

xpurt's. Class. 'to be rubbed on,' 'used as ointment.' LXX 'a person who is anointed' ointment.' LXX 'a person who is anointed — king, priest, or prophet—for 1700. Hence the Messianic conception which gave rise to the NT title ὁ χριστός.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT.—Professor Votaw's learned and exhaustive article in the Extra Vol. of Hastings' DB is a mine of information and critical study, to which the reader is referred for a full treatment of questions concerning the Sermon on the Mount that must here be treated more briefly.

1. Sources.—The contents of Mt 5. 6. 7 are commonly regarded as constituting one discourse, with the title 'The Sermon on the Mount,' on account of the introductory statement in 5<sup>1</sup>. Some portions of the contents of these chapters reappear, with more or less difference of form, introduced in a somewhat similar way, in Lk 6. Other say-ings of Jesus contained in the three chapters of Mt. are found scattered over the narrative in Lk., and a few are in Mk.; two are duplicated in Mt., and one is duplicated in Lk. The following is the Synoptic distribution of the Sermon:

53.4.6		620b. 21
511. 12		622. 23
518	950	1434. 35

A comparison of these columns will bring out certain clear results, viz. :

(1) Mk. is not the source of any of these sayings. Only four verses or paragraphs of them are in that Gospel at all. Of these four, three are also in Lk. A comparison between the several forms of the three shows (a) that Lk. and Mt. are nearer to one another than either of them is to Mk., and (b) that in the two cases of duplicates in Mt., Mk. is nearer to Mt.'s second renderings of the sayings than to his earlier renderings, which are those of the Sermon on the Mount, showing that if Mt. is dependent on Mk. in either case, it is in the later passages where the sayings are given in another connexion, not in the Sermon. We may account for the duplicates in this way. The first appearance of them is due to the non-Markan source; the second is perhaps derived from Mk.

(2) It is now generally conceded that the main sources of the common elements in the Synoptic Gospels are Mk., and the collection of Logia which Papias says Matthew compiled and wrote in Hebrew, or Aramaic. Further, it is agreed that the Logia must have been translated into Greek, and that it was in a Gr. form that our Evangelists used it. More recently the differences between Mt. and Lk. in their renderings of the same sayings, as well as various other phenomena con-nected with them, have led scholars to the conclusion that (a) there were two or more versions of Matthew's Logia, or (b) that there were other collections of sayings of Jesus besides that made by Matthew (Wendt, Jülicher, Wernle, J. Weiss, Feine, Hawkins, Votaw, Bacon). Probably both of these suggestions must be admitted. Nevertheless, even after admitting this, we may still recognize the probability that the Sermon, as we have it in our First Gospel, is derived from Matthew's Logia; for (a) that Gospel—apart from its opening and closing sections—consists virtually of Mk., split at 5 places, or as some reckon at 7 places, with blocks of Logia wedged in at these openings, the Sermon being the first such insertion; and (3) since our chief collection of the sayings of Jesus is that contained in Mt., since Papias ascribed to the Apostle Matthew the only collection of Logia he is reported to have mentioned, and since the Gospel containing it hears the name of that Apostle in all Patristic references to its origin, there is a strong presumption that the Logia it contains are from Matthew's collection, although this does not forbid us to conclude that the collection may have been used by the Evangelist in a revised form. Nor, of course, does it exclude the suggestions of interpolations, glosses, etc., which can only be considered in detail as they arise in the course of the study of the text. The general conclusion is that as a whole our Sermon on the Mount is derived from Matthews. derived from Matthew's Logia in a Greek version.

2. Integrity.—The question of the integrity of the Sermon must be considered quite apart from that of its genuineness. We may be convinced that the three chapters of Mt. contain only true Logia of Jesus, and yet see reason to think that these Logia were not all spoken on one and the same occasion, in fact, that they do not actually constitute a sermon. (a) The first difficulty arises from the wealth and multiplicity of the utterances. We have here a concise concentration of many most pregnant sayings of Jesus. It is not to be supposed that a popular audience could take in so much at one hearing. But Jesus was welcomed everywhere by simple peasants and the people generally much more than by trained thinkers and the educated classes. Since 'the common people heard him gladly,' His style must have been adjusted to slow-moving minds; but no popular preacher would pack so much into one sermon as we have in Mt.'s three chapters.

(b) The variety of topics treated in the three chapters is inconsistent with the unity of a single discourse. Thus the encouragements to prayer and the warnings against anxiety are alien to the main topic in which the principles of the new order are contrasted with the old laws and customs.

(c) A more important consideration arises from a comparison of the portions of these chapters which reappear in Lk. with the circumstances in connexion with which they are there introduced. A priori it is improbable that any Evangelist would break up a discourse of Christ and scatter its sentences among his narratives, fitting them into the incidents gratuitously. But a study of the circumstances under which these sentences are met with in Lk. inclines us to think that they are in their right place. It will be observed that the Gospel's most full and consecutive rendering of sayings found in St. Matthew 5-7 is in St. Luke 6. Provisionally we may regard this chapter as giving St. Luke's version of the Sermon on the Mount. Let us turn to those sayings of the Mt. chapters that are in other parts of Lk. First we have Mt 5<sup>13</sup> reappearing in Lk 14<sup>24, 25</sup>. This is a warning against degenerating and be-coming as salt that has lost its savour. In Mt. it has no evident connexion with the Beatitudes that it follows; in Lk., however, it occurs in connexion with warnings of the danger of abandoning the following of Christ after having commenced, and serves to clinch those warnings with a final illustration. Moreover, this saying is also in Mk. (950), where it seems to have been introduced by association with another reference to salt in the previous verse. Therefore it would seem to have been a floating logion, which naturally found its way into Mt.'s collection. In Mt. ally found its way into Mt.'s collection. In Mt. the saying about salt losing its savour is followed by that of the lamp under the bushel—a logion which appears in Mk. (4<sup>21</sup>) and twice in Lk. (8<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>28</sup>). None of these passages evinces much connexion with its context. It is to be observed that the second appearance in Lk. is nearer to Mt. than the first, since it has 'the bushel' as the covering article, as also Mk. has, while the first of Lk.'s renderings of it has 'a vessel.' Here again it would awear we have another floating logion. it would appear we have another floating logion. The solemn assurance that the Law cannot fail is not more intelligible in Lk. (16<sup>17. 18</sup>) than in Mt not more intengrible in Lk. (16.49) than in Mt. 518; this, therefore, is rather exceptional.—The next of the Third Evangelist's departures from the order of the Sermon on the Mount in Mt. is Lk 1288. 59 which corresponds to Mt 525. 28. This is the advice to agree quickly with an adversary lest it be too late, and a serious judicial sentence have to be submitted to. In Mt. this follows advice to be reconciled with a brother on grounds of the higher principles of Christ's teaching, which forbid the quarrelsome temper. In Lk. it follows the warnings of the approach of a day of reckoning. In neither place is it inappropriate. Perhaps it was spoken on two occasions. We must always allow for that possibility.—The next three cases are more convincing. Mt. has the Lord's Prayer following warnings against hypochieving property and the control of t following warnings against hypocrisy in prayer, which are associated with other cases of hypocrisy (Mt 61-18). The subject of this whole paragraph is unostentatious sincerity, as opposed to pretentious hypocrisy. In Lk. (11<sup>1-4</sup>) the Lord's Prayer is introhypocrisy. In Lk. (11<sup>-1</sup>) the Lord's Frayer is introduced after Christ's disciples have asked Him to teach them to pray, as John had taught his disciples to pray. Thus it comes appropriately as a model prayer, while in Mt. no form of prayer is immediately required when the subject is privacy in prayer as against public display. Next, the warning against worldly anxiety (Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup>) has no direct connexion with the rest of the Sermon on the Mount. In Lk 12<sup>22-34</sup> it follows the warning against covetousness and the parable of the Rich Fool, which were occasioned by one of the multitude appealing to Jesus to decide a question of inheritance between himself and his brother.—Lastly, the saying about the narrow gate (Mt 7<sup>13</sup> appears in Lk. in reply to the question whether they are few that be saved (Lk 1323-24).

For such reasons it is now generally admitted that the three chapters in Mt. contain sayings of Jesus which were not parts of the original Sermon. This fact, however, does not justify the assertion that Matthew's Sermon on the Mount 'is a composition rather than an actual address' (Moffatt, EBi, vol. iv. col. 4377). While Bacon rules out the matter which is not in Lk 6, and is scattered over other pasts of Lk. he allows that the Samuel Company of the control of the con over other parts of Lk., he allows that the Sermon, apart from such interpolations of alien sayings apart from such interpolations of alien sayings of Jesus, is a connected discourse (The Sermon on the Mount: Its Literary Structure, etc.). Votaw, while admitting some interpolations, vindicates the greater part of Mt.'s rendering of it (loc. cit. pp. 7-9). The fact that we have a block of Logia here inserted in the narrative of Mt. is no proof that make if the terms of the logic that the logi that much, if not all of it, may not belong to a single discourse. Moreover, the descriptive introduction (428-51) indicates an important discourse given on a specific occasion. It is the same with the parallel in Lk 617-20. Then there is a clearly marked unity in those parts of the Sermon in Mt. that remain after the apparently alien matter has been removed, and this is the case with the whole of Lk.'s shorter version. Nor need we cut down the Sermon to the limits of what is contained in Lk., for there was an evident reason for the Third Evangelist's omission of the references to the Pharisees and to Jewish customs which Mt. has preserved, since the former was writing for Gentiles who would not be interested in these matters; while, on the other hand, they are evidently integral to the discourse as this is given in Mt., because they help to bring out the ethical principles of the new order that Christ was introducing by contrast with the old order that He was superseding.

3. Original form.—A comparison of Mt 5-7 with the parallel passages in Lk. (especially with the discourse in Lk 6) raises the question as to which of these two versions of our Lord's utterances is the more original. For, while it has been maintained (by Auger, Greswell, Osiander, Patricius, Plumptre, Sadler, etc.) that we have here reports of sermons given on two occasions, this view is not widely accepted by scholars at the present day.*

It is not to be denied that Jesus may have repeated the same discourse on more than one occasion. But, in the present case, it is to be observed:

(a) Each Evangelist has only one report, neither betraying any knowledge that the Sermon was preached twice. (b) Both Evangelists describe the same circumstances in introducing the Sermon— i.e. the gathering of the multitude, the collecting of disciples, and the connexion of the scene with a mountain (for though in Mt. the Sermon is on the mountain and in Lk. on a level place after Jesus had come down, this is only one of the small discrepancies invariably met with in separate accounts of the same event, and, in fact, it does not involve a direct contradiction even in the details referred to). (c) The character of the Sermon and its position in the life and work of Christ give it a unique value as the presentation of fundamental principles for the guidance of Christ's disciples in their conduct among men. But if we grant that we have here two reports of one and the same discourse the striking differences between them lead course, the striking differences between them lead us to ask, In what form was this discourse actually given? In the first place, it cannot be that either of the two Evangelists simply used and altered materials that he had derived from the other, for on wider grounds it seems to be demonstrated that neither drew upon the other in any case; the pro-bability is that while both knew Mk., neither the First nor the Third Evangelist knew the other (see Wernle, Die Synopt. Frage, p. 20). Nor can so violent a dealing with his materials be charged against either Evangelist. For a similar reason, we cannot suppose that they were both dependent on the same version of Matthew's Logia; because, if so, one or both of them must have treated its venerated contents - consisting of reports of the sayings of Jesus—in the same unscrupulous way. They must have been working on two different collections of Logia, though perhaps both originally based on Matthew's Hebrew collection; and the divergence must have taken place earlieramong irresponsible transcribers—by more gradual stages. But if this be the case, the task of determining between the two reports is exceedingly difficult. Probably neither can be preferred in all respects to the other. In some cases Mt. appears to be the more correct, but in other cases the probability is with Luke.

In this connexion the most important question is that of the original form of the Beatitudes, in regard to which the following points claim our attention: (1) In Mt. there are 7 (or perhaps 8) Beatitudes; in Lk. there are 4 Beatitudes, followed by 4 Woes which do not appear in Mt. (2) The Beatitudes in Mt. are (all but the last) in the 3rd person: those in Lk. are in the 2nd person. (3) The Mt. Beatitudes describe character and its corresponding rewards; those in Lk. describe only social conditions and the future reversal of them. Now, in favour of the originality of Mt., it may be urged that the greater spiritual value of its version of the Beatitudes points to their originality, for we cannot believe that it was given to copyists and catechists to greatly enrich their Master's teachings. On the other hand, the following points should be noted: (a) It is not denied that the four Beatitudes not found in Lk. are genuine and char-acteristic sayings of Jesus. Assuredly the blessing on the pure in heart, which is among them, fell from His lips. But we may admit the genuineness of the sayings and yet deny them a place in the original Sermon on the Mount; for it has been shown above that Mt.'s three chapters contain insertions of sayings of Jesus spoken on various occasions. (b) The First Evangelist — or St. occasions. (b) The First Evangelist — or St. Matthew himself, the author of the Logia—elsewhere makes collections of sevens. Thus he gives 7 clauses in the Lord's Prayer (6°-13), 7 parables (ch. 13), 7 woes (ch. 23). The genealogy consists of a triad of fourteens (1¹-16). [See Hawkins, Hor. Synopt. pp. 133, 134]. We know that Jesus uttered beatitudes on other occasions (e.g. 11<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 24<sup>16</sup>).
(c) It is difficult to think that if our Lord gave the sayings originally with their ethical and spiritual characterization, this could have dropped out accidentally, or have been deliberately eliminated so as to confine them to social relations. To attribute the alteration to St. Luke's 'Ebionism' is to accuse the Third Evangelist of an offence in flat contradiction to his honest, declared purpose (raµol παρηκολουθηκότι άνωθεν πάσιν άκριβῶς, Lk l³). (d) ff, however, Jesus gave the Beatitudes as in Lk., His disciples may have discerned in them a deeper meaning, knowing that He was accustomed to speak in parables; or He Himself may have explained them, for we must remember that in the Gospels we have excerpts from the teachings of Jesus, pregnant sayings, parables, and aphorisms that stuck in the memory, while the fuller exposition which must often have followed is rarely likely that Jesus, when addressing His own disciples, would have used the 2nd person than that a later hand would have turned the 3rd person style of speech into the 2nd. The direct address is the more original in form; it would be natural for catechists to generalize this, rather than the reverse. cannot say that it was according to St. Luke's style for the 2nd person to be substituted for the 3rd, for the reverse is the case; almost every other ascription of blessedness in Lk. is in the 3rd person (i.e. 145 72 1023 113.25 125.84 4145 233), * while in Mt. we have benedictions in the 2nd person (i.e. 1316 1617, although 116 2466 are in the 3rd person). Mt. even concludes the Sermon on the Mount Beatitudes with one thrown into the 2nd person style (511). (f) It must be admitted that the Woes upon the rich seem out of place in an address to Christ's disciples. These, like the Beatitudes in Lk., are in the 2nd person; they must be taken as apostrophizing the absent. Still, it was our Lord's method on other occasions to speak antithetically (e.g. Mt 6<sup>19.20</sup> 7<sup>13.14.24-27</sup> 8<sup>11.12</sup>). On the whole, these considerations point to Lk.'s as the original version of the Beatitudes.

In the teaching on divorce, Lk.'s absolute statement (1618) must be preferred to Mt.'s more qualiment (16<sup>18</sup>) must be preferred to Mt.'s more qualified form of the saying (5<sup>28</sup>), containing the clause παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, although that recurs in Mt 19<sup>28</sup> (so Holtzmann, Hand-Com.; but Swete, St. Mark, accepts the clause as original), because (a) it is not found in the more primitive version of the saying in Mk 10<sup>11, 12</sup>, and (b) the softening of an apparently harsh saying by a gloss was in accordance with the tendency of scribes.

The case of the Lord's Prayer is more difficult.

The case of the Lord's Prayer is more difficult. We saw above that the way in which it is introduced in Lk. points to the conclusion that the original setting of it was in the incident there recorded rather than in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus may well have given the Prayer more than once (so Bernard in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 43°), but in Lk. it certainly appears as something new for the benefit of the disciples in answer to their request, and this is later than the version in the Sermon.

The two versions are as follows:

Mt 69-13 RV. Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name.

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in haven, so on earth.
Give us this day our daily (irision) bread.
And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors.

And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the Lk 1124 RV. Father.

Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come.

Give us day by day our daily

(irreverer) bread.
And forgive us our sins: for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And bring us not into temp-

AV of Lk. had all the clauses in Mt., but there is ample justification for the omissions seen in RV (see art. LORD's PRAYER, p. 57<sup>b</sup>). They could easily have come in through assimilation to Mt. The enrichment of the Invocation would be a natural growth. Elsewhere Mt. shows a penchant for the use of the word 'heaven.' Thus he, and he alone, has the expression 'the kingdom of heaven,' elsehas the expression 'the kingdom of heaven,' elsewhere invariably 'the kingdom of God.' In Ro 8<sup>15</sup> we have 'Abba, Father,' as the Christian invocation; cf. Mk 14<sup>26</sup> (see Wellhausen, Einleit. in die drei ersten Evangelien, p. 38). The clause 'Thy will be done,' etc. (which is better attested than the other omitted words, since it is in N), may be regarded as an expansion of the clause which pre-cedes it—'Thy kingdom come'—founded on words of Jesus spoken on another occasion (Mt 2639, Mk 14<sup>26</sup>, Lk 22<sup>42</sup>). The final clause in Mt. may be taken as the antithesis and completion of the clause 'and bring us not into temptation.' These points seem to be in favour of the originality of Lk. Nevertheless, it was the Mt. fuller form of the Prayer that was adopted in the Church, as far as we have evidence, from the earliest time, for this is the form in the Didache (viii.). Both forms must be traced to a common Greek tr. of the Aram. original, since they both contain the rare and difficult word emotorer. Dr. Chase considers that they both exhibit the Prayer as changed for liturgical purposes.* Dr. Plummer considers that Iturgical purposes.* Dr. Plummer considers that Mt.'s form of the Prayer is the nearer to the original (Hastings' DB iii. 141 f.). Thus he points out that the δὸς ἡμῶν σήμερον of Mt 6<sup>11</sup> is more likely to be genuine than the δίδου ἡμῶν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν of Lk 11³, because (a) καθ' ἡμέραν occurs in NT in St. Luke's writings only (Lk 19<sup>47</sup>, Ac 17<sup>11</sup>), and (b) the present form of the verb (δίδου), which this involves is an exception to the forms in the this involves, is an exception to the forms in the other clauses, which have acrists, as Mt. has here (δόs).

 $^{\circ}$  Lk  $14^{14}$  is in the 2nd person; but this takes the form of a promise, not that of benediction; similarly Lk  $1^{22}.$

It is not so easy to account for the omission of whole clauses by Lk. Accordingly, Dr. Plummer holds that Christ gave the Prayer originally on two different occasions in two different forms. But it has been pointed out that Lk.'s occasion requires us to view it as the first introduction of the Prayer, and yet this is later than the Sermon on the Mount. Besides, we must compare the briefer form of the Prayer with the briefer form of the Beatitudes. In both cases it is likely that the explanation is the same. Either Lk. abbreviates in both cases, or Mt. expands in both cases. With the Beatitudes we saw that the latter is the probability. Moreover, viewing Mt. as a whole, we see in it a fulness of expression not found in the other Gospels, due possibly to a catechetical use of the sayings of Christ. Thus we have the sign of Jonah explained in Mt 12<sup>20</sup> with a reference to the whale, while it is left indefinite in Lk 1130; in Mt 16<sup>16</sup> 'the Son of the living God' added to St. Peter's confession in Mk 8<sup>29</sup> 'Thou art the Christ,' where Lk 9<sup>20</sup> has 'the Christ of God'; in Mt 16<sup>28</sup> 'the Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' while Mk 9¹ and Lk 9²¹ have only 'the kingdom of God,' etc.; at Mt 26²² 'unto remission of sins' with reference to the blood of the covenant at the Lord's Supper, a clause not found in Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>. Still Lk. has characteristic additions, such as in the verse, 'I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance' (522), where the last two words appear to be a didactic gloss, since they are not found in Mt 918, Mk 217, and are onter energy are not round in alt 9", MK 2", and are not required by the context, but are congenial to Lk., the penitents' Gospel. Lk. has also characteristic alterations; for instance, for 'good things' in Mt 7", Lk 11" has 'the Holy Spirit,' in accordance with that Gospel's peculiarly frequent references to the Spirit of God—leaving the probability of originality with Mt in this case. probability of originality with Mt. in this case. Therefore we cannot make an invariable rule of giving Lk. the preference. While, however, we cannot be positive in deciding the question, the reasons stated above seem, on the whole, to point to Lk.'s version of the Lord's Prayer as the more original. While admitting this, we may hold it probable that Mt.'s additional clauses are echoes of teachings of Jesus given on other occasions, or of His own explanations of the Prayer, analogously to the case of Mt.'s Beatitudes compared with Lk.'s. See, further, art. LORD'S PRAYER.

In other parts of the Sermon on the Mount the question of priority and superiority of authority is of less importance, since the divergences between

* TS, vol. i. No. 3; this is cited by Dr. Plummer in ICC on 'St. Luke.'

Mt. and Lk. are less significant (see Wellhausen, Einleitung, pp. 67-73).

4. Scene and circumstances.—A Latin tradition, that cannot be traced back earlier than the 13th cent. and is not found in the Eastern Church, gives Karn Hattin, a two-peaked hill a little south-west of the plain of Gennesaret, as the locality of the delivery of the Sermon. All that can be said in its favour is that this mountain would be a very suitable spot; but there is no means of confirming so late a tradition. There is a discrepancy between Mt. and Lk., the one stating that Jesus gave the Sermon when He was on the mountain, the other that it was on a level place after He had come down from the mountain. It has been suggested by the harmonists that the level place might be somewhere among the hollows and shoulders of the mountain, so that, while Jesus had to descend to it, it was still in some degree on the mountain. But while this may be allowed as a possibility, the discrepancy is only one of many that are scattered over the Gospels, most of which may be regarded as too trivial to affect the question of historicity.

The circumstances under which the Sermon on the Mount was delivered justify the exceptional importance that has always been attached to it. It was given early in our Lord's ministry, though not at the commencement. It belongs to the first year, before the disfavour of the authorities had arisen, or at all events before it had become serious; but it is sufficiently late for the popularity of the new Teacher to have reached a climax. The primitive stage of the Galilæan mission consisted of a round of preaching in the synagogues; the second stage, still in the first year, is characterized more by open-air preaching, necessitated by the vast growth of the crowds who pressed to hear the popular Teacher, and by their insistence on hearing Him in season and out of season without waiting for the set times of the synagogue services. Internally the teaching of Jesus has undergone development. At the primitive stage it followed closely the lines laid down by John the Baptist, and could be summarized under the formula, 'Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand,' that is to say, it was an announcement of the coming Kingdom. But at the more advanced stages, to which the great Sermon belongs, Jesus had passed on from 'preaching' (κήρνγμα) to teaching (διδασκαλία), and was now expounding the nature of the Kingdom, its character, principles, processes. The Sermon on the Mount comes into this category. It is teaching, rather than preaching. Further, as a consequence, it was originally designed for disciples, for those who seriously desired to learn. This is made evident by the introductions of both Evangelists. In Mt. we read, 'And seeing the multitudes ( $rovs \delta \chi \lambda o v s$ ), he went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples (οι μαθηταί αὐτοῦ) came unto him : and he opened his mouth, and taught them (airois), i.e. the disciples (Mt 5<sup>1-2</sup>). Here the distinction between the crowd and the learners is very marked. It was to avoid the crowd that Jesus retreated to the mountain - a common habit, referred to on several occasions. Then the eager inquirers followed; and finding Him there, led Him to speak to them, or, as seems more likely, they came at His own invitation. The situation is not so clear in Lk., where the coming of the crowd to Christ follows His visit to the mountain, which He had ascended for prayer (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>), and where He had chosen the Twelve Apostles (v. <sup>18</sup>); and whence He on a level place' (v. 17). Still Lk. preserves the distinction between the disciples and the crowd by saying, 'And a great multitude of his disciples.

and a great number of the people from all Judæa,' etc. (v. 17). Having described the cures, which in Mt. preceded the ascent of the mountain, he says, 'And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said,' etc.—here commencing his version of the great Sermon. Thus in Lk. this is delivered to the first of the two groups, the disciples in distinction from the crowd, as in Mt. Moreover, the use of the 2nd person in the Lukan version of the Beatitudes evidently indicates disciples—a fact which the apostrophe of the absent rich does not nullify; because in each case a specific class, not the mixed multitude, is contemplated. As we proceed with the Sermon, this fact repeatedly emerges. It is only to His own disciples that Jesus could say, 'Ye are the salt of (Mt 5<sup>13-14</sup>). It is no objection that towards the end of the discourse Jesus says, 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven,' etc. (7<sup>21</sup>), and concludes with the parable of the Two Foundations, because these warnings might well be needed by many disciples. There was a traitor even among the Twelve. We are not to conclude, however, that these disciples consisted only of the Apostles. St. Luke had expressly said that 'there was a great multitude of his disciples' (Lk 6<sup>17</sup>) present on this occasion.

In Lk. (613) the Sermon follows the choosing and appointment of the Apostles; and this fact has led some to regard it as 'the charge to the Twelve.' But in Mt. there is no description of the choice of the Apostles, and they are not especially associated with the Sermon. In both Gospels the introduction of the Sermon introduces a much larger audience. All the genuine 'hearers of the word,' all who expressly sought out Jesus and set themselves to learn of Him, are included in the comprehensive group of 'disciples.' Still the audience was virtually confined to this group. The Sermon was for disciples, not for the world at large. It may be pointed out, on the other hand, that while the introduction to the Sermon in both Gospels has this indication, the comments which follow it in each case seem to point to the general public. Thus in Mt 725 it is said, 'And it came to pass, when Jesus ended these words, the multitudes were astonished at his teaching,' etc., and in Lk 71 'After he had ended all his sayings in the ears of the people.' The language, however, is indefinite in both cases and perhaps not specially considered, for no emphasis is here laid on the nature of the hearers, as was the case in the introductory descriptions.

5. Purpose and character.—The purpose of the Sermon on the Mount can be understood only when account is taken of the audience to which it was addressed. Since this audience consisted of disciples and not the public, we must read the discourse as an ethical directory for Christians. Therefore the question as to whether its precepts can be embodied in the laws of the State is irrelevant. A group of Galilæan peasants in a province of the Roman Empire had nothing whatever to do with the business of legislation; and even in con-templation of the future spread of Christianity it could not have been the intention of Christ that principles which He desired to see working outward from the heart should be imposed upon a community by force with the external authority of the magistrate. But while it is a mistake to regard the Sermon on the Mount as a model for civil and criminal law, on the other hand it would be an error to abandon its ideal in favour of a lower code of ethics even in the police courts. The disciple of Christ will always desire to see His will carried out: but this does not mean that he is at liberty to force his Master's precepts on a society that is reluctant to obey them because it has not submitted to the authority from which they eman-If we can look forward to a condition in which the State is effectually Christianized, then we shall have a society in which the magistrate is not needed; that is to say, the removal of the conditions which now prevent the Sermon on the Mount being applied in the police court will abolish the police court itself as an anachronism. Therefore we must view the Sermon on the Mount as primarily siming at the direction of the conduct of Christians in their nersonal behaviour as indiof Christians in their personal behaviour as indi-viduals and members of a brotherhood. It has relations to the outside world in so far as Christian men and women have such relations. For instance, commands about love to enemies and kindness to persecutors are especially concerned with the conduct of Christians towards people who are not of their own fellowship. Still, it is the conduct of Christians only that is considered. These considerations should safeguard the interpreter against two other misapprehensions: (1) It is an error to regard the Sermon on the Mount as the sum and substance of Christianity, and to condemn later developments as not of the essence of Christianity (Hatch, Harnack). We have no evidence that Josus Christ intended to put His whole memage into this one discourse. He is here discussing the ethics of the Kingdom of heaven. Elsewhere He treats of other features of the Kingdom. (2) Since this discourse lays down principles of conduct for discipleship, the discipleship must have been prewiously established in other ways (e.g. denying self, taking up the cross, following Christ, turning and becoming as little children, etc., as elsewhere indicated by Jesus Christ).

In the main, the Sermon on the Mount indicates the character of life and conduct that Jesus Christ commends to His disciples as the rule of life. Commencing with the Beatitudes, He points out the way to true happiness. This is more apparent in Mt than in Lk.; but if the Beatitudes in the former Gospel may be taken as at least a true exposition of the deeper meaning of the simpler felicitations in the latter Gospel, it is safe to say that Jesus here teaches that blessedness is associated with character. The conduct commended throughout the Sermon is set forth by Christ as a fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5"). It completes what was imperfect in the earlier religion by realizing its essential principles and developing them to perfection. The consequence is that external precepts of the more primitive condition are abrogated not universally, but wherever they conflict with a later ethical develop-This applies to the Sacred Torah as well as to traditions of the scribes, as in the examples of hatred, divorce, swearing, and revenge, formerly permitted under certain conditions, though regu-lated and restrained by the Law, but now absolutely forbidden by Christ. In the next place, conduct condoned or even honoured hitherto is condemned as unworthy of the higher standard set up by Christ. In particular, estentation in alms-giving, in public praying, and in fasting is repro-bated, and the habit of judging others is reproved The Sermon closes with warnings against being deceived by false prophets, and insists forcibly that mere discipleship in hearing the teaching is vain; the end of all is energetic conduct in obedience to this instruction. The principal interpolations consist of (1) two passages encouraging prayer (Mt t<sup>9-15</sup> 77 <sup>11</sup>), and (2) one long passage discouraging worldly anxiety (6<sup>15-24</sup>). They rest their exhorta-tions equally on the Fatherly goodness of God They are among the choicest and most beautiful of our Lord's teachings, plainly vindicating their right to places in the Logia by their character as of the inner essence of His message, even if their inconsistency with the flow of the argument in the Sermon, supported by the fact that they are placed in other parts of His narrative by Lk., leads us to regard them as out of place when inserted in this particular discourse.

SERPENT.—The prevalence of serpents in ancient Palestine is illustrated by the fact that no fewer than 11 Heb. words are rendered 'serpent in OT. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible) states that 33 different species of serpent are still found in Syria. Of 18 varieties which he humself secured, 13 were innocuous and 4 deadly, including cobras and vipers. Naturally there are numerous references, in the OT, in the NT, and in Rabbinical literature, to serpents as well-known but generally disagreeable inhabitants of the country. So unpleasantly common were they, that it was regarded as one of the perpetual miracles of Jerusalem that no one was ever bitten by a serpent there. references in the Gospels may conveniently be grouped under three heads.

1. In Mt 10<sup>15</sup> our Lord charges His disciples, 'Be

1. There ye wise as serpents' (φρότιμοι ως οι δφεις). There may be here a reference to Gn 31 the serpent was more subtil (ong) than any beast of the field." Heb. word means 'shrewd,' and is used also in a good sense (cf. Pr 12<sup>16</sup> 23), although the parallel root in Arabic suggests only a bad sense. It is probable, however, that our Lord refers to the well-known habits of the serpent, its ability to conceal itself in unexpected places, and to escape awiftly and silently in time of danger (cf. 175 Fig. the weift serpent RV, Job 2614, Is 271)

2. But the phrase which follows in Mt 1014 and harmless (defpaio) as doves, suggests that there was also in the mind of Jesus the equally wellknown reputation of the serpent as a dangerous reptile; and this is borne out by other passages in the Gospels. Almost parallel are Mk 1618 they shall take up serpents,' and Lk 1010 'I give you power over serpents'; while the noxious and repulsive nature of the serpent is referred to in Mt 710, Lk 1111 'if he ask a fish, will be give him a serpent?

In all the above passages, were the generic name for a serpent, is used. But in 20 1224 2223, Lk of we find exclose, which probably means a possioner serpent, and is resolved "super" both in A5 and R5. In M1 222 deeps imploys both words to describe the Pharicess again, resonance again, resonance again, resonance again, superposts off-spring (see Generator, of a pers" (if Mic 71).

3. Very different is the passage Jn 3<sup>14</sup> and as Moses lifted up the serpent (τον δφω) in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, where the reference is to the plague of scrients among the laraelites in the wilderness and the miraculous cure, as recorded in Nu 216-9. Full consideration of this passage, and of its relation to 2 K 18°, does not fall within the scope of this article (see art. 'Nehushtan' in Hastings' DB iii. 510b). It is interesting, however, to note, in connexion with Jn 314, that both passages in the OT have been regarded as pointing to screent-worship in some form among the early Hebrews.

SERUG.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 335, AV Saruch).

SERVANT .- See artt. SERVICE, SLAVE; and for 'Servant of the Lord' see PROPHET, p. 432°.

SERVICE.—There are 5 words which with their derivatives are used to convey the idea of 'service' in the NT: λειτουργείν, λατρεύειν, ὑπηρέτης, διάκονος, in the NT: λειτουργεῦν, λατρεύειν, ὑπηρέτης, διάκονος, and δοῦλος. Of these λειτουργεῖν (λεῖτος = δημόσιος and εργον) is used to denote service rendered to the State. It indicates the unreckoned generosity, the uncalculating devotion of patriotic service of city or country. This idea is fully indicated in such passages as Ro 15<sup>16</sup>, Ph 2<sup>17</sup>, and in connexion with διακονία in 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup>. The word was early used in the Christian Church to indicate the service of God in special offices and ministries. Thus in the in the Christian Church to indicate the service of God in special offices and ministries. Thus in the one passage in which it appears in the Gospels (Lk 12) it is used of the priest Zacharias, as it is afterwards used of the great High Priest in He 8<sup>16.</sup>. Very much the same may be said of the second word λατρεύευ. In classical Greek it was used of the service of the gods, and in the NT it is used of the service rendered to Jehovah by the whole tribe of Israel (Ac 26' and Ro 9'). Thus Augustine says: 'λατρεία . . . aut semper aut tam frequenter ut fere semper, ea dicitur servitus que pertinet ad colendum Deum' (c. Faust. 20, 21). This distinct use of the word appears in all those passages in which it is used in the Gospels: Mt passages in which it is used in the Gospels: Mt 4<sup>10</sup>, Lk 1<sup>74</sup> 2<sup>37</sup>. Though these words are full of significance as used in the NT, we need not in this article examine further into their use, inasmuch as a third that the Corpolarian contains and the corpolarian contains a second of the corpolarian contains and the corpolarian contains a they do not appear in the Gospels in connexion with that form of service which Christ either illustrated in Himself or explicitly taught. It is in the remaining words that we must find whatever teaching is suggested by the terminology of the Evangelists.

διάκονος is used in what was doubtless the original meaning of the word, i.e. 'one who waits at table,' in Jn 2<sup>6.9</sup> (see also Mt 22<sup>18</sup> and Jn 12<sup>2</sup>). It represents the servant in his activity rather than in any relation to his Lord. The bidrores executes the commands of his master. Thus, while in Mt 222-14 the δούλοs invites the guests to the feast, it is the διάκουος who expels the unworthy guest. Another word closely allied in use to διάκουος is ὑπηρέτης, 'the rower,' then the subordinate official, and then the performer of any hard labour (Mt 5<sup>25</sup>, Lk 4<sup>20</sup>). The difference between the two words is to be sought in the direction of the official relation of the ὑπηρέτης to his master.

By far the most commonly used word in this connexion is δούλος, 'the bondservant.' It is used almost as an equivalent to διάκονος to indicate the lowliness of the service rendered. Where the two words are brought into juxtaposition, the difference between them seems to lie in this, that while διάκονος indicates the activity of the servant, δούλος indicates rather the completeness of his subordination. Thus, in speaking of Christ, St. Paul calls Him the didxoros of the circumcision (Ro 15<sup>6</sup>), while he says that He took upon Him the μορφήν δούλου (Ph 27). So also in Lk 1287 watchfulness is the token of the activity of the servant. The humility token of the activity of the servant. The humility of service, therefore, while not lacking entirely from the word  $\delta\iota d\kappa \sigma \sigma \sigma$ , belongs more particularly to  $\delta\sigma \partial \sigma \sigma$ . It is on the lines of this distinction that the words of Christ as recorded in Mt 20<sup>26, 28</sup> may be explained. There it will be seen that, while  $\delta\iota d\kappa \sigma \sigma \sigma$  is the antithesis of  $\mu \epsilon \gamma \sigma \sigma$ , the antithesis of is the one condition of service.

δούλος is found in  $\pi \rho \hat{\omega} \tau os$ ; as though Christ would teach that true greatness lies in the doing of service, while the highest position in His King-dom belongs to him who will accept the lowly position of the slave.

In this last passage and again in Lk 22<sup>28</sup> Christ lays down service as the law of His Kingdom. The position of a minister was that which He accepted for Himself; 'He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>), and He looked to those who would follow Him to accept a similar rule of life for themselves (Lk 2226, Jn 1316, cf. 1216). This idea of service as the law of the Kingdom of God was no new one in Jewish thought. Many years before, the author of Is 40-56 had spoken of both the deliverer and the delivered as 'the servant of Jehovah.' Both He who through suffering should redeem the people, and the people themselves, idealized as they were in the vision of the seer, were to serve. The one was to be 'despised and rejected of men, and the other, blind, deaf, plundered, and despised, was to be exalted by the very service in which he proved his sub-nission and obedience. Each was to be Jehovah's

Throughout the parabolic teaching of Jesus the use of this word is sufficiently frequent to be significant; but if He had given no other teaching in this connexion, His mind would have been suffi-ciently expressed in His acted parable on the occa-sion when He Himself stooped to the most menial of all menial service, and washed the feet of His disciples. When at length His self-imposed task was complete, 'He said unto them, A servant is was complete, 'He said unto them, A servant is not greater than his Lord; . . . I have given you an example that ye also should do as I have done unto you' (Jn 13<sup>1-17</sup>). In this service, which Christ enjoins as well as accepts, there are one or two notes which are peculiarly His own. The first of these is, that it is a service which is not imposed upon the individual from outside, but is a spontaneous act of submission. It was in this way that He Himself had entered upon that service  $\mu o \rho \phi \eta \nu$  dothou  $\lambda a \beta \omega \nu$  (Ph 27), and it is in this way that He calls upon His disciples to serve (Mt 2028). Indeed, it was only thus that service could be of any moral value to the servant. The compelled service is barren of aught but the spirit of rebellion, and it finds no place in Christ's scheme. The service that is grudged or unwilling is not to be discovered in His example. As St. Paul afterwards taught, there is a recognition of the freedom wards taught, there is a recognition of the freedom of the individual in this, that he is allowed to 'yield himself a servant unto obedience,' and the bond which he thus casts upon himself grows closer with every subsequent act of obedience (Ro 6<sup>16</sup>). The second note is that of completeness. This service is complete in its self-dedication and exclusive in its object. Christ acknowledged from the beginning a sense of constraint when He said that He must be in His Father's house (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>). His surrender to that compelling force was full; He found it His 'meat to do the will' of His Father, and to accomplish His work (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>). Equally full was the devotion which He realized, for He 'did always the things that pleased him'

These with the other passages already cited sufficiently indicate the character of the service which belongs to the Kingdom of God. It has a definite and undivided purpose. It is not qualified either in its sanction or in its claim to occupy and dominate the whole life of the Christian. Equally marked is its measure or intensity. Both in the terms that are used and in the examples afforded, it is taught that sacrifice, even that ultimate form of sacrifice which for mortals is realized in death, LITERATURE.—Fairbairn, Religion in History and in the Life of To-day; Church, The Gifts of Conditation. 8ESSION.—In the exultation of Jesus Christ which followed His death upon the Cross, three distinct stages are indicated, viz. the Resurrection, the Ascension, and the Session, which means the eiting or the state of being scated. Harnack indeed thinks that in some of the oldest accounts the resurrection and the sitting at the right hand of God are taken as parts of the same act, without of foil are taken as parts of the same act, without mention of any ascension. But take one of these accounts: in Ito 8th St. Paul writes. Χριστός Τησοϊο δ ἀνοθανων μάλλον δὲ ἐγερθείς ἐκ νεκρών, δς ἐστιν ἐν δεξιὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, δς καὶ ἐκτιγχάνει ὑκὶρ ἡμῶν. 'Here,' writes Swete (Apostles' Creed, p. 87 f.), 'are four well-marked links in a chain of facts are four well-marked links in a chain of facts. -our Lord's Death, Resurrection, Session, Inter-cession. It is difficult to see why the second and the third, the Resurrection and the Session, should be taken as parts of the same act, when the first is clearly distinct. If the Ascersion is not mentioned, it is implied in the Session, for it is contioned, it is implied in the Session, for it is contrary to the usage of the NT to interpret tyreprobate of any exaltation beyond the mere recall from death. In other passages the ellipsis is equally easy to supply. Thus St. Peter's words in Ac. 2th (rds Tracis decorraces d bets... rg beig observed between the interpreted by 1.P.3<sup>th, 2th</sup> (ds' decordation Inside Newton, by the strength of the NT to recard them as normly different names the NT to regard them as merely different names for the same event; the Session is the glorified state into which the Ascension was the solemn entrance.

The Session is related as a fact of history only in Mk 1810. He 'sat down at the right hand of in Mk 16<sup>19</sup>. He 'sat down at the right hand of God,' which belongs at latest to the earlier sub-Apostolic age. Yet this is not so remarkable when we remember that St. Matthew and St. John do not carry their accounts beyond the Resurrection. Its truth, however, is amply established by the fact that it was expressly forefold by Christ Primself (Mt 19<sup>28</sup> 25<sup>21</sup> 26<sup>24</sup>). It was the full liment of prophes year Post 10 to which references Christ Prinsell (At 19s 25° 25° L. It was the full filment of proplies y; cf. Xporol., 1 P 32, Rev 32,

That Ps 110 was taken in the Memisian sense hi the Jewice the time of our Lord is evident from Mt 22,27, where His opponents did not deny that the writer was speaking of the Christ; and in many of the rodder exception writings this interpretation was adopted. Jennings and Lowe (The Palins) quote the following passage which occurs in the Sidmah Tillion on Pn 139*; R. Foder mad in the name of R. Chama, In the time to come the Holy the, Blessed be He, causes the King Messah to sit at H s right hand, according as at in said, The utterance of Jehovah to my Lord, 8t Thou on Ms right hand and Abraham on His left. And the face of Abraham grows pale, and he saw, "The son of iny son sits on the right hand, but I on the left.", and the Holy the, Blessed be He appears him, and say. "The son of thy son is at My right hand, but I am at thy right hand." I have and this is implied by (*223, "Jehovsk upon thy right hand." Later Jewish writers seek to explain the words. hand "- and this is implied by ("2"), "Jehovah upon thy right hand "- Later Jewish writers seek to explain the words as referring to Alraham (Rashi), David (Aben Ezra, Mendelanolm), Hezekish, or Zerublashel, with regard to which interpretations see Jennings and Lowe, opent, Pearson fin the Creed, Art. 31. and Ederoheim, Life and Times of Jenis the Massich, it. 40. hantase halvas at Religion of Jenis (Bastings" DR, Extra vol. p. 72"), thinks the primary reference was to a Maccabasian prest prime, possible smoon, who is the year 41 ac became by a popular resolution hereditary high priest and prince of the people. Delitimels considers this Pasin; the only one which is directly Messianic, in the sense that it contains prophers immediately pointing to the person of a coming Anothed One, who was fully to set up God's kingdom on earth. On the whole question of interpretation consult Davison's art. * Pastins 'in Hautings' DB, so Liv. p. 160.

Accordingly the Session forms a distinct article ('ascendit in colos, sedet ad dexteram Patris') in the old Roman Creed as represented in the Greek confession of Marcellus and in the Latin of Rutinus, of which Harnack writes 'We may regard it as an assured result of research that the old Roman Creed . . . came into existence about or shortly before the middle of the second century." It is found also in a form of creed given by Tertullian (de Preser, Herret, c. 13), 'in carlos ereptum sedisse ad dexteram Patris,' and in another (de Varg. Vol. 1), 'receptum in cohe sedentem nunc ad dexteram Patris.' Its importance is equally marked in the formulæ of the Eastern Church, καθισαντα έκ δεξιών του Harpos (early Creed of Jerusalem collected from Cyril), sadeaderra és detig rou Harper (Creed of the Apostolic Constitutions, vii. 41), sadetbueror és detiur rou Harper (Creed of Constantinople).

In NT the reference is sometimes to the act of taking a position; cf. He la 'aat down (eadderer) on the right hand of the Majesty on high,' which describes the solemn assumption of the seat of authority, which rightly belongs to One whose dignity is expressed in such unique terms as are used in the preceding clauses; and 'throughout the Epistle to the Hebrews (except 11s, *400. from LXX) the reference is uniformly to the act of taking the royal seat? (Westcott on 10<sup>18</sup>, cf. also Rev 3<sup>21</sup>); in 12<sup>2</sup> the Perfect (xext@nex), found in the best MSS, denotes the entrance on a permanent state. In Mt 19<sup>22</sup> 25<sup>31</sup> the reference is to taking the throne of His glory for judgment. verb is twice used transitively to describe the action of the Father in raising Christ from the dead and making Him to set at His right hand (Eph 1st and Ac 2st RV). Elsewhere the Season is described rather as a state; cf. Mt 26st, Lk 22st (RV 'shall be seated,' Vulg. 'erit sedens'), Col 3st (of a Xparor form - xabhaeror, 'where Christ is 100 6 Xporos fore . xabhueros, 'white Christ is seated,' RV), and Ro 824, 1 P 322 white of cores or δεξια του θεού has the same meaning; in Ps 1101 *4000 (LXX) also marks continuous session as dis-

int from assumption of place.

The Session is spoken of as 'at the right hand of God' (Mk 16°, Col 3' et al.; cf. Eph 1° and Ac 28 RVm), elsewhere variously, 'at the right hand of power' (Mt 28°), 'of the power of Cod' (Lk 222°), 'of the Majesty on high' (He 13), 'of the throne of Cod' (12°). The Greek is either & &&&, which is the migran process in the session, which is the uniform phrase in the Synoptics and in quotation of Pa 180 (Ac 234, He 113), or ex decay, which is used in the Epistles (Ro 834, Pph 120 et al.; cf. Ac 233 ex decay, at the right hand, RVm). It is difficult to determine what is the exact force of the expression. God is Spirit, He has no body, and He is omnipresent, consequently the right hand of God is everywhere (dextern Dei ubique est). Therefore its use as referring to the Father is to be taken as a necessary accommodation to our limited nines, which can think only in terms of time and space, and which can have no conception of pure spirit.

Among men, to be set on one s right hand has a well defined meanings it signifies to be in the highest place of honour, to be recognized as a sharer in rules of 4 K 2%, Ps 45% Mt 20%; Jos. Int. VI. VI. 9 ( maparaberberrur airu, 70 , ir macios Iurdbo (1820°) ex degicr) Thus Humpsal. dextra Adherbalem adsocht. — quod apud Nuundas honori ducitur' (Salln-t, Juguetho Xi 3) See art. 'Symbol' in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 172. This is the sense in which the Fathers interpret the words; as Westcott points out in his notes on

He 8¹, they carefully avoided all puerile anthropomorphism in their treatment of 'the right hand of God'; for example, 'plenitudinem majestatis summanque gloriam beatitudinis et prosperitatis debemus per dexteram intelligere in qua filius sedet' (Primas.); οὸχ ὅτι τόπψ περικλείεται ὁ θεὸς, ἀλλ' ἴνα τὸ ὁμότιμον αὐτοῦ δείχθη τὸ πρὸς τὸν πατέρα (Theophylact).

As regards Jesus Christ, however, it is not so clear that the expression is entirely figurative. He ascended with His human body, which was indeed glorified and freed from many of its previous limitations; but it belongs to the very essence of the idea of a body that it should occupy a certain definite space. Since, then, His body cannot be bicaritors it seems preserve to think of it as ubiquitous, it seems necessary to think of it as raised at the Ascension to some distinct place. 'He went into the place of all places in the universe of things, in situation most eminent, in quality most holy, in dignity most excellent, in glory most illustrious, the inmost sanctuary of God's temple above' (Barrow, Sermon on the Ascension). Thus Stier holds fast 'the certain  $\pi \circ \hat{v}$  of heaven, yea, of the throne of God in it.' And Meyer (on Mk 1612, Eph 120) says the expression is not to be transferred into a vague conception of a status calestis, of a higher relation to the world and the like, but is to be left as a specification of place; for Christ is with His glorified body, as  $\sigma i r \theta \rho \rho \sigma \sigma$  of the Father, on the seat where Divine Majesty is enthroned (cf. Mt 6°), from which hereafter He will return (cf. Mt 6'), from which hereafter he will retain to judgment; meantime He is patiently waiting at the centre of all worship and power (He 10<sup>12</sup> m); cf. also Ellicott on Eph 1<sup>20</sup>. This view agrees with the tenor of the Holy Scriptures, which seem to imply that while God is everywhere, yet there is mply that while God is everywhere, yet there is a place (described as ἐν ὑψηλοῖς, ἐν οὐρανοῖς) where He specially manifests Himself in peculiar glory to heavenly beings (cf. Is 6¹ 66¹, Ps 2⁴ 102¹¹). 1 Ti 6¹²), whence the Holy Spirit and the voice of God came (Mt 3¹⁶. ¹ʔ, Jn 12²²). Yet, on the other hand, Milligan (The Ascension of Our Lord, Lect. I.) points out that heaven in the NT 'is contrasted with earth less as one place there are contacted. with earth less as one place than as one state is contrasted with another,' comparing Jn 3<sup>13</sup> 'No man hath ascended into heaven, but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven,' lbut NBL do not give b day êv  $\tau \hat{\varphi}$  obpar $\hat{\varphi}$ ], and quoting Westcott (on He 1<sup>3</sup>), 'all local association must be excluded,' the reference being to dignity and honour, not locality; cf. also Jn 118, Eph 410. And Grimm-Thayer says 'that these expressions are to be understood in this figurative sense and not of a fixed and definite place in the highest heavens, will be questioned by no one who carefully considers Rev 3<sup>21</sup>. See also Abbott, 'Ephesians' (ad 1<sup>20</sup>), in the ICC.

Sitting at the right hand of God is the compendious description of the present life of Chairle

Sitting at the right hand of God is the compendious description of the present life of Christ in glory. It is evident from those passages which speak of it as a continuous state, that the expression cannot be taken literally, otherwise they would convey the idea that the attitude of sitting is perpetual. Besides, we find simply 'is at the right hand' in Ro 834, 1 P 322; in other places He is represented in a different attitude, as standing (Ac 766), walking (Rev 21 34 144); and John (Rev 113) saw Him 'girt about at the breasts with a golden girdle' (which was 'worn in this manner by priests when they were engaged in active service' [Milligan]).

In the vision of St. Stephen a beautiful explanation of the 'standing' has long been given, viz. that he saw Jesus as risen from His throne and in the act of coming to help His suffering servant and faithful martyr. So Meyer, Trench, Conybeare and Howson, et al., following Chrysostom, vi ali train and suit, rability with an interpreta and rain rability in a bitty with an interpreta and rain rability and Gregory the Great, 'Stephanus in labore certaminis positus stantem vidit quem adjutorem habuit.' See the Collect for St. Stephen's Day, and Alford's note on Ac  $7^{55}$ , where he inclines to a different interpretation.

The Session of Christ is connected with His work as King, Priest, Intercessor, and Judge. (1) It expresses His sovereignty and majesty; thereby He entered on the full and permanent participation in the Divine glory, not merely resuming the glory which He had resigned at the Incarnation (Jn 175), but receiving the added glory won by His obedience even unto the death of the Cross (Ph obedience even unto the death of the Cross (Ph 2st, He 2st); thereby the promises made to David concerning his son were fulfilled (cf. Ps 2st 24st, 1 Co 15<sup>2st</sup>, Eph 1<sup>2st</sup>). All power is given unto Him in heaven and in earth (Mt 28<sup>1st</sup>), God 'hath put all things in subjection under his feet' (1 Co 15<sup>2r</sup>). (2) It betokens an accomplished work (He 10<sup>1st</sup>); His earthly life completed, the suffering and the humiliation ended; yet not inactivity, for Jn 5<sup>1rt</sup> still holds true of the exalted Christ; such perfect rest as 'answers to the being of God "who worketh hitherto" without effort and without failure' (Westhitherto" without effort and without failure (Westcott, The Historic Faith, Art. vi.), and is consistent with His readiness to sympathize with His people with his readness to sympathize with his people on earth, and to help them in time of need; cf. He  $2^{18}$   $4^{184}$ . (3) It signifies His unique dignity and honour. In God's presence the angels stand, or fall on their faces (Is  $6^2$ , 1 K  $22^{19}$ ); the priests stood in the Temple when ministering (He  $10^{11}$ ). He alone is said to sit on God's right hand.  $\tau \delta$ έστάναι τοῦ λειτουργείν έστι σημείον, οὐκοῦν τὸ καθήσθαι τοῦ λειτουργεῖσθαι, and τοῦτο ούχὶ τοῦ ἰερέως ἀλλὰ τούτου ῷ ἱερᾶσθαι ἐκεῖνον χρή (Chrys.). Θεὸν ἔχομεν ἀρχιερέα. τὸ γὰρ καθῆσθαι οὐδενὸς ἄλλου ἡ θεοῦ (Theophylact). (4) It expresses His dignity as Priest-King. West-cott remarks (Add. Note on He 8) that in this Epistle to the Hebrews His Session is always (except in 1<sup>13</sup>) connected with the fulfilment of priestly work, of which it marks two different aspects. Before He sat down He fulfilled the type of Aaron, offering the sacrifice of Himself and passing into heaven, into the presence of God. Since that time He fulfils the royal priesthood of Melchizedek; He intercedes for men as their representative (Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, He 7<sup>25</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), presenting their petitions and praises (He 13<sup>15</sup>, Ro 16<sup>27</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>), securing access for His people now to 'the holy place' where He Himself is, by His blood (He place' where He Himself is, by His blood (He  $4^{18}$   $10^{196}$ .), and acting as a minister  $(\lambda \epsilon i \tau \nu \nu \rho \gamma \delta s)$  of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle (8² where see Westcott's note); He also rules and guides His Church, being with His people always, even unto the end of the world (Mt  $28^{20}$ ), and in the midst where two or three are gathered together in His name (18<sup>20</sup>). (5) It implies His work as Judge, which is the expect chiefly presented in the Georgie (Mt  $10^{28}$ the aspect chiefly presented in the Gospels (Mt 19<sup>28</sup> 25<sup>21</sup>, Mk 14<sup>82</sup>; cf. Is 16<sup>5</sup> and 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup> 'the judgment-seat of Christ'). Thus we are to understand by the Session that Christ, having accomplished on earth the work of redowntian earth the work of redemption, now occupies the place of highest honour, most exalted majesty, and perfect bliss, and that God has conferred upon Him all pre-eminence of dignity, power, favour, and felicity. With regard to the particular form in which this is expressed, Sanday (in his art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. p. 642b) well says: 'We speak of these things κατά ἀνθρωπου; or rather, we are content to echo in regard to them the language of the Apostles and of the first Christians, who themselves spoke κατὰ ἀνθρωπου. The reality lies behind the veil.' See also art. ASCENSION.

SEVEN, SEVENTY .- See Number.

SEVEN WORDS, THE.—These words, spoken by our Lord from the cross, are recorded by the different Evangelists, one by St. Matthew and St. Mark conjointly, three by St. Luke, and three by St. John. The progressive stages by which they are characterized may be taken to show a gradual unfolding of the will and purpose of God for the redemption of mankind. They seem to sum up in themselves the whole of the gospel. The first three words, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23*4), 'Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise (Lk 23*5), and 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother' (Jn 19**2"), were spoken between the third and the sixth hour, and they reveal to us the great High Priest, in His life of ministry, interceding for the transgressors, proclaiming pardon to the penitent, and blessing His own. The two next words, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!' (Mt 27*6, Mk 15*4), and 'I thirst' (Jn 19*5), were spoken in the darkness; nature is wrapped in gloom as the God-man, bearing the burden and the curse of sin that is not His own, reveals to us something of the mystery of suffering. The two last words, 'It is finished' (Jn 19*5)), and 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23*6), were spoken in the restored light. They reveal to us the victory, the completed work, and the entering into rest. All seven words are words of love. It was love that animated Him from the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us men and for our salvation the time when 'for us me

1. 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.'— This first word was probably spoken when the soldiers were driving the nails into His hands and feet, and were about to lift up the cross with its sacred burden and plant it in the ground. From His hard bed, the cross, while suffering untold agony, He intercedes for them, and adds to His intercession an excuse for their deed, 'They know not what they do.' In one sense they did know, they must have known, even those rough Roman soldiers, that they were perpetrating an act of gross cruelty; but familiarity with suffering had made them callous. It was part of their work; they were paid to do it, and they did it. But they did not know all, they did not know that they were crucifying the Lord of glory, they were but unconscious instruments doing what they were bidden; and so the Saviour prayed for them and made excuse for them, and not for them only, but for all who had taken part in that deed of violence, for all who, during all the ages that have since elapsed, have been crucifying the Son of God afresh.

2. 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'

—Having interceded for the transgressors, Christ from His cross proclaims pardon to the penitent robber on his cross. This man had been one of a band of robbers, perhaps the same band to which Barabbas belonged, a band of men living wild and reckless lives; and now both he and his fellow, having fallen victims to the power against which they have been in revolt, are suffering the extreme penalty of the law. Crucified with them, in the same condemnation, is the pure and holy Jesus, who did no sin, neither was guile found in the pure that the transfer of the pure hand with t in His mouth. He was numbered with the transgressors. He descended to the lowest depth of human degradation that He might lift humanity to the height of holiness and heaven. From His cross He will exert a world-wide attraction: 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>); and now this attraction is beginning. Both these robbers had at first reviled the Holy Sufferer; one remained hardened and impenitent to the end, but the other was brought to a better mind. Perhaps this was not the first time that this man had seen the Christ; he may have been among those who listened to His words on some previous occasion, he may have seen some of His miracles; now, however, he is brought face to face with the power of His love, conviction dawns within him, he sees himself in his true light; God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss' (Lk 23<sup>40,41</sup>). He confesses his sins, and not only is there a confession of sins but a wonderful faith, and this faith is manifested, not when Christ is at the height of His popularity, but in the depth of His humiliation. He sees in the cross a throne, and in the thorn-crowned sufferer a king seated upon it, and he prefers his request, 'Lord, remember me, when thou comest in thy kingdom.' And Jesus turns to this penitent robber and proclaims the gospel of forgiveness, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

3. 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother.'—Christ from His cross has interceded for the sinful world, He has proclaimed the gospel of forgiveness to the penitent robber; but He has yet, in the progressive stages of His ministry of love, another blessing to bestow. In this word our Lord comes near His own. His first word was for His enemies; His second for one who had been His enemy, but was no longer one; His third was for those who had never been His enemies—for His mother and the disciple whom He loved. 'There mother and the disciple whom He loved. 'There stood by the cross of Jesus his mother' (Jn 1925). For this the aged Simeon had prepared her, when taking the infant Jesus in his arms, he had told her that a sword should pierce through her own soul (Lk 215); and now these words were being fulfilled. Jesus from His cross beholds His mother. and is mindful of the years which He had spent under her tender care in the quiet home of Nazareth. He had told her, both when she found Him in the Temple and also at the marriage feast in Cana (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>, Jn 2<sup>4</sup>), that there was a higher duty than that which He owed to her, a higher relationship than that between mother and son,—He was not only her son, He was also her Lord,—yet the earthly relationship is not forgotten. He will not depart before He has provided a home for her; with His parting breath He commits her to the care of the disciple whom He loved: 'Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother.'

4. 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'—A long space of time intervenes between the third and fourth words. 'From the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour' (Mt 274). The first three words were spoken before the darkness, but now a change has come—darkness reigns on Calvary, as if God had drawn a veil over the scene. Three hours of silence and darkness. It is the climax of the sufferings of our Lord, the hour and power of darkness; what takes place we know not; He trod the winepress alone (Is 633). He is alone in His conflict with the dark without, dark within,—how dark we may gather from the awful cry that escaped from His lips at the end of those long hours, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

What did it mean? It did not mean that He was forsaken by His Father. Had not the Father was forsaken by fils rather. flat not the rather said, 'This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>)? Had not He Himself said, 'Behold the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone: and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me' (Jn 16<sup>23</sup>)? But there was a connexion between the death of Christ and sin; it was an atonement for sin: 'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all' (Is 53°). And the misery of sin is that it hides the face of God. It is the loss of God's presence; and Christ, as our representative, in bearing our sins, entered into our condition, involving the consciousness of the loss of God's presence. He felt as though God had hidden His face. He descended with us into the depth of our degradation, made like unto us in all things, yet without sin. But the mystery of this bitter cry we, with our finite understandings, can never fathom: 'I and the Father are one,' and yet 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' This the early Christians fully realized, for in their oft-repeated litanies they used to say, 'By Thy sufferings known and unknown, good Lord deliver s.' See also art. DERELICTION.

5. 'I thirst.'—'The last word,' it has been said, 'was the cry of the human soul in separation; this is the cry of the human body in its weakness.' The darkness is now passing away, and as, at the Temptation, He suffered hunger when the crisis was over, so now He gives expression to the thirst that is parching Him. Intense thirst was usually the most intolerable part of the suffering of those who were crucified, and He had been hanging there for six long hours, His open wounds scorched by the blazing sun. Two draughts were offered to our Lord: the one He refused, the other He accepted; the one which He refused was the 'vinegar mingled with gall' (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>) or the 'wine mingled with myrrh' (Mk 15<sup>23</sup>). It was a cup of wine drugged with bitter herbs of a narcotic tendency, and it was given in kindness to condemned male-factors to deaden pain. Our Lord refused the soporific; He would not meet death with His senses stupefied; but the undrugged wine which was offered to Him when He said 'I thirst,' He accepted. He would not add to His sufferings by refusing the cooling draught.

6. 'It is finished.'—The conflict is over and the ctory won. Christ from His cross announces victory won. Christ from His cross announces to the world that all is finished. Tereheoras. In one word He sums up the whole of man's redempone word He sums up the whole of man's redemption. Finished was all that prophecy had foretold and type foreshadowed. Finished was the work which His Father had given Him to do. He looks back on His life from the time when He said, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O God' (He 10°), and is able to say with regard to every jot and tittle of His life's work, 'It is finished.' He has made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the size of the whole world. We satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. enter into no theory of the Atonement, we accept it as a fact; we know that the chasm between God and man, formed by the sin of man, has been bridged over, and that the way to the Father is open, for 'when He had overcome the sharpness of death, He opened the Kingdom of heaven to all believers' (Te Deum).
7. 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.'—The two last words were spoken in rapid succession. The word of victory is followed by the word of rest—rest after the burden and heat of the day. It is a word of calm, beautiful trust, of perfect sympathy between the Father and Son, revealing to us what death was to Christ and what it is to all those who are united to Christ by a living faith; that it is not a leap in the dark, not a plunge into an unknown void, but a going home. 'Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening' (Ps 1042), and then cometh rest—rest with Christ in Paradise. Death is the summing up of the life; repeated acts form habits, habits form character, and character is the sum-total of the life, which we carry with us into the unseen world. To live the forgiven life, the life that is being formed and fashioned after the life of Christ, by the power of the Holy Ghost—this is the true preparation for death. This alone can the true preparation for death. This alone can rob death of its sting; one with Christ in our life, we shall be one with Him in our death. 'To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain' (Ph 121). 'Father, into the hond.' into thy hands I commend my spirit.

SEVENTY.—The mission of the Seventy,* recorded in Lk 10, belongs to the third year of our Lord's public ministry. They were sent forth some time after the Transfiguration (101), when the Galilæan ministry of Jesus had closed, and when He had 'set his face to go to Jerusalem' (951). The mission of the Twelve had taken place in the previous year (91. 10). † Seventy was regarded by the Jews as a complete number of persons for any important work.‡ Our Lord may have had specially in view (1) the seventy elders under Moses, who was a type of Himself; (2) the Hebrew tradition that the nations scattered at Babel were seventy in number (pseud.-Jon. Targ. on Gn 11<sup>8</sup>),§ just as the appointment of the Twelve may have been suggested by the number of the tribes of Israel.

1. The office and mission of the Seventy resemble those of the Twelve.—(1) A twofold commission is given in each case to preach and to heal, Mt 10<sup>2</sup>. 8, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>. (2) Instruction is given to both (a) to go in pairs, two and two, Mk 6<sup>7</sup>, Lk 10<sup>1</sup>, in order to strengthen their testimony and to give mutual help and sympathy; (3) to take with them neither purse (for the labourer is worthy of his entertainment), nor wallet (for needless encumbrance was to be avoided), nor shoes, i.e. in addition to the sandals which they wore (for sandals befitted the poor, shoes the well-to-do), Mt 10<sup>9. 10</sup>, Mk 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 10<sup>4</sup>. || (3) In each case the burden of the message was 'Peace' and the 'Kingdom of God.' Peace was and still is the favourite Eastern salutation;

* Some very ancient MSS (BDMR) read Seventy-two (i,380,446-

*Some very ancient MSS (BDMR) read Seventy-two (isdouterstree 36e); but MACLE, etc., omit 36e.

† Although only Luke mentions the Seventy, indications of Jesus having a wider circle of 'disciples' than the Twelve are found elsewhere, as in Jn 696, Ac 115, 1 Co 156.

† The descendants of Jacob who entered Goshen were seventy (Gn 467). Seventy elders assisted Moses in the work of judgment and instruction (Ex 1829 249, Nu 1116.23). The Sanhedrin consisted of seventy besides the president (Hastings, DB iv. 399). The LXX is so called from the tradition (first told in a literary fiction usually ascribed to about E.C. 200) that seventy or, more exactly, seventy-two elders executed the version (Hastings' DB iv. 438). Josephus appointed seventy rulers of Calliec (BJ II. XX. 5).

§ Seventy-two, according to Clem. Recogn. ii. 42. See Driver, Dt. p. 385 t.

A somewhat similar prohibition existed (no staff, shoes, scrip, or purse) for those about to enter the Temple: so that this particular instruction to the Seventy may suggest that those sent forth were to perform their service in the spirit of worshippers (Edersheim, The Temple, etc. p. 42).

the Kingdom of God was the Jews' highest aspiration. The Seventy, however, like the Twelve, would use these words, doubtless, with a fresh significance. Peace would include peace with God as well as with men, peace of conscience, the peace of discipleship to a perfect Master (Mt 11<sup>25-20</sup>): the Kingdom of God would be, not a mere external, but an internal theocracy, the reign of God within as well as over men (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, Mk 4<sup>26, 27</sup>); and this Empire of God was l'eace. (4) In both instructions the warning is added that they would be as sheep or lambs amid wolves, Mt 10<sup>18</sup>, Lk 10<sup>3</sup>. The Seventy, like the Twelve, were to be prepared for persecution and tribulation. Even in Christ's lifetime there are indications of His followers being persecuted (Jn 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>10</sup>); and some of the Seventy at least were destined to suffer for Christ's sake.

2. On the other hand, there are important differences in the two commissions. (1) The mission of the Twelve was permanent; they were pre-eminently Christ's Apostles: that of the Seventy was temporary; they disappear, as a body, from view, like the Seven of Ac 6, although the office of evangelist, without Apostolic status, continues (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>). (2) The Twelve were not only to minister, but to administer—to exercise discipline and government (Jn 20<sup>23</sup>, Ac 1<sup>20–23</sup>). To the Seventy no such functions were committed: they were simply preschers and healers. (3) The commission to the such functions were committee: they were simply preachers and healers. (3) The commission to the Twelve was expressly limited to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not' (Mt 10<sup>5. 6</sup>). It was expedient at first to postpone the obtrusive extension of the privileges of the Kingdom beyond the lowe leet these leges of the Kingdom beyond the Jews, lest these should be prejudiced against the gospel. By the Christ Himself had gone into 'the borders of Tyre and Sidon' (in addition to His earlier visit to Samaria), and had healed the Syrophonician's daughter (Mk 724). His disciples had thus been educated so far into realization that the Kingdom was intended to embrace others than Jews. restriction, accordingly, is omitted in the commission to the Seventy, although there is no positive evidence that any of them preached, at this time, to Gentiles. (4) The commission to the Twelve included not only healing, but raising from death: included not only healing, but raising from death: that to the Seventy omits the latter. It is notable that only Apostles in the special sense are ever represented in the NT as raising the dead (Ac 9<sup>40</sup> 20<sup>3, 10</sup>). (5) A definite itinerary was arranged for the Seventy: they were to go 'into every city and place where Jesus himself intended to come' (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), so as to prepare the way for Him. Their mission field thus included the country east of the Jordan, which was visited by our Lord during this Jordan, which was visited by our Lord during this closing year of His ministry. (6) A special feature of the directions to the Seventy was the injunction to 'salute no man by the way.' The 'time when he should be received up' was at hand: there were many places till to be "isital". many places still to be visited; delay in preparing the way must be avoided; the profuse and elaborate salutations, customary on a journey, must be forgone.

3. Return of the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>17-20</sup>). (1) Their return collectively is related; but we need not infer, what the nature of the case must have preyented, that they all returned simultaneously. As Christ approached some town or district in the itinerary, some pair out of the Seventy would report the outcome of their particular mission. (2) The Seventy return with exultation. Their Geikie (The Holy Land and the Bible, i. pp. 328-329) describes graphically the salutation of two Orientals in Palestine even at the present day. On meeting, each lays his right hand on his heart, then raises it to his brow or mouth. Thereafter they take hold each of the other's hand, and a series of particular inquiries follows, taking up considerable time.

satisfaction culminated in this: 'Even demons are subject to us in thy name.' There was something commendable, and something defective in their joy. commendable, and something defective in their joy. It was right to rejoice in the power of exorcism, but there was a higher joy of which, apparently, they thought little, the joy of enrolment among the servants of God. Accordingly (3) the Lord (a) manifests His sympathy, 'I was beholding Satan fall like lightning from heaven'; as if He had been following the Seventy in spirit during the progress of their mission. (b) He assures them of security against real harm from the powers of evil. Although they were among 'serpents and scorsecurity against real harm from the powers of evil. Although they were among 'serpents and scorpions,' 'nothing shall in any wise hurt you'; a special providence would be their privilege. (c) He raises their aspirations to a higher level. Even to die in such a service would be 'gain'; their 'names are written in heaven' (cf. Is 43, Dn 121). They were fellow-workers with the King, whose cause, even should they suffer tribulation, must prevail.

4. The credibility of the mission of the Seventy has been doubted by Strauss, Baur, de Wette,* and others, owing to (1) the silence of the other Gospels regarding it; (2) the lack of later authentic trace of the Seventy; the close resemblance between the mission of the Seventy and that of the Twelve, being suggestive, it is argued, of confusion. (1) The argument from silence is not strong; because, owing to the temporary character, so far as appears, of the commission, there was nothing in the organization of the Church, as it existed when the three Gospels were written, such as would constrain an Evangelist to relate the history of the Seventy; whereas the position and work of the Twelve made it natural, if not necessary, to give some account of the origin of the Apostolate. The fact that Luke relates also the mission of the Twelve, and the notable differences (chronological and circumstantial) between the accounts of the two missions, render it highly improbable that the two narratives refer to a single event. (3) It is inaccurate to say that there is no authentic trace of the Seventy in later times. Philip 'the evangelist' was probably, from this designation (Ac 21°), one of them. Clement of Alexandria, vriting in the latter part of the 2nd cent., names Barnabas, Matthias, and Cephas, who 'had the same name with the Apostle,' as others of the Seventy.† The historian Eusebius, without giving his authority, states that the Barsabbas of Acts and the Sostlenes mentioned in 1 Ce 1 and and the Sosthenes mentioned in 1 Co 1<sup>1</sup> are said to have been of the same company.‡ The early disappearance of the Seventy as an organization is readily accounted for. They had no authority is readily accounted for. They had no authority as rulers such as would make the appointment of successors requisite. One, as we have seen, became an Apostle; Philip became one of the 'Seven' of Ac 6; a considerable number were probably included in one or other of the orders of evangelists, prophets, pastors, and teachers (Eph 411). The individuals thus, for the most part, doubtless survived, and occupied more or less indoubtless survived, and occupied more or less fluential positions; although the office itself, like that of the 'Seven,' disappeared.

Eus. i. 12. A professedly complete catalogue of the Seventy is given by pseudo-Dorotheos (6th cent.) as follows:—James (brother of the Lord), Timothy, Titus, Barnabas, Ananias, Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Simon, Nicolas, Parmenas, Cleopas, Silas, Silvanus, Crescens, Epenetus, Andronicus, Amplias, Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, Aristobulus, Narcissus, Herodion, Rufus, Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermes, Hermas, Patrobas, Rhodion, Jason, Agabus, Linus, Gaius, Philologus, Olympas, Sosipater, Lucius, Tertius, Erastus, Phygellus, Hermogenes, Dermac, Quartus, Apollos, Cephas, Sosthenes, Epaphroditus, Cæsar, Marcus, Joseph Barsabbas, Artemas, Clemens, Onesiphorus,

5. The appointment of the Seventy for a definite ministry, yet without ecclesiastical authority such as was conferred on the Twelve, is significant and instructive. Our Lord does not appear to have instituted any definite and detailed form of Church government, but to have left such outward arrangements to the Apostles as His chosen disciples, and through them eventually to the Church itself, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Yet the appointment of the Seventy clearly indicates the principle that Christian ministry, including preaching, is neither to be confined to those who bear rule, nor regarded as entitling those who exercise such ministry to receive office as rulers. On the one hand, some who are able to give valuable service to the Church as evangelists or teachers may not be suitable, or even if suitable may not be required at the time, for rulership. On the other hand, those who bear rule in the Church are not, in the spirit of hierarchical exclusiveness, to discourage brethren who (without having the faculty or opportunity of government) possess some useful gift, from exercising it under due supervision, for the good of the Church and of the community at large.

HENRY COWAN. SHAME.—1. Objectively = dishonouring treatment, that which causes shame; usually ἀτιμία, ἀτιμάζειν (Mk 124, Lk 2011). Shame is mentioned in several passages of the OT which are usually applied to Christ's sufferings (Ps 4416 697. 19 894), 18 50°); but the word is, curiously enough, never so used in the Gospels. He 12° speaks of the shame (alσχύνη) of the cross, 131° of Christ's reproach (δνειδισμός), and in 66 those who fall from grace are said to crucify Him afresh and put Him to an open shame (παραδειγματίζεν). In Jn 8<sup>60</sup> the unbelieving Jews dishonour (ἀτιμάζειν) Him, and in Ac 54 the Apostles rejoice at suffering shame (dτιμασθήναι) for His name.

The shame which Christ in fact bore is seen specially in such incidents of the Passion as the night arrest as of a thief or robber, the spitting, night arrest as of a thier or robber, the spitting, the scourging and the mockings, the public procession through the streets of Jerusalem, the taunts, the stripping naked of His body, and the hanging side by side with criminals. But above all, it is seen in the manner of His death, the cross being peculiarly the death of shame.* In the passages in the Gospels which speak of crucifixion and taking up the cross (Mt 2018, Mk 834 etc.), though the preminent the Mt 1918 is that of suffering though the prominent thought is that of suffering, the idea of shame and ignominy is undoubtedly present as well. This shame must be willingly borne both by Christ and by His followers.

2. Subjectively = the feeling of shame; usually aloχύτη and cognate words,† It is interesting to note that the typically Greek and almost untranslatable alδώs has practically dropped out of Biblical Greek. In the LXX it occurs twice in Tychicus, Carpus, Euodius, Philemon, Zenas, Aquila, Priscas, Junias, Marcus (2), Aristarchus, Pudens, Trophinus, Lucas the Eunuch, Lazarus. The list is manifestly untrustworthy. With some probability, indeed, are included all the seven 'deacons' (so called), along with some others (as Barnabas, Barsabbas, Marcus, Cleopas, Silas, Agabus, and Ananias), who were primitive disciples resident in or near Palestine. But many others, including such Gentile Christians as Titus, Tychicus, Trophinus, and brethren like Timothy and Apollos, who became converts long after our Lord's Ascension, are obviously the outcome of indiscriminating conjecture.

See the well-known passage in Cic. in Verr. v. 06: 'Quid dicam in crucem tolli? Verbo satis digno tam nefaria res appellari nullo modo potest.'

† For distinction between sistim and albais, see Trench, NT Syn. § 19, 20. The latter is the better word: 'abbis would always restrain a good man from an unworthy act, while aisxim would sometimes restrain a bad one.'

Mac.; in NT only in 1 Ti 29 μετά αίδοῦς κ. σωφροσύνης ('with shamefastness and sobriety,' RV; 'shamefacedness,' AV\*), and in TR of He 12<sup>28</sup> (AV 'reverence'), where edd. read δέους. It may be that, like such words as dρετή and φιλία, it was avoided as having a technical and unsuitable sense. In Homer and Hesiod it ranks high, being coupled with rέμεσι, and personified; it is the sense of what is due to oneself and others. Aristotle,† however, regards it not as a virtue, but an emotion  $(\pi d\theta os)$ , which he does not consider very valuable to ethics. It is the fear of doola, the loss of reputation, and, while proper to the νέος, it is out of place in the πρεσβύτερος οτ έπιεικής (the good man). They ought never to do, or wish to do, things that might evoke the feeling of shame.

Shame is not, then, a motive which we shall expect to find prominent in Christian ethics. Its essential idea being  $\phi \delta \beta \sigma s$   $d\delta \sigma \xi ds$ , it looks only to the varying standard of public opinion, to what people would say, or might be conceived of as saying if they knew. And its source is not the moral sense of right and wrong, but at best the feeling of propriety and decency. At its highest it is a neutral word. If it may sometimes deter from a wrong action, regarded as disgraceful, it is even more likely to deter from a right action, as unpopular.

It is in this sense that it is most prominent in the Gospels. It may keep a man from honest work (Lk 16<sup>2</sup>). Christ warns those who are ashamed of Him and of His words, that He too will be ashamed of them (Mk 8<sup>26</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>; cf. Jn 12<sup>43</sup>). It is this false shame that is emphatically repudiated by the Apostles (Ro 1<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup>. 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 D 4<sup>16</sup>)

Shame may also follow an action; and here too the idea is not the conviction of sin, but the confusion which comes from discovery, though this may be an element in a future awakening of conscience. It is the fate of one who unduly exalts himself (Lk 1410). Christ's enemies are put to shame (1317), i.e. they are enraged at being exposed before the people. Though the word is not mentioned, it is presumably the feeling of the man who hid his talent or pound, when brought face to face with his master (Mt 25<sup>24</sup>, Lk 19<sup>20</sup>); and it is certainly implied in Jn 8<sup>9</sup>, whether the words 'convicted by their conscience' are genuine or not. The Pharisees are ashamed of being found exploiting a sin for their own ends.

It is possible that in the passage last quoted (the episode of the woman taken in adultery) we have an instance of shame in another aspect, the sympathetic shame evoked by sin in others. Christ was face to face with the type of sin which particularly rouses that feeling, and with a callous attempt on the part of His enemies to use that sin for their own advantage. He blushed for those who did not blush for themselves.

'He was seized with an intolerable sense of shame. He could not meet the eye of the crowd, or of the accusers, and perhaps at that moment least of all of the woman. . . In his burning embarrassment and confusion he stooped down so as to hide his face, and began writing with his finger on the ground' (Seeley, Recs Homo, ch. ix.).

We may note that the word is far rarer in the We may note that the word is far rarer in the NT, and particularly in the Gospels, than in the OT. The typically Hebraic use of  $p\bar{n}=to$  be disappointed of a hope, is not found in the Gospels; it occurs in Ro  $5^5$  9<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>. In each case a quotation is implied or expressed, though, curiously enough, from a passage (Is 28<sup>16</sup>) where  $p\bar{n}$  does not occur in the Hebrew. The shame or reproach of childlessness, which is so prominent in the OT, is referred to in Lk 1<sup>25</sup>. referred to in Lk 125.

1. The sheep of Palestine are still the broad-tailed breed of Biblical times (Ex 2922, Lv 39. 11 RV 'fat tail'). The tail is from 5 to 15 inches wide, and weighs from 10 to 15 lb., sometimes even as much as 30 lb., supplying 10 lb. and upwards of pure fat, which is packed for winter use. The sheep are white, though some have brown faces; only the rains have horns. They 'find pasture' (Jn 10°) in the lower lands in winter and on the mountains in summer, the best pastures being in 8. Palestine (the Negeb and Gerar) and on the plain to the E. of the Jordan; but even 'the pastures of the wilderness' (Ps 6512, Jl 222) are wel come in spring, when grass and flowers have grown which are burnt up in summer. The shepherd leads his sheep (Jn 10°) during the day in the cool months, but in the hotter part of the year from sumset to early morning, when he brings them back to the fold (vv. 1.18) or leaves them to lie under a prepared shelter in the bushes (Ca 17). The fold prepared shelter in the busies (*a 1*). The rold (abh) is a low flat shed or series of sheds, with a yard surrounded by a wall (Jn 10*; cf. Nu 32**, Jg 5**, Zeph 2**); on cold nights the flocks are shut in the buildings. The wall is surmounted by a fence of sharp thorns to keep out the wolves (Jn 10<sup>12</sup>) and other wild beasts (Is 31<sup>4</sup>, 1 S 17<sup>34</sup>); packals and hyamas prey almost up to the walls of Jerusalem, while leopards and panthers often leap over the high fence of the fold, and the shepherd is still at times known 'to lay down his life for the sheep (Jn 1011) Robbers are as great a source of danger a lamb or a kid is sometimes carried off by a bird of prey, and there are deadly snakes in the limeof prey, and there are deadly snakes in the inne-stone rocks. The Gospel parable does not exag-gerate the rejoicing of the shepherd when he has recovered a sheep that has gone astray 'upon the mountains' (Mt 18<sup>12-12</sup>, Lk 15<sup>4</sup>). The shepherd keeps watch by night in the open air (Lk 2<sup>a</sup>, ci. Nah 3<sup>16</sup>), sometimes using a tem-porary shelter or a shepherd's tent (Ca 1<sup>a</sup>, Is 38<sup>12</sup>).

which recalls the normal habits of the early brace ites and their Semitic ancestors (He IP, Gn 42) On the murch he carries a bag or wallet (Mt 10<sup>10</sup>), a staff (Mt 10<sup>10</sup>, Ps 23<sup>1</sup>), and a sling (1 S 17<sup>20</sup>). At the watering places (Ps 23<sup>2</sup>) the sheep answer to the shepherd's call (Jn 10<sup>2-3</sup>), and, when they have drunk, more on at his word to make room for another flock. A shepherd is sometimes followed by several flocks, but each comes or goes at a sepa-rate call, and he often knows each sheep by a name (Jn 103). Sheep-dogs (Job 304) are not mentioned in the NT, but they must have been used, as they are still, to protect the flock and keep the

3. Sheep were used for food (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>), and their nulk for drink (1 Co 9<sup>7</sup>, Dt 32<sup>14</sup>); their skins were used for tents and for a baggy kind of coat (μηλωτή, He 1127). The importance of sheep to a pastoral people like the Israelites is emphasized by one of their favourite names, Rachel, which means 'ewe' (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. 2311), and by the choice of festival. Every morning, also, and every evening, they had to offer in sacrifice 'a he-lamb without blemish for a continual burnt-offering' (Nu 28<sup>3-4</sup>), with two he-lambs in addition every Sabbath day (v.º). Seven he-lambs and one ram were required at every new moon, on every day of the Passover, and at the Feast of Weeks (vv. 16-31), at the Feast of Trumpets, and on the Day of Atonement (29)-11). At the Feast of Tabernatles (vv. 18-38) this offering was included on the eighth day, but was doubled on each of the first seven days, but was doubled on each of the first seven days, with varying numbers of bullocks. Goats were generally used for sun-offerings, but a leper in the day of his cleansing (Lk 17<sup>14</sup>) had to bring a he-lamb for a guilt offering, besides a he lamb for a burnt offering and a cwe lamb, the two latter being commuted for a pair of turtle-doves in the case of the poor (Lv 1410-22). Any of the common people, also, (Lv 140-21). Any of the common people, also, might substitute for the male goat of the ordinary sin-offering a female lamb without blemish (Lv 437-28). This pascular offering of sheep was a Semitic practice which is found also in ancient Cyprus, and was adopted by Epimenides at Athens than here have a suppression of the court to the court of when he was summoned from Crete to purify the city from the Alemaconid pollution (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. note G).

2. The interest of these sacrificial requirements centres in the NT round the representation of Christ as 'the Lamb' (Hev 54 22.8). To some extent, of course, the figure is suggested by 'the meckness and gentleness of Christ' (2 Co 10, Mt 1129), the perfect realization in Him of the spirit of beautiful confidence and loving obedience which we associate with Ps 23 of Ever Home, then a and n pp. 5, 6, 10, 12) But where the figure is ex plained, it is always in a sacrificial sense. was led as a sheep to the slaughter' (Ac 822); 'redeemed . . . with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, (even the blood) without blenish and without spot, (even the block) of Christ' (1P 11st 19); 'a Lamb standing as though it had been slain'; 'worthy is the Lamb that hath been slain (Rev 5st 19); 'the book of life of the Lamb that bath been slain trom the foundation of the world (Rev 13°). In the same way John the Baptist hailed Jesus of Nazareth as 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world (In 12). It is supplified to say (with Alford) that the reference is not to the Paschallamb, 'which did not suggest atominent for sin; on every day of the feast, as we have seen lands were offered as a burnt offering, and if it was not Passover time when John spoke, his hearers would readily understand his meaning from the sin offering of the poor, or the norming and evening sacrifice of every day. These kept before the eyes of all Israelites the principle of substitution, the surrender of another life for the human life that was forfeited or conserrated (He 119 10%) John may have attered his prophecy at the time of the regular evening sacrifice, the time at which the prophecy was afterwards to be fulfilled (Vit 27%); but the language of Is 537-12 would of itself explain the meaning of his words. The correspond ence of Christ's death with a sin offering is dis-tinctly assumed in He 13 , and St. Paul also , and St. Porl also sees in the occurrence of that death at Passover time the true Passover sacrifice of the Lamb (I Co We need not be concerned to limit to any one ceremony the thought in the mind of the Baptist: the Lamb, in his words, was the atoning Lamb. Christ (as M. Dods suggests in Expos. Gr. Test.) may have revealed the truth to him after the return from the Temptation in the wilderness: He Himself three times forctold His coming death (Mt 16th 17th # 20th is) before He repeated the substance

4. Christ is also * the Good Shepherd * (Jn 10<sup>11, 14</sup>). 4. Christ is also the Good Shepherd' (Jn 10<sup>11, 18</sup>), the Shepherd and Bishop (overseer, guardian) of souls' (1 P 2<sup>28</sup>), 'the chief Shepherd' (1 P 5<sup>4</sup>). His people are His flock (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup>), as the chosen people of old were the flock of God (Ps 77<sup>20</sup> 79<sup>18</sup> 80<sup>1</sup> 85<sup>7</sup> 100<sup>3</sup>). As God undertook by the voice of His prophets to feed His flock (Is 40<sup>11</sup>, Ezk 34<sup>14, 13</sup>), so Christ pledges Himself' to give unto them eternal life' (Jn 10<sup>20</sup>, cf.6<sup>21, 20</sup>), to 'guide them unto fountains of waters of His' (Rev <sup>717</sup>). He requires of His sheep (Jn 10<sup>14, 27</sup>) the life of unquestioning obedinger and trust which the Psalmist accents with ence and trust which the Psalmist accepts with such happy contentment (Ps 23): He promises that no one shall snatch them out of His hand if they hear His voice and follow Him, if they make themselves familiar with Him (yeyrdoroids, v.14) as He makes it His concern to know them and to know the Father. When He speaks of 'the fold' in which they will find protection, He calls Himself 'the door' (Jn 10<sup>7-10</sup>) through which one must enter in to be made safe. He becomes the shepherd (vv.11-16) as He passes from the thought of the fold to describe the flock So later (Jn 14') He says, 'I am the way,' before He calls Himself 'the truth and the life.' No one 'fold' can include all His sheep (Jn 10'), the flock is greater than the fold, the shepherd more essential than the door: and the one necessary condition of the Christian life is the personal devotion and obedience to the living Shepherd Where that condition is observed, there may be many folds, 'other sheep'; but He will know His own (v.14), and in the eyes of all at last 'they shall become one flock, one shepherd (v. 4).

In His more active ministry Christ found the appropriate figure for His disciples in the patient hard-working cattle which ploughed the earth to prepare it for men's food, or carried the burdens of their daily life (Mt 11<sup>20,28</sup>): work under His guidance with the meek and lowly spirit is the secret of rest. It was as the shadows of the end fell upon Him that He returned to the OT figure of the sheep of God's pasture: "Fear not, little flock' (l.k 12<sup>sq</sup>), resumes the Be not afraid of v." at the close of the perilous scene when the crowded courtyard was His refuge from the hatred of His enemies (Lk 11<sup>87-64</sup>). So the beautiful pictures and promises of Jn 10 belong to the time of danger (v.<sup>20</sup>) in the closing winter (v.<sup>21</sup>) of His life, when He was being forced into the retirement (v.<sup>40</sup>) from which He came out at the risk of death to restore Lazarus to his sisters. The Shepherd's care of His sheep is the gospel first for the sorrowful and help-less: "the whole portraiture of the Good Shepherd is a commentary on Is 53' (Westcott).

5. One other NT analogy is derived from the same figure. As rulers who "observe dooms from

Zens' are called in the Riad (i. 263, ii. 243, etc.) wonders hade (cf. Mic 54, Mt 26), and he that re ceives authority over the nations 'shall shepherd them with a stuff of iron' (Rev 27 125 1918), so the Church receives notheres nat didagnations among the gifts of its glorified Lord (Eph 4"). Their duty is to 'tend the flock of God' (1 P 5"), 'the flock in the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers (Ac 2028): it is the false shepherds who 'without fear feed themselves' (Jude 12). In 'tending' the flock, the first and last duty is to 'feed' it: βόσες τά άρνία μου, ποίμαινε τὰ προβάτιά μου, βόσκε τὰ προβάτιά μου (Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>). The shepherd's ways with the sheep may be most winning and his music of the sweetest; but if he does not minister to them 'the bread of life,' other shepherds will have to be found who will 'feed them' (Jer 23'). As the shepherds themselves belong to the flock of Christ, they are also to be 'examples to the flock,' and when the chief Shepherd shall be manifested, ye shall receive the crown of glory that fadeth not away' (1 P 52.4).

**EHEKINAH (Heb. npp 'that which dwells' or 'resides, 'the 'dwelling').—This term, together with 'the Glory' (np) and 'the Word' or 'Memra' (np, লটেট, is used in the Targums as an indirect expression in place of 'God.' It denotes God's visible presence or glorious manifestation which 'dwells' among men: the localized presence of the Deity. See art. 'Shekinah' in Hastings' DB. In the NT the term Shekinah appears in more than one Greek form. The invisible Shekinah is also alluded to, as well as the visible. The visible Shekinah, though distinct from 'the glory,' was associated in the closest way with the Divine 'glory.' It was classical passage is Ro 9°, where St. Paul, enumerating the list of Israel's privileges, says: 'whose is the adoption, and the glory,' i.e. the Shekinah-glory, 'the visible presence of God among His people' (cf. also Ac 7° where St. Stephen speaks of 'the God of glory,' i.e. the God whose visible presence, manifested in the Shekinah, had sanctithe Jerusalem and the Temple). In the Gospels this 'glory' is referred to in Lk 2° 'the glory of the Lord (56\x \(\text{ev}\) \(\text{ev}\) shone round about them.' There is also an obvious allusion to the Shekinah in the description of the theophanic cloud of the transfiguration-narrative (Mt 175 'a bright cloud the cloud, saying, etc.; cf. Mk 9, lk 9<sup>24</sup>). Here the same verb (**rondfe) is used as in the LXX of Ex 40<sup>24</sup> of the cloud which rested on the Taber-Ex 40° of the cloud which rested on the Tabernacle when it was filled with the 'glory of the Lord,' which in the Targum (pseudo-Jonathan) becomes the 'glory of the Shekinah of the Lord.' The 'voice out of the cloud' is also, doubtless, the voice of the Shekinah; cf. 2 P 1" where, in reference to the transfiguration, a 'voice' uttered by the excellent glory' (i.e the Shekinah glory) is spoken of ' In He 9' the cherubin of glory' must be explained in the same way, as meaning the cherubin on which the Shekinah was enthroned.

In three NT passages (all having reference to Christ) † an allusion to the Shekinah is probable, though disputed, via. (a) Bo 64 'Christ was raised from the dead by means of the pather.' Here 'glory' prob - the Shekinah glory rather than 'glorious power' (of the Midrata Rabbe to On 644, in which the Shekinah is said to release the bound in Sheol), $

† See Marshall, th.

† A similar idea may be implied in the words ascribed to one Lord in Jn 11-0, where, with reference to the release of Lammus from the grave, Josus says to Martha. 'Said I not unto thee, that, if thou believedst, thou shouldest see the glory of God?'

(b) 1 P 414 'the (Spirit) of giory and the Spirit of God' (vi vie Jeger and vi vio See vertices). Here 'glory' may - Shekinah, which is identified with Christ. This identification may be seen more clearly, perhaps, in (c) Ja 2 'viv viver vio major into the Tayres vie Jeger, which not improbably - 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Shekinah' (Slayor). For turther doubtful reff. in the NT, see below.

There can be no doubt that the word says *tabernacle* (and its verb expects, to tabernacle*), has been chosen for use in Jn 11s and Rev 21s from its likeness both in sound and meaning to the word Shekinah, and conveys a direct allusion to the latter. The Revelation passage runs: 'Behold the tabernacle (σκηνή) of God is with men, and he will tabernacle (σκηνώσει) with them.' In Jn 114 'The Word (Logos) . . tabernacies (temposes) among ms, and we beheld his glory, etc., all the three Hebrew terms, Memru (****p**)=b hoyes, Shekmah, and Yekara (bifa=****); are represented. All the three entities became incarnate in Jesus.

and Ickara (dia = 10), are represented. All the three entities became incarnate in Jesus. The identification of Jesus with the Shekinah has already been referred to above in connexion with 1P 414 and Je 25. Another example where the same idea may be implicit is Mt 1850. Where two or three are gathered together in my mans, there am I in the midst of them; compare with this Pivils adoth it. 6: "Two that it together and are occupied with words of Torah, have the Shekinah among them." Cf. also 2 Co 46. God that said, Out of darkness light shall shine, is be who shone in our hearts for the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. The last bear and a connexious in practically - Immanuel ("God with us").

Other passages worth axamination in this connexton are Eph 17 (the remarkable phrase "the Father of the glory (if may be defy = 1" the father of the Shekinah (incarnate in Jesus)"). Lk 230 ("the glory of thy people Israel"). Cf. also 1 Co 26 (Jesus 'Lord of glory'). The representation of mans a temple in which God dwalls (cf 2 Co 516 we are a temple of the living God, 'In 142" we will come . . . and make our shode with him ') was probably suggested by the Shekinah-idea, which may also have influenced the language applied to Christ in Cot 26 ("for in him dwalleth all the fulness of these ideas," as Dahman mays, 'which is at variance with their primary application.' It marks a specifically Christian development, though the way had certainly been prepared by hypostatising tandencies.

SHELAH,-A Judahite ancestor of our Lord (Lk 200).

SHEM.—The patriarch, mentioned as a link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3%).

SHEWBREAD, 'bread of the face or presence' (lehem panim), was placed on a special table in the Holy Place, in the presence of God. This was a very ancient custom in Israel, and is found also among other Semitic peoples. The bread was originally designed for the god to eat, but, of course, the semitic people and the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the semitic people and the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the people of the god to eat, but, of course, the god to e this early notion did not persist; the bread, how ever, was still held to imply the presence of God, and His acceptance of the worship rendered to Him.

Shewbread is mentioned in the Gospels on only one occasion, Mt 12° | Mk 2° and Lk 6°. Jesus and His disciples, passing through the cultivated fields on the Sabbath, were plucking the ears of grain, rubbing out the kernels, and eating them. They were challenged by the Pharisees for doing what was unlawful on the Sabbath. The plucking of grain without instrument, while walking through another's field, was expressly permitted by the Jewish law, but the manual labour involved was interpreted as harvesting and threshing, which were forbidden on the Sabbath. Jesus replied to were forbidden on the Sabbath. Jesus replied to the Pharisees by citing two illustrations (according to Mt.), one of which was an act of David as recorded in 18 21<sup>1-4</sup>. In David's flight from Saul he had come to Nob, to Ahimelech the priest. He was hungry, and asked for food for himself and his men. There was no bread at hand except the men. There was no bread at hand except the shewbread, which, after lying on the table for the week, had been replaced by fresh bread. The bread is described as 'holy.' There is no hint in the passage that David did an unlawful thing in eating the bread. He did not do it without due deliberation, for the question of the legality was expressly raised by the priest. Before giving the men the bread, he asked if they were 'clean.' This was his one concern, and, being satisfied on this point, he readily gave it to them. If it had been unlawful for any to eat except the priests. been unlawful for any to eat except the priests, that surely would have been stated, and the cleanness would have been of no moment. In case the parley is considered, as it may be, to have been the effort of later tradition to clear the king from the charge of irregularity in the matter, the state of the case is not altered. The passage seems to show that no law was knowingly broken in the transaction.

Jesus, however, says that it was unlawful. statement is in accord with the Jewish law of His day, which can be traced back to a provision of the Priests' Code from post-exilic times (Lv 24°), which says that the shewbread was for the priests, and must be eaten by them in the Holy Place. Such an act as David's was illegal in the time of Christ; it was not illegal in the time of David, The real issue between Jesus and the Pharisees in Mt 12 was the extent to which such laws as that of the Sabbath were binding. The Jews held that the law was eternal, unchangeable, supreme. Jesus held that it was for man, and the Son of Man was lord of it. More recently the argument of Jama has been vastly strengthened by the recognition of the gradual development of the OT legislation. According to the Jews, their great king had violated the Law, and the only justification was the stress of his hunger; but to use this argument to justify David was in effect to acknowledge the very principle upon which Jesus acted in allowing His disciples to pluck the grain.

SICKLE (δρέπανον).—The crops in Palestine are, to this day, reaped almost entirely with the sickle (Mk 4<sup>20</sup>). The scythe is seldom seen save in the hands of a foreigner, and the whirr of the reaping machine is still unknown. defracer is the LXX equivalent of two Heb. words sorn and to which seem to have been two names for the same thing. The Palestinian sickle is a little longer than our common shearing hook; the blade describes a somewhat wider curve, and the point, instead of terminating sharply, is slightly turned backward. Sometimes the edge is toothed like a saw, but oftener it is plain and sharp like our own hook. The total length of handle and blade is from 18 to W. Ewing.

SIDON (for much of common reference, see TYRE).

* Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 231. To these should be added the great passage in He 12, where the Son is said to be the 'effulgence of the glovy,' i.e. of the Shekinah-glovy as 'the manifested Deity.'

—A narrow, rocky district as well as a once famous city in Phanicia, the city being 30 miles 8, of Beirût and 26 miles slightly N. by E. of Tyre, and 60 miles N. of Capernaum. Like nearly all settle-60 miles N. of Capernaum. Like nearly all settle ments on the east coast of the Mediterranean, Side owed its location to certain prominent rocks in the which at first served as a breakwater, and then through gradual connexion with the land, produced a northern and a southern harbour, the latter new filled with mand.

Sidon is so ancient that all certainty as to the origin of its name has vanished. Some have deemed it 'fishing'-town, others the seat of the worship of a deity Sid. Sidon and the Sidonians are heard of earlier and more influentially than Tyre, which finally distanced its northern rival. All the Phonician cities seem to have known little but rivalry down to the appearance of such world-powers as Assyria, Babylonia, Pernia, Greece, and Rome, which made them all, sconer or later, subject and abject. Each had its 'king,' its 'god,' its colonies, its coinage. Each sent its trading vessels seaward to the Mediterranean world; landward, each was in touch with the markets of Damascus and the East by means of those caravans of ships of the desert; each sat as queen over a semicircular domain with a radius of some 15 to 90 miles. Through faction in the 8th cent. B.C. Sidon lost many of her merchants, chiefly to Tyre. At length her limited territory, her morely commercial aim, her being sapped by colonization and dissension, her final surrender of leadership to Tyre, combined with her conquests by the world-powers, left her under the Romans in the days of Christ a merely provincial capital, richer in the vices of ancient paganism than in its virtues. Some from Sidon were in the multitude that thronged Jesus at the Sea of Galilee (Mk 3"), and Sidon was pronounced more excusable in the day of judgment than the more favoured cities of Jesus' own country and race (Mt 11<sup>114</sup>). The present Saide has about 10,000 inhabit-ants, and is surrounded by delightful orange groves, beneath which lie archeological treasures. Beirat, with its Damascus railway and improved harbour, has robbed Sidon of its last vestiges of commerce.

In a sense Sidon was, and in another sense was not, within the limits of the Holy Land. In the ideal distribution of Canaan recorded in Joshua the lot of Asher would seem to have included about all of Phomicia, extending 'even unto great Sidon' (Jos 19th). The coast cities and their daughter villages, however, remained utterly unconscious of their assignment, while Asher became so assimilated thereto as to retain in Israelitish history little thore than a name.

The RV declares that Jesus 'came through Sidon, a distinct and exact statement unknow to the AV; and thereon depends our conception whether or not Jasua Himself, from choice, ever went into the way of the Gentiles. Many points as to the primariness, structure, and transmission of the Gospela are illustrated by this case.

B. Weise eides completely with the 'some ancient authorities' of RVm, and reads: Japus 'went away into the borders of Tyre. . . And again he went out from the borders of Tyre, and came through Sidon unto the sea of Galiles, etc. Thus the primary Gospel of Mark, the more ancient Sinaitic and Vations MSS, Professor Weiss, and the Revisers do not hesitate to depict Jesus as entering Gentile territory (twice), entering a (probably) heathen house, and dispensing blessings upon a pagan woman, going then yet farther 'through Sidon' and Decapolis. The more theological First Evangelist, however, and the judicious transcribers disliked so to state the case. So Edersheim: the 'house in which Jesus sought shelter and privacy would, of course, be a Jewish home'; and 'by "through Bidon" I do not understand the town of that name, which would have been quite outside the Saviour's route, but the territory of Sidon' (Life and Tenes, it, 38, 44).

Anything like a direct 'route' from the Israelitish borders of Tyro, or of Tyre and Sidon,—for Edershaim emphasizes Matthew's indication that the woman came from her territory to that of Josus, -would take one in a south-easterly direction, and therefore away from Sidon. Accordingly, Jesus' choice to go in a northerly direction, 'through therefore away from Sidon. Accountingly, wester choice to go in a northerly direction, 'through Sidon,' shows that He was not taking any near and direct and usual 'route,' but for a reason was seeking travel into heathen territory. Mk.'s connexion indicates that Jesus journeyed into the Gentile land with His disciples, on the occasion of the abolition of the Levitical distinctions as to the monially clean and unclean, so as to give to His followers an example and object lesson as to the same. Sidon on the far north was for this reason included, as was the hog-herding Decapolis. It was at Casarea, a similar Gentile city almost 100 miles nearer Jernsalem, that St. Peter received his fuller lemon on the same subject.

SIFTIRG.—The vb. 'mift' (Gr. samifa, fr. same) a late word for a sieve) occurs only in Lk 22".

Two variaties of sieve were used for separating the finer particles of substances from the grosser (see art. AGRICULTURE). Scripture refers to the sieve and the process of sifting only rarely (Is 30%, Am 9°, Lk 29%), but is full of the idea of sifting. In this process the methods of different industries In this process the methods of different industries join to give force to the metaphor which they supply. Of these farming is the chief, with its floors, fam, etc. (Mt 3<sup>21</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>). The preparation of wine also enters in with its emptying from vessel to vessel (Jer 48<sup>11</sup>). The refining of metals (Is 1<sup>21</sup>, Mal 3<sup>22</sup>), too, contributes to the contents of the idea of sifting. All these moralismit. It comthe idea of sifting. All these moralize it. It con-centrates on character. St. Peter and his fellowdisciples [plur. hads] are sifted; Pharisees strain out gnats (Mt 23<sup>30</sup>); evil work avoids the sifting of the light (Jn 3<sup>30</sup>). The ministries of John, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit (Jn 18<sup>6</sup>), all have this trait—they sift men. Yet Jesus is Himself sifted by Satan, whose 'findings' are nil (Jn 14"), while, also, the disciples are not above the Master. 'As the wheat in the sieve is shaken backwards and forwards, and thus the refuse separates itself from the grain, and falls out; so Satan wishes to trouble you and toss you about (by vexations, terrors, dangers, afflictions) in order to bring your faithfulness; to me to decay' (Meyer's Luke 22<sup>21</sup>).* The case of St. Peter is not singular. St. Paul underwent the process (Ph 3<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>467</sup>). The sifting is a law of life. All the Father's chastenings are with a view to sift His children as wheat. It is of the essence of the ways of God with men alike in providence and grace. Its place in that economy is among the final, not initial, processes. Readier and rougher means of grace have their earlier day; this is a delicate, even final, means of dealing with the finest of the wheat.

SIGHING.—The expression of trouble by means of involuntary respiration. This expression is used in connexion with our Lord twice, both times in St. Mark's Gospel. It is expressed in 734 by the word στενάζω—in the LXX the equivalent of nux—and in 812 by the compound ἀναστενάζω. In both instances the words appear in this Gospel alone, and only in these passages. The expression is evidently meant to convey the fact of the Lord's sympathy with men. In the first, the healing of the deaf and dumb man, our Lord felt the burden of the disease which He was about to cure. And here the expression is associated with prayer on His part: 'And, looking up to heaven, he sighed.' In the second, where a stronger expression is used through the compound, the Pharisees are asking for a sign, and He 'sighed in his spirit,' evidently thinking of the speedy appearance of the sign for which they asked, and mourning over the terrible nature which it would bear. On the 'groaning' of Jn 1123.25 see Anger in vol. i. p. 625.

sight. — Christ rejoiced in His power of restoring sight to the physically blind (see below), and points to it as a most fitting exercise for One sent of God (Mt 11<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>21-22</sup>; see also art. Sign). When He speaks of Himself as Deliverer, in terms borrowed from the prophets (combining Is 61<sup>1</sup> and 42<sup>6-7</sup>), one of the chief features of the commission He announces is the recovering of sight to the blind (Lk 4<sup>18-19</sup>). At that rapt moment of high spiritual experience it is certain that, while bodily sight may be referred to, the emphasis lies on the higher vision He had come to impart. The need of man for true inward sight, for the knowledge of God and of self, was ever central to Jesus. That men should see Him and thus see the Father was the one burning passion of His life (Jn 14<sup>9</sup>, cf. 16<sup>12-13. 16</sup> 17<sup>2. 6. 25-26</sup>). That men should have the capacity of vision and yet be blind to the true significance of Himself and His work, was a sincere embarrassment to Him (Mk 8<sup>18</sup>).

In Mt  $6^{22}$  and I.k  $11^{24-36}$  He employs bodily sight with its commanding relation to the whole of human activities as an image of inward vision. The eye was the means of guidance and surety and power to the whole body—the lamp  $(\lambda \delta \chi \nu \sigma)$  of the body. If the eye be unperverted ('single,' or, literally, 'simple,'  $a\pi \lambda o \hat{\sigma}_{5}$ ), the whole body is lighted for all the work it has to do. If 'evil'  $(\pi \sigma \nu \eta \rho \delta_{5})$ , the whole body is darkened, and every part of the complex activity is rendered inefficient if not impossible. So of the inward, mental and spiritual eye. The power of vision is central. If that capacity to see things as they are be unimpaired, the man can be and do that for which God created him. But the man who has lost his power of inward sight is enveloped in the deepest and most hopeless gloom. If the light in a man be darkness, how great is that darkness! On Mt 13<sup>127</sup> see PARABLE, p. 315 f.; and on Jn 19<sup>307</sup> see SEEING. In our Lord's healing of the multitude which the

* Note that the point of the comparison lies in the shaking. Satan aims at destruction; Jesus is thinking of purification as the real result. Christ comes with His fan to get rid of chaff (Mt 312); Satan sifts in order to get rid of wheat. For, as Thomas Fuller says somewhere, when Satan comes with his sieve, he desires to find the chaff and not the wheat.

In our Lord's healing of the multitude which the Gospels on several occasions record, cases of blindness were found, loss of sight being then as now common in Syria. The common cause of loss of sight was and is ophthalmia, which varied in severity from a minor form causing redness of the lids and loss of the eyelashes, to an extreme form affecting the whole eyeball, lachrymal ducts, the glands, eyelids and lashes, and resulting in the total destruction of sight and the eyeball. The disease is still prevalent in the East, and especially in Syria, being traceable to the intensity of light and heat, and to the strong winds bearing sand and other injurious matter. The matter secreted from the inflamed glands is also transferred to other persons, making the disease highly contagious. Ophthalmia might also give rise to blindness from birth, by causing permanent opacity of the cornea.

Other affections of the parts connected with the organ of vision might produce blindness, e.g., affection of the nerves. Mt  $12^{22}$  was a case of this kind, being probably also complicated with nervous disorder. The blindness, deafness, and dumbness point to some serious defect or disease in the nervous tissue which controls the organs of vision, hearing, and speech; and the mental disorder is organically connected with the cerebral disorganization.

As a rule, the cases of loss of sight are not sufficiently described to enable us to know what particular cause produces the blindness. Mt 9<sup>27-21</sup> is a case in point, the interest of the narrative being the quick faith of the blind and the sympathetic response of Jesus. The case of the man blind from his birth may have been due to any of the causes above mentioned, or to cataract (Jn 9). The feature of our Lord's cure of the blind is narrated in the above instances—His touching of the eyes. The blind man of Bethsaida (Mk 8<sup>22-28</sup>) was treated similarly. Twice Jesus laid His hands upon the blind eyes. Also He spit upon his eyes—having previously gently led him by the hand out of the village. He spoke to him also of the healing which they both desired, and called forth the energy of the man in response to His own power: 'Seest thou aught?' In this instance a process was observable in the recovery, or possibly there is indicated the difficulty in one who had never seen of being able to interpret to himself new sensations. In Jn 9 we note that Jesus speaks concerning the cure to be wrought. His words in Jn 9<sup>2-5</sup> would be spoken in the hearing of the one to be healed, and would have a salutary effect in restoring hopefulness to one who might not unnaturally have given up all hope of restoration. The eyes are anointed with clay and saliva, and distant real a distant pool.

These two instances in which our Lord uses saliva recall the familiar folk-lore of curing sore eyes. The use of saliva, especially of fasting saliva, for bleared eyes, still persists. The Talmud ascribes special efficacy to the saliva of an eldest son. Royal saliva was greatly in request for healing purposes, and an instance is recorded of Vespasian using his saliva with excellent effect, after having first inquired of the physician if the malady were curable (Tacitus, Hist. iv. 2; Suetonius, Vespasian, 7). Our Lord's use of saliva, or of saliva and clay, had no connexion with these as physical remedies, but may have been designed to encourage the mind of the patients, who were familiar with the remedy. And it is significant that all the action of Jesus was upon the psychical side. The means taken were exactly adapted to call out the response of the patient, and to evoke a real co-operation between Healer and healed. Cf. the means used in Mk 8<sup>22-26</sup>, and for the deaf mute in Mk 7<sup>31-36</sup>, the signs employed being evidently meant for the one to be restored.

We may note (1) that both Jn. and Mk. in the last two cases, give substantially the same account of the methods employed by Jesus. Considering the wide difference in the standpoint of the two writers, this is most significant, and indicates clearly that both descriptions are drawn from life, and that the actual method of Jesus was remembered and so far understood as to be regarded as memorable. (2) The suggestive likeness between the action of Jesus and modern therapeutic methods. Not that these deeds of Jesus are explained by the latter, but that the Divine life manifested in Him did not work on totally different lines, although His method completely overpassed and overwhelmed them in essential power. T. H. WRIGHT. SIGN (aqueîor, signum).—The Gospels contain many references to signs in connexion with the anticipations of Messiah's advent and with the life and work of Jesus Christ. But the various shades and degrees of significance attached to the word 'sign' by speakers, writers, and the people generally, must be carefully discriminated by a close regard to the particular occasion on which it is employed. Most of all must distinction be made between the value placed upon the word by the people of our Lord's time and by our Lord Him-

1. The fixed expectation of the generation into which Jesus was born, that signs would be associated with every true prophet and reformer and supremely with the Messiah, that marvellous events, largely of a material character, would occur in connexion with every authoritative teacher, and with every manifestation of the will of God, was part of the mental fabric of the Jewish people. The depth to which this expectation penetrated into the general consciousness may be judged by the traces of it in the Apostolic writers and in those trained under their influence. The Apostles generally did not easily throw aside Jewish prepossessions in regard to the kind of phenomena which might be expected to accompany a Messianic advent or a Divine revelation. Although they lay the main emphasis on the ethical and spiritual elements of Christian authority, the lower conceptions persist, and often no clear distinction is made between the  $\sigma\eta\mu\epsilon\hat{i}\sigma$  and the  $\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha$ s (cf. Mt 24<sup>294</sup>, Mk 13<sup>241</sup>, I.k 21<sup>11, 25</sup>, Ac 2<sup>22</sup>, He 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>, Rev 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>20</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>251</sup>).

It is abundantly clear that the general assumption was made that credentials of a striking and material character must be demanded of the Messiah as a proof of the authority of His teaching and Person. Repeatedly the Jews, and especially the scribes, Pharisees, and Sadducees (see below), pressed this demand upon Jesus. They wanted a clear convincing proof of His authority. The signs they had seen were possible by collusion with the powers that rule the lower world, by a compact with Beelzebub (Mk 3<sup>22</sup>). Only a sign in the heavens would satisfy them. Clearly what they sought was of the nature of a prodigy, properly to be classed with the τέρατα, with which our Lord stedfastly refused to have any part or lot. Similarly, Herod's desire to see Jesus was animated by his wish to see a miracle (σημεῖον) performed by Him. We can be sure that what Herod desired had more relation to prodigies, as most in harmony with his nature and suited to his capacity, and the word used is due to the Evangelist, who himself drew no clear line between the σημείον and the τέραs (Lk 23°).

2. Our Lord's attitude towards signs.—Indications are given that the common expectation of signs on the part of His generation was not without its solicitation to Jesus. One temptation in the wilderness was an urgent pressure on the noblest side of His nature to give a sign of this character with the view of gaining a more speedy influence over the people (Mt 4<sup>5-7</sup>, Lk 4<sup>9-12</sup>). The temptation was resisted and overcome. Our Lord would put no trust in external and magical signs for the furtherance of His work or the emphasizing and enforcing of His teaching. He knew their futility for the purpose of bringing real conviction to men (Lk 16<sup>21</sup>). And the strenuous effort of His life was to resist these unspiritual conceptions of truth and reality.

The request for a sign in confirmation of His teaching He uniformly refused. The apparent response in Jn 2<sup>18</sup> is no exception. The sign He would give would be granted only in its due place as His career was consummated by His own resurrection. Jn 6<sup>26</sup> contains an apparent commenda-tion of those who accepted Him because of His wonder-working, but it was only a relative commendation in comparison with the far lower spirit which was unconcerned about any spiritual authority so long as their physical wants were easily and bountifully provided. Lk 7<sup>21-22</sup> on the surface appears to be a sign given for the sake of convincing John the Baptist, and if ever our Lord could have departed from His habitual way, it was to help that lone prisoner, suffering mental and spiritual anguish because the work Messiah was doing was so unlike what he had expected—deeds of quiet beneficence instead of sharp vengeance against iniquity. But the action sprang out of the Divine impulse as our Lord, deeply moved by John's doubt, realized afresh that to bless and heal men was the truest mark of One sent of God.

Jesus resolutely and persistently refused to give any external sign for the sake of evidencing His claims, and only in the most chary manner spoke of His miracles as signs. He chose rather to call them fora ('works') arising out of the need of man and prompted by His own inner life in response to that need (see art. MIRACLES). His works were 'signs' because they were part of His whole revelation of God, and elsewhere He regards opportunities for His miracles as occasions for the manifestation of the works of God (Jn 93), or for the glorifying of Himself (114). Self-manifestation and Divine revelation were identical in the mind of Jesus (1413). Clearly our Lord only refrained from applying the word σημεία to His miracles because of the general associations of the word. To Him they were vital parts of the revelation of Divine power which He came to give.

A very particular and urgently-pressed demand for a sign 'in the heavens' is recorded in Mt 12<sup>38-41</sup> 16<sup>1-4</sup>, Mk 8<sup>11-12</sup>, and Lk 11<sup>16</sup>. <sup>29-22</sup>. The various accounts give a full idea of the occasion, or occasions. Mk. records the astonishment and bewilderment of Jesus at such a claim made by those who professed to be religious leaders. In an age which was full of signs, in which He Himself had been the most signal manifestation of the Divine presence and power, these religious teachers were still asking for signs. 'Why doth this generation seek after a sign? No sign shall be given.' Mt. and Lk. record our Lord's answer that no sign should be given but that of Jonah. Lk. gives the explanation of that sign to the Ninevites as consisting in the man and his message, not in his deliverance from the sea-monster, which they could only have believed on the strength of their faith in the man himself. Mt 161-4 gives the same interpretation, as also does Mt 122-3-41, which forms a consistent whole and regards Jonah's preaching as the sign. Mt 1240, with its parallel to the Resurrection of Jesus, must be regarded as an afterthought incorporated incongruously into the narrative. And the chief point is that our Lord declares that the one Divine sign to that generation was Himself, the Son of Man, His Person and His teaching. Simeon, under the exaltation of the Spirit, gives expression to the same essential truth (Lk 234). Jesus entirely severs Himself from the common conception of a sign. A mere sign was the prodigy desired by an evil generation; His 'works' were signs in the truer and higher sense of having in them a spiritual and Divine significance, and as pointing to greater possibilities of soul and higher regions of reality. They were signs of the Divine power and life which dwelt in Himself.

Jn 10<sup>41</sup>, declaring the embarrassment felt by those who were conscious of the truth of the Baptist's message regarding Christ, together with the fact that he 'wrought no sign,' is witness that more spiritual conceptions were breaking through the ancient crust of superstition. And the Fourth Gospel is evidence that one Evangelist was able to disentangle the spiritual and ethical from the material and catastrophic. The conceptions of Christ's power set forth in this Gospel are of a distinctly more spiritual order. The word used by the writer is invariably σημέων (Jn 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>54</sup>, etc.), and there are plain indications that the truer and higher significance was attached to it. The value of the sign is seen to be its revealing quality. The miracle of the Cana-marriage is described as the beginning of His signs, in which He manifested forth His glory (ἐφανέρωσε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ), showing that the disciple had truly apprehended the Master's teaching.

SILENCE.— 'Speech is of time, Silence is of Eternity. Thought will not work except in Silence; neither will Virtue work except in Scerecy.' Carlyle's words (Sart. 151) are well known and profoundly true. The silences of great men are often more significant and self-revealing than their words. Silence has an eloquence that speech cannot rival. It is in silence that souls meet and strong emotions pass from one to the other. This is peculiarly true of Jesus, whose character can never be fathomed without a special study of His silences. The sayings of Jesus are limpid gems of ethical thought, flawless in their purity, enunciating principles of universal applicability. His deeds are the perfect expression of His sineless nature. But His silences are as essentially significant of the impression He made upon the world, for they reveal the spiritual atmosphere in which He lived and which determined His attitude to human life and to the problems of human nature.

1. For thirty years after His advent, Jesus was silent as to His mission. He allowed Himself ample time for the natural development of all His powers and faculties. He passed through the ordinary phases of childhood, boyhood, youth, and attained the maturity of manhood before He took up the burden of His brief career. It is the lesson of self-repression, of concentrated preparation for a great work. Jesus took no step He was obliged on maturer consideration to retract.

2. And before He took up His lifework there is a still deeper and more significant silence, the silence of the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>, Mk 1<sup>12-13</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1-13</sup>). Acts are but symbols, the true human drama is the drama of the soul. All epoch-making events have been lived through in some human soul before they emerged upon the arena of history. It was in the monastery of Erfurt that the Reformation was wrought out. It was in the cave of Manresa its victorious progress was stayed. And it was in the wilderness that Jesus lived His life, fought His tremendous battle with evil, faced every possible contingency of temptation, and came out victorious. In the silence of His own great soul was the campaign finished and the adversary baffled.

3. After the ordeal in the wilderness, Jesus began His active career, which was merely the symbol and seal of the victory already gained. The Synoptists are uniform in asserting that during the greater part of His ministry He was silent as to His Messialiship and His supernatural origin. His teaching, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a summary, is purely ethical. The first indication of any recognition of His true nature is to be found in the striking incident near Cæsarea Philippi, and it is significant that it is the spontaneous acclamation of His own disciples. It is Peter who gives expression to the general feeling in the historic words, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Peter's confession draws forth the immediate injunction to the disciples that they tell no man that He was Jesus the Christ (Mt 1620). This silence of Jesus as to His Messiahship was not merely, or mainly, from motives of prudence. It was because the only homage He valued was the homage that sprang from a real perception of the inherent Divineness of His character. He sought to draw out of men a recognition of His Divine nature by the sheer force of His Personality. It was the tribute of the heart, the spontaneous uprising of the spiritual instinct in response to His Godhood, that alone had ethical worth. The mere tribute of the lips, the result of convention or authority, was meaningless to Him. Jesus was silent in order that those who knew and loved Him, and in whose soul the Divine energy was working, might testify of Him.

4. The silence of Jesus regarding His miracles is significant of His own attitude towards them (Mk 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 5<sup>14</sup>). Silence here cannot have been from prudential considerations, for miracles must undoubtedly have enhanced His reputation among the people, and it was His refusal to work miracles to gratify the Pharisees that formed the ground their offence against Him (Mt 16<sup>16.</sup>). But Jesus knew how little miracles really proved. He knew that the faith given to Him merely on account of the physical marvels He did was on a distinctly lower level than the soul's spontaneous recognition of His spiritual transcendence (Jn 14<sup>11</sup>). He was afraid that the unhealthy craving of a superstitious people would dull their perception of ethical truth.

5. Very striking is the silence of Jesus to direct questions asked. He never ignores a question sincerely put, or even when it is put as a challenge, but He rarely gives it a categorical answer (Mt 11<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>23</sup> 22<sup>16, 34</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 13<sup>13</sup>). He generally rises above the individual case and settles the general principle of which it is an instance. Jesus knew what was in men. He answers their thought rather than their words. Soul meets soul with no interposing medium of physical utterance. The sincere seeker after truth gets a truth deeper than he dreamt of, while the insincere casuist is put to silence.

6. There are various striking silences of Jesus to individuals which have each its own peculiar meaning. (1) The silence of probation (Mt 15<sup>28</sup>). When the Syrophomician woman pleads with Jesus to cure her daughter, He answers her not a word. When she persists in her pleading, in spite of all dissuasion, He speaks, but the ethical restriction of the two is strangely invested. The position of the two is strangely inverted. The words of Jesus breathe the narrowness of Judaism. Those of the woman reflect the universality of the This silence of Jesus to her pitiful entreaty is the silence of probation. He recognizes her faith; and because He sees it will stand the strain, He tests it to the uttermost. See SYRO-PHŒNICIAN WOMAN.

(2) The silence of horror (Mt 1413). When Jesus heard of the death of John the Baptist, He said no word, but departed into a desert place to calm the tumult of His spirit in silence. The iniquity of the world He had come to redeem swept over the pure spirit of Jesus with such overwhelming force that utterance was choked, and His human nature had to seek, in silence, communion with the Father in order to regain its equanimity. It is a silence more eloquent than words of vehement denunciation would have been. It is the instinctive shrinking of a high nature from the grossness and baseness of sin.

(3) The silence of shame (Jn 86). The Pericope Adulteræ, though not in the original Gospel of St. John, must have belonged to a very early tradition. It is the birth of the Christian grace of modesty. When confronted with the woman, Jesus is silent, stoops down, and writes upon the ground. averts His face from the shameful spectacle. is filled with pity and sorrow for the woman who has lost the virgin glory of her womanhood, and with indignation against the men whose shameless indelicacy in exposing her fault shows that they utterly fail to realize in what the true gravamen of her offence consists. To the pure soul of Jesus the sin of the one is greater than the sin of the other. Hence His words, 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.' The rebuke strikes home, the sense of shame flushes their cheeks, and the woman's accusers silently steal

(4) The silence of indignation (Mt 2663, Mk 1461). (4) The sucree of mangration (Mt 22°, Mt 14°). Jesus, after His apprehension, was first led before Caiaphas, the high priest. Caiaphas sought to incriminate Him by bringing against Him witnesses who made garbled and irrelevant statements of words they had heard Him utter. The high priest urged Him to say something in His defence, but Jesus held His peace. It was the silence of indignations of the same statement of the same same statement. tion against the utter mockery of His trial and the attitude of the time-serving president of the Court.

(5) The silence of contempt (Lk 23°). Herod was a different type. He is the representative of superstitious profligacy. Herod was a weak man, with a conscience certainly, but a conscience that could be touched only by his superstitious fears. He liked to have a saint under his patronage, provided the saint would be pliable enough to leave his patron's vices unrebuked. He had tried John the Baptist, but that experiment had failed, and now he would try Jesus. And so he questioned Him in many words, but Jesus answered him nothing. Here is apparently a seeker after truth to whom Jesus has nothing to say. It is not so. The gospel refuses the patronage of the vicious. Jesus has nothing to say to craven superstition seeking to condone its own vices by taking religion under its

(6) The silence of self-containment (Jn 199). Pilate, again, represents another and a higher type. To him Jesus opened Himself more fully than to any of His judges. He recognized in him one whose instincts were those of a capable and genuine ruler, and He sympathized with the dilemma in which Pilate was placed. Though the final decision rested with Pilate, he was the least guilty of all who were responsible for the tragedy of Calvary (Jn 1911). In Pilate's soul a great struggle was going 19<sup>11</sup>). In Pilate's soul a great struggle was going on. He was looking for a way of escape from a difficult situation, but he dared not take the only way that true magnanimity required. He dared not be true to his own high function of asserting the impartial justice of Imperial Rome, and the result was moral ruin. It is always so with Jesus. To the soul that once recognizes His claims no half measures are possible. It is all or nothing—absolute loyalty or a treason that leads downwards to the pit. And Jesus had a clear perception of the character of the Roman ruler, who alone had insight enough to recognize the essential greatness of his prisoner. One imperial soul met another. On the plane on which they met there was no difficulty of intercommunication. Jesus has no hesitation in asserting His royalty and His claim to be the Revealer of eternal truth. Pilate has culture enough at least to understand what He means, and his scepticism is the scepticism of sadmeans, and his scepticism is the scepticism of sadness and perplexity rather than of scorn. But when Pilate, struck with the largeness of soul displayed by Jesus, touches on the higher mysteries, He is silent. To the question, 'Whence art thou?' Jesus has nothing to say. It is not that He fears to commit Himself. It is simply that He cannot give an answer that would be intelligible to Pilate.

(7) The silence of self-absorption. There have been many commentaries on the seven words of Jesus on the cross, but His silence there is as striking as His speech. Jesus has nothing to say to the jeers and mockery of the infuriated people, or to the taunts of priests and Pharisees. He is self-absorbed. For the self-hood of Jesus is His mission, His purpose, the idea of His life. And even in the agony of the cruelest death the malignity of man has ever devised, He is not shaken out of this self-absorption. His words have all reference to the central idea which constitutes His earthly existence. Pity for sinning humanity, love for those whose hearts are His, His attitude to the Father with whom all along He has realized His oneness,—these are the emotions that dominate His soul. There is not even the faintest trace of anger against those who have wreaked their vengeance upon Him. There is scarcely even a consciousness of their presence.

7. It is instructive to note the different valuation put upon speech and silence by Jesus and those who surrounded Him. Jesus silenced the Sadducees when they propounded to Him knotty points of theology (Mt 2224), and suffered not the demons to speak (Mk 124). But when the multitude rebuked the blind men who cried importunately to Him at the gate of Jericho, Jesus listened to their appeal (Mt 20<sup>31</sup>); and when the disciples sought to silence the mothers who brought their children to be blessed, Jesus encouraged them with one of His most striking and characteristic sayings (Mt 1913, Mk 10<sup>13</sup>, Lk 18<sup>15</sup>). And, further, He who in the earlier part of His career carefully concealed His Messiahship from the people, on the critical occasion when He made His triumphant entry into Jerusalem gave an emphatic refusal to silence the acclamations with which He was hailed by the people.

SILOAM.—Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) places the spring at the mouth of the Tyroporon Valley. This, and references of later writers, point to Birket Silvan, on the slope S. of the Temple area. A larger pool, Birket of Hamra, now almost filled up, lies lower in the valley. Birket Silvan is built within the rock hewn space occupied by the original pool, 75 ft. ×71 ft. The water was approached by steps cut in the rock. In NT times a covered areade within the pool, 22 ft. high and 12 ft. wide, ran round the four sides. From 'Am 12 ft. wide, ran round the four sides. From 'Am Sitti Maryam, the Fountain of the Virgin, on the slope below the eastern battlements, a conduit led the water to the pool; but, probably in Hezekiah's time, a tunnel was cut through the rock, and the fountain apparently covered over, as Josephus does not seem to have known it apart from Siloam. An inscription in ancient Heb. characters was found on the wall of the tunnel in 1880, which gives an account of the cutting. The tunnel is about \( \frac{1}{2} \) of a mile in length. It is bent as if to avoid obstructions. Two shafts to the surface, at important points, would afford guidance as to direction.

The spring is intermittent. During the rains it may flow twice a day, but in the late summer, once in two days. Such springs are held in superstitious reverence, and credited with power to heal many diseases. Josephus pronounces the water good and plentiful, and says that this and other fountains flowed more copiously after falling into the hands of Titus.

The phrase 'tower in Siloam' (Lk 134) perhaps indicates that this part of the city was called Siloam, 'the tower' being part of the adjoining

On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, water from this fountain was poured on the altar (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 145). In the 10th cent, the water was 'good' (Mukaddasi); it is good no longer, percolating, as it does, through vast accumulations of refuse. The village of Siloam, accumulations of refuse. The village of Siloan, Kefr Naturin, on the E. slope of the valley, over against the pool, dates from post Arab times. Its handful of poor inhabitants still use the impure water for domestic purposes. W. EWING.

BIMEON (Συμεών) is a transliteration into Greek of the common Heb, name pyce, which is first met with as that of the second son of Jacob and Leah in Gn 29%, where a derivation from ppp, 'hear,' is suggested.

Of the lineage or descendants of Simeon no contemporary evidence has survived; and for the man himself St. Luke is our only authority.

Simeon is described as (1) 'righteous and devout,' or conscientious in regard to God and His law (cf. Ac 2211); (2) as looking for the Messiah; and (3) as moved by the Holy Spirit (not merely the spirit of prophecy) to believe that he would not die before he had seen the Messiah. Guided by the Spirit to the courts of the Temple, he no sooner saw Jesus there than the words of the famous Nanc Dimetter. (wh. see) rose to his lips. Whilst Mary was wonder-ing at the meaning of such words, Simeon turned to her and forefold the diverse results of the mission of Jesus. A stumbling block and an offence to some, it would be the inspiration of a new life to others; and with her own blessedness would mingle anguish unspeakable. In the issue the deepest needs of many souls would be excited and met, and men's hearts would be probed, enriched, and satisfied. After this brief appearance in history, Simeon passes again into obscurity, leaving only a few imperiabable words behind him,

SIMON. -- The form Simon is not a transcription of prov, but is either a contraction for Simcon or an independent Greek name. The latter view is much the more probable. In the NT the name is frequent. The Gospels mention—1. Simon the brother of our Lord (Mt 13<sup>26</sup>, Mk 6<sup>2</sup>). 2. Simon the Zealot (see CANANÆAN), one of the twelve Apostles (Mk 3<sup>26</sup>). 3. Simon of Cyrene, who was impressed to bear our Lord's cross (Mt 272 ). L. Simon 'the leper,' in whose house the amointing of our Lord by Mary of Bethany took place (Mt 266, Mk 143). S. Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anomated our Lord's head and feet (Lk 7267). See Anointing. 6. Simon the father of Judas Iscariot (Jn 671 132.18). 7. Simon Peter. See PETER. W. 1. The leading passage is Mt 622. In that chapter Jesus expounds the first great commandment touching our duty to God, as in 71-12 He enforces the second, which concerns our duty to man (cf. The form of the teaching was determined by Pharisaism, which serves as a dark foil for the truth. Outwardly religious, the Pharisees were essentially worldly. Professing ostentatiously to be servants of God and shepherds of the people, they were oppressors of the people and servants of their own selfish ambitions. Thus they lived a double life, loving the praise of men more than the praise of God. Over against their worldliness, with its doubleness and hypocrisy, Jesus sets before us the obligation to obey and please God in everything as our supreme duty (vv. 1-18), while in vv. 18-27 He meets our unbelieving fear that such a course would bring loss and bankruptcy, by assuring us that we may well trust our Heavenly Father's care. It is all summed up in v. 252. in the command to seek first God's Kingdom and righteousness and in the first God's Kingdom and righteousness, and in the promise that He will give all needful earthly good, so that we need not worry. That this singleness of aim is the main thought, is clear from the illustration He employs in v.2. The 'single' eye is that which looks at one object alone, and sees that clearly; as contrasted with it, the 'evil' eye is that which (not 'sees double,' but) endeavours to look at two objects at the same time (and the context suggests two in opposite directions), and therefore sees neither clearly. The natural antithesis to ἀπλοῦς would have been διπλοῦς, instead of which πορηρός is used, both to turn attention sharply from the physical to the moral which it was meant to illustrate, and, by avoiding the thought of 'seeing double,' which διπλοῦ: in itself would naturally suggest, to make it easier to think of the unusual attempt to see things in opposite directions, and so pass to the common moral experience of cherishing, as objects of ambition, things that are diametrically opposed. Accordingly, ποσηρός must be interpreted as 'evil' in this particular sense. For the double aim to serve God and mammon is evil, both in its very nature, as being really a rejection of the sole sovereignty of God, and in its results, as leading inevitably to the double life with its darkness and doom. Such a life is only apparently possible. Really it is impossible; a choice must be made. We cannot serve God and mammon. Pharisees and the property of the control of the con could not believe, because they sought glory from one another rather than the glory that comes from God (Jn 5<sup>44</sup>; cf. Jn 12<sup>127</sup>.). Life becomes simple when we accept God's will as our law and His Kingdom as the object of our endeavour. And that life leads to the blessings here mentioned. It floods the whole being with light. It means, as surely as God cares for birds and flowers (v.2), that He will care for our temporal needs better than any man can care for himself, though he be rich, cultured, and powerful as King Solomon (vv.25-23). Moreover, it ensures imperishable treasures in heaven (v.¹¹).

2. The passage in Lk. (11³¹²³³) is to the same effect. That wicked generation forms the background (v.²²). Some of them had charged Jesus with being in league with Beelzebub (v.¹¹⁵; Mt. calls them 'Pharisees,' 12²⁴; Mk. 'scribes,' 3²²). In refuting that charge, He declares that it is by the finger of God He casts out demons, and that therefore in Him the Kingdom of God has come near to them (v.²³). The man who is not with Him is against Him (v.²³), and therefore against God. None such can be blessed, but only those who hear God's word and keep it (v.²³). Then to the thronging multitudes He points out the sin of that generation (v.²³). He is a sign to them, as Jonah was to Nineveh. But inasmuch as He is superior to Jonah and all who have gone before Him (vv.³¹.²²), and His light has not been hidden, but conspicuous (v.³³), He has, with unparalleled clearness, presented to men God's claim upon themselves. Then, with a swift turn to personal warning and appeal (shown in the singular pronoun), He declares to each of them that, if he strives to lead the double life, he will inevitably be guilty of refusing God's claim, and so will sink into darkness and condemnation; but if, with single-eyed devotion, he heeds God's message and claim, he shall be filled with light and blessedness.

3. Very similar to this is the thought in Mt 1116-30, though the word ἀπλοῦς is not employed. The upbraided cities, with much formal religion, were yet devoted to mammon and had no real heart for God. Hence their darkened judgment, as shown by their inability to understand John or Jesus, and hence their inevitable doom. Over against these worldly 'wise and understanding' people Jesus sets the 'babes'—those who, less wise in their generation than the children of the world (cf. Lk 169), cry out in their need and helplessness not for the world's prizes, but for the One they must have, even the Father. Their cry the Father answers; to all such the Son gives rest. The same idea is expressed pointedly in Lk 1020 ('rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven') and Lk 1042, where the one thing needful is to listen to Him. This passage (Mt 1116-30) shows how easily the transition is made from 'singleness of the world this may seem foolishness, but in Jesus' thought it is wisdom (1118). It is a mark of those in His Kingdom (Mt 1832, Mk 1015, Lk 1815-17). Apart from these, there are only two or three passages that properly belong here. One is Mt 1016. The Eng. 'harmless,' based on a false derivation of dxfραιος, is unfortunate. It should be 'guileless' or 'simple' as in the Lat. and many Eng. versions. Prudence alone may lead to trickery; simplicity alone, to silliness. The Apostles are to be both prudent and guileless. Nathanael is already an illustration of it—it constitutes the true spiritual Israelite (Jn 149).

is already an illustration of it—it constitutes the true spiritual Israelite (Jn 148).

Such is the gospel conception of the simple life—a life of trustful obedience to the will of God. It will manifest itself in various ways:—in unequivocal speech (Mt 5<sup>57</sup>); in healthy independence of the opinion of men (Mt 6<sup>1.5</sup> etc., Jn 5<sup>41</sup>); in judgments based on principle and reality rather than on appearance or custom—as about the Sabbath (Mk 2<sup>22</sup>-3<sup>6</sup>) and the two anointings (Lk 7<sup>34-40</sup>, Mk 14<sup>4-9</sup>); in righteousness (Mt 6<sup>25</sup>), calm (Mt 12<sup>19</sup>, 11<sup>29</sup>), courage (Mt 14<sup>4</sup>), etc. It is indeed the very root of all virtue, the very heart of the Christian life. It underlies all Christ's teachings. To exhaust it in all its implications would be to exhaust the Gospels.

Jesus Himself is in this, as in all other matters, the incarnation, the living illustration, of His own teachings. His first recorded utterance strikes that note (Lk 2<sup>46</sup> AV); it reappears on the threshold of His public career (Mt 3<sup>26</sup>), repeatedly in the course of His ministry in conversations with disciples or controversies with opponents (Jn 4<sup>34</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>2-47</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>), and even in His prayer to the Father toward its close (17<sup>4</sup>). And, as we study His conduct and character as He moves in the midst of friends and foes, we can see how unfailingly that life of single-hearted devotion to God is marked by insight and wisdom; courage and calm; stedfastness and consistency; beauty and strength; loyalty, patience, and heroism; righteousness, truth, and love; grace, majesty, and blessedness. It cuts a straight path through all the shams and sophistries of men, and rises victorious over all weakness and worry, all waywardness and wickedness.

SIN.—Sin is personal hostility to the will of God. Christian teaching with regard to it is relative to the facts of the gospel, being necessarily implied by the death of Christ considered as a work of redemption. It is the Christian interpretation of facts of experience, which are independent of any explanation of life, whether offered by theology, philosophy, or scientific theory. Its value is irrespective of the view which historical criticism may suggest of the literature of the OT. Neither is it affected by theories of the organic development of the world or human life derived from modern biological thought. Philosophic systems, monistic or otherwise, cannot be allowed to govern or modify a doctrine which in the first instance can be tested only by relation to beliefs grounded not upon metaphysic, but experience. The Christian will rather hold that a philosophic theory inadequate to the facts of the gospel has been too hastily identified with reality.

identified with reality. 1. The gospel never rises above the limits of its first publication as the Kingdom of God (Mk 114-No doubt the terms are deepened and spiritualized, as well by the subsequent teaching of Jesus (Lk 17° 19¹¹, Ac 1′¹ 6) as by the accomplishment of His atoning work (Lk 24 *** 6). But though what might have remained an external and almost physical conception became the manifestation of one eternal life (Jn 3<sup>15, 16</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1-8</sup>), nevertheless the Church of the living God (1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>), the relation of a people of possession to their rightful Lord, King, and Father (Tit 214) is constant. Allegiance, faith, sonship are the marks of those who share the membership of this Kingdom. What Jesus the Messiah found was disobedience and disloyalty. Human life, as He was called upon to deal with it, involved subjection to another prince (Jn 1430), bondage to another master (834), 'sonship' to another 'father' (844). (8<sup>34</sup>). To the consciousness of Jesus, Satan was present, not as a convenient personification of evil that became actual only in the individual wills of men, but as the author of sin, the person in whom evil has its spring, even as God is the fount of life. Jesus' sense of dependence upon the Father did not carry with it a monism which saw God in all and all in God. For Him, as for St. John, the whole world lay in the Evil One (1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>, cf. Lk 45.6). His own conflict was with the prince of this world (Jn 1430). To be delivered from the Evil One was the converse of being brought into temptation (Mt 613: the insertion of all in Mt., and the absence of the clause in the best MSS of Lk 114 suggest that it is correlative to the preceding clause, representing the same act differently). had seen Satan fallen as lightning from heaven (Lk 10<sup>18</sup>). Over against the Kingdom of God was the kingdom of Satan (Mt 12<sup>26-28</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>, cf. Rev 16<sup>10</sup>). The drama of human life was accomplished in presence of this already existing dualism. Christ assumes the current Hebrew conception of a world of spiritual personalities under the leadership of Beelzebub (Lk 11<sup>14-26</sup>). The stampede of the swine at Gerasa witnesses to their control, within the limits of Divine permission, over natural forces (Mk 5<sup>13</sup>). Physical disease results from Satan's bondage (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). Possession by demons is an denoting the first state of its influence over human beings (e.g. Mk 9<sup>20-22</sup>). And all opposition to the purpose of God is inspired by Satan (Jn 8<sup>42-47</sup>). The Jews were of their father the devil, so that the works wrought by them were antithetic to the works of God manifested in Jesus (v.4). Even the chosen Twelve Satan had asked to have, that he might sift them as wheat (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>). So the Passion was a continuation of the Temptation, a direct agony and death struggle wherein the prince of this world was cast out (Jn 12<sup>31</sup> 16<sup>11</sup>), the strong man spoiled (Lk 11<sup>21</sup>).

From the first the proclamation of the good news, accompanied as it was with the curing of diseases and the casting out of demons (Mt 10<sup>7, 8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1, 2</sup>), witnessed to the real character of Christ's work as redemption, ransom, and salvation. For the true unification between the normal and universal purpose of the gospel-the forgiveness of sins-and the occasional and particular accessories of it-exorcism and healing—lay not so much in the analogy be-tween bodily disease and spiritual wickedness, as in the fact that both are the exercise of the one Satanic power within the usurped kingdom of evil. No doubt there is a certain suggestiveness in the parallel between disease and sin, which Jesus Himself recognized. But there is nothing in His teaching to suggest the later ideas of taint, infection, vitiated nature. It is trespasses which the Heavenly Father must do away, and that by forgiveness (Mt 6<sup>18</sup>); salvation from sins (1<sup>21</sup>), i.e. actions involving guilt, is implied by the name Jesus (see art. Guilt). The bringing forth of the people from Pharaoh's bondage to serve Jehovah is the ancient experience which is before the mind of devout men under the old covenant as the pattern of the deliverance which Messiah was to accomplish (Mt 215, cf. Hos 111). Salvation is therefore not the restoration of spiritual health, but the liberation of God's people from an evil service. The ministry of the Son of Man consists in giving His life a ransom (Mk 10<sup>46</sup>, Mt 20<sup>26</sup>; cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>). And the Fourth Evangelist only interprets the mind of the Master when he speaks of Jesus as dying for the nation, and destined to gather together into one the scattered children of God (Jn 1151, 52). He was the shepherd bringing home. the lost sheep dispersed upon the mountains (1016); or, somewhat to vary the idea, the Redeemer coming into the world, not to judge it along with 131. 47 17<sup>15</sup>), and casting out the Evil One (3<sup>17</sup>. 18<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>31. 47</sup> 17<sup>15</sup>), and casting out the indwelling Satan by the finger or Spirit of God (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). The acceptable year of the Lord is a year of release (4<sup>18. 19</sup>).

2. From the implications of the Gospel narrative we pass to the theology of the Epistles. In order to gain a clear view of St. Paul's doctrine of sin in its completeness, it is necessary to go behind the Epistle to the Romans. We must bear in mind, first of all, the essentially Jewish basis of his thought. To him salvation, or redemption, carried all the associations which had gathered round it in Hebrew history. The Kingdom of Messiah was a Hebrew history. The Kingdom of Messiah was a vivid reality, and the earlier Epistles show that at first he was not without the common anticipation of its immediate establishment in manifested power. Satan was a concrete fact. If at one time it was the Spirit of Jesus that suffered him not (Ac 167), at another Satan hindered him (1 Th 218). thorn in the flesh was a messenger of Satan (2 Co The Christian is armed in order to ward off the fiery darts of the Evil One (Eph 616). Principalities and powers were the unseen antagonists of Christ's servants (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>, cf. Lk 22<sup>63</sup>), the enemies over whom Christ triumphed in the Cross (Col 215). If Messiah was to be manifested at the Parousia, Satan was also destined to be manifested in the Man of Sin (2 Th 2<sup>3-11</sup>). A remarkable parallel to the conception of 'the Evil One,' which appears both in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel, is found in 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph 2²). The same passage describes those who become sons of God as by nature children of wrath (2³), dead not in sin but through trespasses (v. ⁵), sons of disobedience because inwrought by this evil spirit (v. ²). Demons are as much part of St. Paul's world as of that which appears in the Synoptists. He identifies them with the heathen gods (1 Co 10²°. ²). Belial is the antithesis of Christ (2 Co 6¹⁵). To lapse from Christian conduct is to turn aside after Satan (1 Ti 5¹°); to be separated from Christian fellowship is to be delivered to Satan (1 Co 5⁵, 1 Ti 1²°). And that redemption meant primarily for St. Paul translation from the kingdom of Satan to the Kingdom of God (Col 1²¹), is attested by the form in which he narrates before Agrippa the story of his commission as Apostle of the Gentiles (Ac 26¹⁵). All this is in close correspondence with the mind of Jesus, and must be brought with us to a closer examination of the Pauline doctrine of sin.

That sin is essentially disloyalty to God is the substance of the locus classicus on the nature of sin, Ro 1<sup>18-32</sup> 'Knowing God, they glorified him not as God, neither gave thanks' (v. <sup>21</sup>). It will be observed, first, that the Apostle here speaks of sin in its widest signification, including such distinctions as are involved in the theological conceptions of original and actual. We have here, therefore, a definition of sin which must govern all subsequent uses of the term. All the elements which enter into particular sins, or transgressions of known law, are represented—knowledge of God and dependence upon Him (v. <sup>20</sup>), wilful and therefore inexcusable refusal of due homage (v. <sup>21</sup>), the incurring of guilt and consequently of God's wrath (v. <sup>18</sup>). Further, it is noticeable that the plural 'men,' not the collective 'man,' is used throughout the passage. There is nothing abstract in this general view of sin, even though it be universal (cf. 'all sinned,' Ro 5<sup>12</sup>; 'all died,' 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). Another point is, that St. Paul is led to disclose this 'vision of sin' as the necessary postulate of the gospel (Ro 1<sup>18-18</sup>), in which is revealed a righteousness of God' (v. <sup>17</sup> 3<sup>21</sup>). Lastly, there is no confusion, as in the popular mind, between those physical excesses which are called vice, and the inward refusal 'to have God in their knowledge' (v. <sup>28</sup>), whether it applies to the sensuous or the spiritual nature of men, which alone is sin. 'God gave them up unto a reprobate mind' (v. <sup>28</sup>), with all its consequences to the complex personality of man. This is of great significance. St. Paul's appeal is not to the equivocal testimony of external facts, which considered in themselves are non-moral, but to facts as interpreted by conscience. Fundamentally this is the appeal to personal experience, and it is clear from the Epistle to the Romans, as from the whole Pauline theology, that the Apostle is universalizing this own experience, as he saw himself in the light of the vision of Jesus of Nazareth (Gal 1<sup>11-17</sup>, Ro

Now St. Paul expresses his relation to sin in the phrase 'sin dwelleth in me' (Ro 7<sup>17</sup>). He is describing the common experience of an inward struggle, when neither good nor evil is finally in the ascendant. The complete sinful condition would be one of consent (Ro 1<sup>23</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>), in which 'the law of sin' was unchecked by 'the law of the mind' (Ro 7<sup>23</sup>, Gal 5<sup>17</sup>). The terms must not be misunderstood in view of the modern conception of scientific law. 'Law' in St. Paul's theology involves the personality of the lawgiver, so that to find this 'law in the members' (Ro 7<sup>23</sup>), to be inwrought by sin, seems to point to an indwelling spiritual presence. Is this a mere figure? St. Paul reverts to it in a still more significant form. Christians are not to let sin reign in their mortal bodies (Ro 6<sup>12</sup>). Compliance with evil involves an obedience between those who, as alive in Christ Jesus, are servants of God, and those who being dead in trespasses serve sin (vv. 16-28). Two hostile kingtrespasses serve sin (vv. **-**). Two nostne kingdoms, two rival loyalties, make their claim upon a man's allegiance. So, when under the form of 'Adam's transgression,' sin is considered in its universal aspect (Ro 514), a personal sovereignty is again suggested—'death,' i.e. sin in its consequent development, 'reigned through the one' (v. **17). The effect of Adam's transgression is represented as the establishment of an authority (cf. 1 Co 1524). as the establishment of an authority (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>, Eph 2<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>) over his descendants rather than as a corruption of their nature, carrying with it therefore condemnation (Ro 5<sup>18</sup>; see art. GUILT) as the due sentence of God upon those who reject This personal embodiment of hostility to His law. the Divine law and government, in view of St. Paul's general outlook on the spiritual world, can be none other than Satan, exercising, as captain of spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>), not an external compulsion but an inward influence, not therefore impairing the responsible personalities that are indwelt. Thus responsible personalities that are indwelt. Thus St. Paul can say, 'Death passed unto all men, for that all sinned' (Ro 5<sup>12</sup>). Sin is always a personal attitude, never a pathological condition. Death is its consequence (v.<sup>13</sup>), but the physical analogy of St. James (1<sup>16</sup>) has no parallel in St. Paul. It is always the sentence, punishment, or wages (6<sup>23</sup>; see art. GUILT), the sequel to the righteous judgment of God (2<sup>3</sup>). So, too, salvation is not a remedy for mortal disease, but a personal act of kindness and mercy on the part of an offended but kindness and mercy on the part of an offended but loving God (Eph 1<sup>b-10</sup> 2<sup>7</sup>, Tit 3<sup>4-6</sup>). Looking to the state from which men are rescued, it is redemption state from which men are rescued, it is redemption (Gal 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>); looking to that into which they are brought, it is reconciliation (Ro 5<sup>16, 11</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>18, 19</sup>). Both involve the personal action of the Father's loving will, whereby He chooses to forgive the past and bring back His children into fellowship with Himself (Ro 5<sup>8-8</sup>, Col 1<sup>18-22</sup>; cf. 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>). As applied to the individual, this is justification (Ro 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>9</sup> al.), which represents not a process of renewal, but an amnesty extended to the sinner. What Christ slew by the Cross was the enmity What Christ slew by the Cross was the enmity (Eph 2<sup>15, 16</sup>). Its effect, therefore, is not an infused righteousness, but a free pardon whereby sins are no longer reckoned (Ro 4<sup>7-8</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>).

3. The rest of the NT is in general agreement with St. Paul. St. James, though he speaks of sin as the intermediate stage between lust and death (Ja 1<sup>15</sup>), yet by the very figure used to describe their relationship, clearly recognizes that all three are essentially the same in kind. Lust is not animal impulse but undeveloped sin. The sinner is one who has committed sins (5<sup>16</sup>), which may be covered by repentance (v.<sup>20</sup>) and forgiven in answer to prayer (v.<sup>15</sup>). Sins, therefore, are personal transgressions against God, which, if unremitted, involve judgment (v.<sup>12</sup>), a personal condemnation and sentence on the part of the Judge (4<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>). Lust is not even a pathological condition of the will. It has the nature of sin, being not a result of ignorance, but essentially a personal determination of will. This is more clearly brought out by the assertion that lust, not God, is the tempter (1<sup>13-14</sup>), which suggests the presence of an evil will, the source of that friendship of the world which is enmity against God (4<sup>4</sup>), taking occasion of the natural passions and desires of men to influence spiritually the human personality. The wisdom which cometh down from above is set over against a wisdom

presence. Is this a mere figure? St. Paul reverts to it in a still more significant form. Christians are not to let sin reign in their mortal bodies (Ro 6<sup>12</sup>). Compliance with evil involves an obedience (v. 16), a slavery (v. 17). There is a close parallel manner of life from which we are redeemed by the blood of Him who bore our sins, i.e. our actual transgressions, that He might bring us to God (1<sup>18.19</sup> 2<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>). For the redeemed Christian it still exists in the person of God's enemy, who is now the adversary of God's people also, seeking once more to draw them away from their allegiance (5<sup>8</sup>).

St. John, with his profounder insight, gives to the doctrine of sin what is perhaps the widest and most comprehensive sweep in the NT. 'Sin is lawlessness' (1 Jn 3'). This sentence, with its coextensive subject and predicate, is all but a definition. It recognizes no distinction in kind between 'sin' and 'sins,' which are practically interchangeable in the Johannine writings. If the Lamb of God 'taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 12, Vulg. peccata mundi), the Son is manifested 'to take away sins' (1 Jn 3, If the blood cleanseth from all sin (1, Jesus Christ is the propitiation for our sins (22). The cleansing is sacrificial (ιλασμότ), implying personal dealings with God. It is therefore forgiveness of sins which those for whom it is prevalent receive (19 you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 846, cf. 1 P 222),—a clear record rather than a perfect state. That which abides in him who believes in the name of Levys (Jn 1222) in the levys of the Eather record Jesus (1 Jn 328) is the love of the Father, a personal relation having been established which is opposed to the love of the world (2<sup>15, 16</sup>). Here, however, is to the love of the world (2<sup>15, 19</sup>). Here, however, is no condemnation of the natural impulses or of matter. That Jesus Christ is come in the flesh to save the world is St. John's cardinal doctrine (4<sup>2</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>7</sup>). But, as with St. James and St. Peter, it is lust, and the corruption that is in the world through lust, which constitute the bandage form through lust, which constitute the bondage from which men need deliverance (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>4.5</sup>). What which head deriverance [150]. What then is lust? That is the point at which St John's whole view opens out before us. The Fourth Gospel has recorded the prayer of Christ for His disciples, not that they should be taken from the world, but that they might be kept from the Evil One (Jn 1715); and also His condemnation of the Jews because, continuing in the bondage of sin, it was their will to do the lusts not of their body, but of their father the devil (Jn 844). And the Apocalypse unfolds the mystery of iniquity in language fully accordant with the view of sin implied in the Gospel. The old serpent the devil (Rev 12° 20°) deceives the whole world (12° 20°. 10), having power (δύναμις, 13²) and even authority (εξουσία, 13³; cf. Lk 46) over the nations, manifesting his rule in the mystic Babylon (16¹9 17¹-6), and the kingdom of the beast (13 passim), until He who is the Alpha and Omega, having by His angel sealed the servants of God (7²-3), brings in the final salvation, the Kingdom of God and the authority of His Christ (1910). St. Icho's last word is written. of His Christ (1210). St. John's last word is written in the First Epistle. Behind human history is the devil, 'who sinneth from the beginning' (1 Jn 38). devil, 'who sinneth from the beginning' (I Jn 38). The explanation of human sin, therefore, is the relation of the world to this spirit. 'The whole world lieth in the evil one' (5<sup>19</sup>). To be begotten of God (3<sup>9</sup>), who is light (1<sup>8</sup>), truth (5<sup>20</sup>), and love (4<sup>8</sup>), is a reversal of those relations described as being 'of the devil' (3<sup>8</sup>), who is a murderer and liar (Jn 8<sup>24</sup>), and the power of darkness (I Jn 2<sup>11</sup>; ef. Lk 22<sup>63</sup>, Ac 26<sup>18</sup>). Philosophically, there can be little doubt that St. John is content with a dualism, which he is not concerned to resolve, starting as he does from the facts of experience (I Jn 1<sup>1</sup>). ing as he does from the facts of experience (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>; cf. Jn 19<sup>35</sup>). Though evil is antithetic to good, it is not in a Platonic sense as non-being (τὸ μη δν). The problem is approached from the positive and concrete standpoint of personality. Though God is indeed the beginning and the end (Rev 18 216 2213), yet a similar phrase is used in speaking of the author of evil as in describing the Word (1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup> 1<sup>1</sup>): both are 'from the beginning.' The final triumph, though complete, is represented symbolically as the imprisonment (Rev 20<sup>2. 3.7.10</sup>), not the annihilation, of Satan. The Hebrew mind, which, in spite of mystical affinities with Platonism and, possibly, of direct influence from Greek sources, is dominant in St. John, did not feel the necessity of a metaphysical monism, being content to respond to the revelation of a supreme spiritual Person, the fear of whom was the beginning of wisdom and man's chief end (Job 28<sup>28</sup>, Ps 111<sup>10</sup>, Ec 12<sup>13</sup>). It is enough to know that they who 'abide in him that is true' have by a transference of allegiance overcome the Evil One (1 Jn 218).

The Epistle of Jude, with which 2 Peter must be closely associated, clearly exhibits that apocalyptic view of the spiritual issues behind the facts of human life and experience of which there are abundant traces in the NT outside the Book of Revelation, and which indicate a 'war in heaven' (Rev 127) as the ultimate explanation of sin (Jude 6.9.14, 2 P 24 37.12). To the Jewish mind this language is not what Western thought would understand by mere symbol. It is rather the symbolic representation of real existence, the Hebrew equivalent of Greek mysteries. It is a mistake, therefore, to neglect either the Apocalypse or the apocalyptic passages of other writings in the interpretation of the NT, or to fail to perceive that their characteristic ideas underlie the theology of the Apostolic age, as the Platonic mould of the Apostone age, as the Flatone mount of thought governs the religious philosophy of the 4th cent., the biological that of the 19th. The contempt of millenarianism, while it banished much that was fantastic in Christian teaching, had the correspondingly unfortunate result of obliging interpreters of the NT to arrange its statements against a background not contemplated by the writers themselves. The result in the case of ain has been the assigning of inadequate and shifting values to the term, and the misapplication of physical or other analogies. For Apostolic Christianity the background is always God with His Kingdom of angels and men on the one hand, and on the other the devil with his angels, extending his usurped authority over those human servants whom he holds captive. Sin is active hostility to God.

4. The whole question of original sin is removed from the atmosphere in which it is usually discussed, when it is realized that the difference between sin and righteousness is not one of infused or implanted characters, but of relationship to God. It need not be either affirmed or denied that moral and spiritual tendencies are, like the physical organism, capable of transmission. Still more irrelevant is the discussion whether acquired characters descend by inheritance. These are questions for psychological research, and may be left for decision upon scientific grounds. No doubt theories of transmission, from the crudest Augustinian notions of sexual propagation to the subtlest doctrine of heredity, have been advanced by re-ligious philosophers to account for the universal need of salvation. So inveterate has this type of thought become, that it adheres to the phrases, e.g. 'depravity,' 'corruption of nature,' and the like, in which theology has the Scripture teaching. Though the confessional formulas that employ such phrases are not com-mitted to interpretations of the NT which imply a theory, opponents of what is supposed to be the traditional doctrine have in consequence been allowed to attack it in the interests of a more scientific psychology, on the assumption that original sin is held to be a predisposing cause of actual sin. Mr. F. R. Tennant, for example, in SIN SIN 633 his Hulsean Lectures, starting from the premiss that ethical attributes are not rightly applied to anything but the activities of a will that knows the moral law, has no difficulty in proving that appetites and passions are the raw material of morality, belonging to the environment of the will, not an 'universal and hereditarily transmitted disturbance of man's nature.' The consequence follows that sin, which must involve guilt, applies properly only to the individual, while 'original sin' is little more than a name for the solidarity in nature and environment of the race of actual sinners. Whatever may be said of the background of Augustinian thought or the atmosphere in which the confessions of the 16th cent. were drawn, there can be no doubt that they only reasserted the language of the NT in ascribing the wrath of God to the race no less than to the individual. Terms like 'abnormal humanity,' 'taint of nature,' 'infirmity of will,' may be useful practical analogies, but, like all analogies, they defeat their end if rigorously pressed. For what Scripture means is, not that individual responsibility is conditioned by racial defect, but that the guilt attaching to individuals belongs, in the first instance, to the community (see art. GUILT).

5. The controversies that have arisen about the question whether sin is a privation or a depravation of nature, would have lost much of their force if theological thought had adhered more closely to the Scripture mode of regarding sin. The later the Scripture mode of regarding sin. The later medieval view, stereotyped by the standards of Trent, represented man as deprived of a gift which raised him above nature (supernaturale donum). The unsophisticated experience of human nature leads us to regard it as not in its chief outlines evil, and so far as it denies an inherent corruption in the actual content of manhood the Tridentine position is sufficiently justified. But the Reformers were right in their main contention, which was that sin involved a positive departure from the Divine purpose. If sin in its essence is neither the loss nor the disturbance of personal endow-ments, but simply disloyalty to God, then to be outside the Kingdom and to own allegiance to the Evil One means that positive hostility to the law of God which is to be 'very far gone from original righteousness.' For sin disturbs nature only in the sense in which all personal action disturbs, by directing towards spiritual ends the material which nature supplies. Again, we have to emphasize the truth that sin enters only when spiritual relations have been established.

6. This consideration will also show the irrelevance of inquiring into the origin of sin, in so far as this means an empirical investigation of human history. For if sin postulates responsibility, we are no nearer a solution of the problem by a knowledge of the rudimentary forms of what, in its final development, we call conscience. Only if emotions and passions be regarded as sinful, can it be of use to note that impulses, the ultimate restraint of which becomes imperative, are at certain stages necessary for the preservation of the individual or the propagation of the race. There need be no desire on the part of any Christian theologian to question the premisses on which the scientific evolutionist pursues his investigations into the origin of the human species. We may grant, for example, that no chasm separates the appearance of man upon the earth from the development of other and lower forms of life. It is hazardous, and quite unnecessary, to contend for organic and moral life as new departures. Taking a merely external view of man, we may say that the conditions under which sin not only becomes possible but actually takes place, are 'the perfectly normal result of a process of development through which the race has passed previously to the acquisition of full moral personality' (F. R. Tennant, Hulsean Lect. p. 81). But then sin is a determination of the 'full moral personality.' Even if we accept the story of man's first disobedience as historically a fact, it is no more explicable as a necessary stage in human evolution than the latest instance of wrong done by one man against another. That all men are the enemies of God until reconciled by the mediation of Christ, is a question of personal relationship unaffected by scientific research. observer can do no more than register, so far as he can discover them, the conditions under which activities have resulted which, in view of the will of God, assumed to be known, are recognized as disloyalty and therefore as sin. No doctrine of sin is possible except on the assumption of a personal experience involving the recognition of God. The universality of the need which it expresses is attested, not by any demonstrative proof, but by the conviction of sin through which each individual has passed to the freedom of the Christian life. Of such Christian experience the witness of the Church is the summary, and its missionary labours are the measure of its faith that redemption is applicable to all. With this alone is Christianity as such concerned. It does not go behind the activity of a self-determining being, judged by conscience. Its doctrine of the 'Fall,' therefore, is not a pseudo-scientific account of the strength of passion or of the 'survival of habits and tendencies incidental to an earlier stage in development,' which is refuted by the discovery that the story of mankind is that of a continuous progression. has nothing to do with the material of actual sin, which, though environment may have been vastly modified by corrupt action, cannot rightly be spoken of as 'polluted.' But it is the expression, in the only manner of which language admits, of the postulate of guilt and slavery involved in preaching the gospel, God's message of free salvation, to every creature

The story of the Fall, recorded in Gn 3, though it shaped the form in which St. Paul stated the universality of sin, does not vitally affect a teaching which, in its absence, would have sought another method of expression. Indeed, its essential features are all present in the Epistle to the Romans before it is stated in terms of Adam's transgression. To say that the doctrine is merely illustrated by the story, would be to attribute to the Hebrew Christian mind of the 1st cent. an attitude towards the OT possible only in a critical age. Nor will the use of 'Adam' as a category for summing up the human race in 1 ('o 15<sup>21</sup>. warrant us in believing that St. Paul was led to his characteristic idea of human solidarity otherwise than along the lines natural to a Jewish interpreter of the OT in Apostolic times (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 136, 'Effects of Adam's Fall,' etc.). But it is equally certain that St. Paul's use of the OT is far removed from a hard Western literalism, its narratives being the authoritative forms under which spiritual truths are apprehended rather than the material of historical science (see Sanday-Headlam, ib. p. 302, 'St. Paul's use of the OT'). The canons of interpretation applied to the early narratives of Genesis cannot affect their doctrinal use in the NT. If the first truth which concerns the moral life of man be the Divine origin, and therefore the essential goodness, i.e. conformity to the Divine intention, of the material world and of his own personality, the second is that nevertheless he is an alien from God. This interpretation of the facts of life, which escapes the negation of a true morality involved alike in Oriental dualism and philosophic monism, is entirely independent of the Genesis stories, and separable from them in the NT. It is, however, remarkable that even in these early narratives the religious truth is presented with a completeness conspicuously absent from many later theologies. The three personalities of God, Man, and the Evil One,—disobedience, guilt, exclusion from the Kingdom, the need of liberation from an external tyranny typified in the promised bruising of the serpent's head,—all are essential to the reality of sin. It is difficult to understand how this could be better represented than by attributing an act of disobedience against God and of compliance with 'the voice of a stranger' to a common ancestor of all living. The situation thus expressed is briefly summarized by St. Paul, 'All have sinned, and (therefore) fall short of the glory of God' (Ro 32). Confusion is often caused by the tendency to Confusion is often caused by the tendency to revert to a materialistic conception of sin on the part of those who would explain its presence in terms of the evolution hypothesis. It is sufficient, so the argument runs, to observe the difficulty that each must encounter 'of enforcing his inherited organic nature to obey a moral law' (Tennant, Hulsean Lectures, p. 81). But, apart from the fact that what needs explanation is the self-arraignment which the process entails, it is contrary to experience, no less than to Scripture, thus to place the 'organic nature' in an essential relation to sin, which is made to consist in the failure to 'moralize' it. The publicans and harlots go into the Kingdom of heaven before those with whose wilful rejection of God the physical and emotional nature has least to do. Even popular Christianity places 'the devil' at the climax of temptation; nor are 'youthful lusts,' though they may constitute the earliest and most obvious material of transgression, the deadliest and most intimate occasion of sin. The impulse to make stones bread, or appropriate the kingdoms of the world, masks a temptation to independence of Divine authority which is the essential element in guilt. St. Paul's doctrine of the Flesh with its passions and lusts (Ro 75 88, Gal 524 etc.) cannot be set against this. It has been abundantly shown that the Pauline anthropology, to use the words of Lipsius, 'rests entirely on an OT base.' The 'old man' (ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἀνθρωπος, Ro 66 etc.) is, therefore, the body, not as uncontrolled by spirit, but as inwrought by the Evil One (see above). According to Christian teaching, sin 'takes occasion' by any commandment or recognized purpose of God, whether related to the physical nature or not; nor would the theologian of any age be a whit less emphatic than the modern theorist in placing it, not in the impulse, but as subject to influences which, 'felt within us as ourselves' (Tennyson, Locksley Hall Sixty Years After), well up in personalities hostile to the Kingdom of God.

It will be urged that influences such as these are still external to the individual, of whom, therefore, sin cannot be predicated anterior to positive acts of transgression. But, in the first place, this separation between actions and character does not correspond with experience. The man as distinct from his activities is an abstraction. The 'psychological infant' is an ideal construction (see Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory, bk. ii. c. 2). No one has any knowledge of himself except in action. It is empirically true that 'concupiscence hath of itself the nature of sin' (Thirty-nine Articles, 9), because in experience the line between suggestion and acquiescence is imaginary, and 'he that looketh on a woman to lust' knows that he has already committed adultery. And this is not inconsistent with the complementary truth that temptation is not sin. But, secondly, while it may be admitted that sin on this view is metaphysically not free from difficulty, it must be observed that no peculiar problem is created by it. It is not exposed to the objection which naturally arises if it is explained in terms of a theory of heredity. Such theories are necessarily tentative and pro-visional, and it is the vice of all explanations based upon the current hypotheses of scientific investigation, that they tend to outrun assured results, and to involve religious truth in the imperfections of systems always in process of becoming antiquated. As soon, however, as it is perceived that the supposed analogy of an 'acquired character' transnitted by propagation to descendants does not accurately represent the teaching of Scripture, objections raised on this score from the point of view of advancing science lose their force. The problem involved in the exercise of personal influence acting through the self-determining will of another personality, remains just where it is, whether sin be a reality or not; St. Paul's 'I, yet not I' stands for an experience which is constant, whether the invariance influence he is the crace of Col. or (sin spiring influence be 'the grace of God' or 'sin that dwelleth in me.' Whatever may be true of hypnotic suggestion or of abnormal conditions like demoniacal possession, the normal course of personal influence, even of one man upon another, is not to paralyze the individual, so that the resultant action is not his but another's. That sharp separation of personalities which makes one human being wholly external to another may to some extent be due to the illusion of physical limitations. But at any rate, in dealing with 'spiritual wickedness,' we reach a sphere where these conditions are left behind, and the distinctions which they involve are inapplicable. That spirit should thus act upon spirit involves no new difficulty, because its possibility is involved in the creation of free, repossibility is involved in the creation of ree, responsible personalities, capable of love and therefore of enmity, of responding to a spirit of evil no less than to the Spirit of God. This may involve a race, just as the Holy Spirit indwells the Kingdom of heaven and each member of it. Sin is the antithesis, not of freewill, but of grace. The true analogy of redemption is rather the exorcism which leaves the subject 'clothed and in his right mind, leaves the subject 'clothed and in his right mind,' than the remedy which repairs the ravages of disease. Salvation is not the process by which the sinner is gradually transformed into the saint, but the justifying act whereby the unrighteous is transferred to the Kingdom of grace. No doubt the evil spirit may return to the house from which it went out, and we are not, therefore, compelled to reject facts of experience, and deny the gradual nature of self-conquest. But to think of sin as an inherited or acquired character which is being gradually reduced, is to introduce a distinction between original and actual sin which removes the former altogether from the category of guilt. Satan 'entered into Judas' (Lk 223, Jn 1327); and our Lord's statement—'He that is bathed needeth not save to wash his feet' (Jn 1310)—seems to imply liability to incur fresh guilt rather than a redemption as yet incomplete. That sin remains even in the regenerate is sufficiently accurate as an expression of the observed fact of the imperfect lives of Christians. But the deeper view of St. John is that disciples, being still in the world, have constant need to be kept from the Evil One in whom it lies, and to receive afresh propitiation and forgiveness for sins actually committed in consequence of this spiritual contact.

7. The Biblical doctrine of sin, as here outlined, enables us to interpret the Incarnation in harmony with the best modern psychology. It is no longer possible to think of human nature apart from personality as a bundle of facilities, among which, as we have experience of it, is the faculty of sin. Sin therefore is not an ingredient in ordinary humanity, which must be regarded as absent from the pure lumanity assumed by the Son of God. To inquire whether the manhood in Christ was capable of sin is irrelevant, when it is perceived that impersonal natures are abstractions of thought with no existence in fact. Sin is hostility to what Jesus Christ is, the living God. The house of a personality, human or Divine, or, as in the case of Christ, both, cannot be divided against itself. The truth expressed in the old theological conception of the impersonal humanity of our Lord is simply this, that He received by inheritance from the human race whatseever is capable of transmission, the structural fabric with which biology is concerned, the material within which conscious personality expresses itself. Thus He is in all points like to His brethren, who inherit from their ancestry what in itself is morally neither good nor bad. He was identified with human sin, not only representatively but vitally (Ro 512 ", Pa 254) —a truth which no far cludes statement as almost inevitably to involve in heresy those who, like Edward Irving, seek to express it the Word became flesh, and that without sin, not because the virus was omitted in the act of conception, but because, being God, He cannot deny Himself, the terms 'sin' and 'God' being mutu ally exclusive. God became man under those conditions which sin had created, viz. the environment of Satan's kingdom together with the guilt and penalty of death. He did not therefore redeem by becoming man, but by surrendering Huiself to the entire consequences, reversing the sentence of condemnation, by death overcoming death, and opening the new environment of the Kingdom of heaven to all believers. The fact of the Atone-ment witnesses against the view that the Incarnation was the destruction of an evil heredity through union with the Divine nature. Its principle is the indwelling of the Personal Spirit of holiness first in Jesus Christ (Ro I4) and thereafter in the free personalities of the children of God (811), expelling by His presence and power 'the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience' (Eph 2).

worketh in the sons of disobedience" (Eph 23).

The word in used also to tr apost and postas, but in every case it turples the absence of all that is take and that makes life double (Lightfoot on Ph 119).

It follows from the usage of the word that it may SINCERITY .-

It follows from the usage of the word that it may be applied to mind, or to set, or to speech; but everywhere it carries the sense of unadulterated or unmingled, so that, while the word is not used in unmingled, so that, while the word is not used in the Gospels, it is plain that these set forth in Christ the pattern of sincerity. It is also clear that Christ demanded of men sincerity, if they were to enter and to abide in the Kingdom of God, It is at once the presupposition of a Christian experience, and the bond of the Christian society.

i. The sincerity of Jesus. The character Jesus sets the standard of perfect sincerity; 'gnile was not found in his mouth' (1 P  $2^{-3}$ ); He is 'the true one' ( $\delta$   $\delta\lambda \psi\theta\nu\delta\tau$ , 1 Jn  $\delta^{-3}$ ), opposed by that title to all that is counterfeit. To know Him is to know the Truth and the Life (Jn  $17^{3}$ ). The perfectly sincere man must be one (a) whose mind is perfectly responsive to the truth. It is not enough that he should speak and act from conviction. The conviction must be enecercly formed, without double-mindedness, without any falsehood of heart (Mt 5, 2 P 31). All that Jesus said and did must be the manifestation of an inner life; but the believer needs also the assurance that there was nothing in the mind of Jesus to distort the truth, It is not enough to believe that He means what He says; we must believe that He is able to receive without loss or deflexion the rays of the truth. In the Fourth Gospel much is said of the truth of Christ; this is more than His veracity (cf. Robertson's Secmons, vol. i. 'The Kingdom of the Truth'). He is the Way because He is the Truth (Ju 146); He is the Light of the world (8<sup>12</sup>), and His light is the light of life. He is full of grace and truth (1<sup>17</sup>). His Kingdom is of the truth (18<sup>21</sup>). He is set over against all that is unreal and partial and transitory. In Him there is an unbroken course for the revelation of the light and life of God (17\*-10-21 etc.). Sincerity implies the single heart and eye, which alone can receive the vision of God. The sincerity of Jesus is more than the consistency of His action and speech with His thought; it involves His trustworthiness as a mediator of the truth. (5) But sincerity, in the more common usage of the word, implies that between the inner self and the expression, nothing intervenes to confuse or to distort. In the Gospela there is a picture of a life in which there is nothing to conceal: Jesus speaks and acts in such a way as to convince men that He is revealing His con-viction. The Gospels manifest a life of perfect harmony. The manifestation is varied, but the harmony. The manifestation is varied, but the motive is single. His gentleness and His sternness are alike the expression of His holy love, and never apring from idle sentiment, or personal feeling, or those cross-motives which break the peace of other

At the outset of His ministry there comes the temptation to accept a compromise in the pursuit of His ains: He answers, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt then serve' (Lk 4); no tampering with the mission in its means or in its ends could be tolerated. 'His means are pure and spotless as his ends' (Wordsworth). He is early contrasted with the scribes because of His authority (Mk 127); this impression could have been made only by One acknowledged to be sincere. He wins from the first group of disciples the confidence accorded only to a manifest disciples the conndence accorded only to a maintest conviction. Even the scribes come to shrink from this clear gaze (11<sup>10</sup>). The accepted opinion is that Jesus speaks truly (1.k. 20<sup>21</sup>). Many think Him mustaken, or beside Hunself (Mk 3<sup>21</sup>), or blasphemous (14<sup>22, 23</sup>), but none treat Him as a conscious deceiver. Jesus proves His sincerity by His stedfastness in His calling; dark as the way becomes, He never wavers (Mt 16<sup>22, 23</sup>). It is possible that the Deceiver would not have been been sible that the Pharisees would not have been unwilling to compromise with Jesus, but He would keep back nothing of the truth.

636 SINGING SINLESSNESS

In his Life of Jesus, Renan makes allowance for a lower standard of sincerity in the East than that to which the Western nations conform. 'To the deeply earnest races of the West, conviction means sincerity to one's self. But sincerity to one's self has not much meaning to Oriental peoples, little accustomed to the subtleties of a critical spirit. . . The literal truth has little value for the Oriental; he sees everything through the medium of his ideas, his interests, and his passions. History is impossible if we do not fully admit that there are many standards of sincerity' (ch. 16). By such means Renan seeks to explain the attitude of Jesus to popular illusions, and the willingness which he finds in Jesus to take advantage of them in the interest of His enthusiastic purpose.

A truer criticism would rather attribute the story of such excommodation, if it were discerned, to the imperfect understanding of the disciples. There is, however, no need to resort to such explanations; the narratives make it sufficiently plain that Jesus deliberately refused to work upon popular illusions. Nor can it be forgotten that the standard of sincerity, of which Renan speaks, has been set by Christian faith. Nowhere is there a more stern demand for truth and sincerity than in the Apostolic writings, which owe their inspiration to 'the mind of Christ.' It is impossible to regard as one among many phases of Oriental religion a faith which in its preparatory history declared that God demanded truth in the inward parts, and in its fulfilment manifested to the world One who was known as 'the Truth.'

2. Teaching of Jesus. — Everywhere Jesus demands reality. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>). It is the condition of spiritual vision. If the eye be single, the whole body shall be full of light (6<sup>22</sup>). Jesus calls for truth of heart. 'There is a truth which lies behind the recognition of particular truths. It is the basis of all right beliefs.' 'Sincerum est nisi vas quodcunque infundis acescit' (Horace, Ep. i. 2. 54). Those who receive the revelation which Jesus brings are likened to babes (vywlois) (Mt 1125). Only those who become as little children can enter into the Kingdom (183). It is the singleness of the child, his truth of heart, and freedom from ulterior motives, that are praised. In the life that is in the Kingdom there must be no confusion of ends; it must be perfect (τέλεισε), as the Father is perfect (5<sup>48</sup>). It is the unpurged mind that misses the vision. If the soul is divided, the profession of the lips will be of no avail (72). Words must not be idle (1236) ( $d\rho\gamma\delta\nu$ ), without any correspondence in inward thought and outward action. Words must be the 'incarnation of thought.' Nothing must intervene between the mind of the speaker and his word. Oaths are condemned as likely to take from the severe demands of truthful speech. The yea must be yea, the nay, nay (537). An oath lowers the value of normal speech. In all other departments of life there must be the same absence of duplicity. There cannot be two masters The disciple must seek first the Kingdom (633), and must not be over-anxious for food and raiment. He must not only be wise as a serpent, but sincere, simple (deepacos) (10<sup>16</sup>) as a dove (cf. Ph 2<sup>15</sup>). He must worship in spirit and in truth (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>). It was this simplicity that Jesus found in the disciples whom He chose; like Nathanael, they were Israelites without guile (147), έν ψ δόλος οὐκ ἔστι.

SINLESSNESS.—'The sinlessness of Jesus' is a phrase which only imperfectly indicates the ground it is intended to cover. It is too negative. sinless perfection of Jesus' would be a more adequate But 'the sinlessness of Jesus' phrase. has an attractive sound; it is the title of a book-that of Ullmann cited below - which may be called classical; and it would be unwise to displace it from the position of honour it occupies, although we must use it with the understanding that it means more than it says. It is not to be confounded with the errorlessness of Jesus. Indeed, the very latest writer on the subject (Max Meyer, op. cit. infr.) refers with the utmost frankness, if we ought not rather to say thoughtlessness, to the mistakes of Jesus (p. 9), while vigorously defending His sinlessness. But on this subject see the much more profoundly considered judgments of Dorner (Glaubenslehre, ii. p. 472 ff.) and Tholuck (Das AT im NT, p. 24 ff.).

An argument for the sinlessness of Jesus has been elaborated by Ullmann from the prevalence of holiness in Christendom.

been elaborated by Ullmann from the prevalence of holiness in Christendom.

Wherever Christianity exists—thus the argument proceeds—there holiness also is to be seen. While exceptionally advanced holiness may be of rare occurrence in any society, there is not a country, or even a town or village, in which Christianity is established but there will be found in it numbers of persons striving after a holy life. In every Christian congregation there are at least a few specimens of character so striking that even those who are themselves destitute of religious aspiration acknowledge them to be no earthly products, but to have a heavenly origin; while more sympathetic observers will say that to them the sight of one such holy person has been a more convincing argument for the reality and the bleesedness of religious experience than all the verbal arguments they have ever listened to. For this phenomenon is specifically Christian. It is true that heathenism has its so-called holy men—that is, persons separated from the world and devoted to God—but it requires little discrimination to perceive the difference between an Indian fakir and a Christian saint. The classical nations produced many a splendid specimen of human nature; but the best of them were essentially different from those whom Christendom would recognize as holy. Even Socrates, as every one must know who has read the *Memorabilia* of Xenophon, was not holy in the Christian sense, but, at certain points, very much the reverse. In what precisely the difference consists it may not be easy to say, but it is quite easy to feel, holiness being, like beauty and some more of the finest things, in the last resort indescribable. But whatever may be its exact definition, holiness is, at all events, essentially Christian. Those who are possessed of it would acknowledge that they owe it to Christ, their communion with God being based on the sense of reconciliation through Christ, and their benevolence towards men due to their adoption of His views as to the dignity and

On different minds such an argument will make different impressions; but we are certainly going upon more solid ground when we turn to the testimony of Scripture.

1. Here the first thing to be noted is the impression which He made in the days of His flesh on both friends and foes. Thus, when He presented Himself for baptism among the multitude at the Jordan, the Baptist forbade Him, saying, 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?' (Mt 3<sup>14</sup>). Whether this sense of inferiority Whether this sense of inferiority and unworthiness on the part of the Baptist be ascribed to a long acquaintance with Jesus beforehand, or to the rapt dignity in the expression of Jesus at the moment, it is equally remarkable. Even more pronounced was the sense of the same contrast expressed by St. Peter, when, after the miracle wrought before his eyes in his own boat, he shrank away, exclaiming, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord!' (I.k 5"). This was the spontaneous effect on a sensitive conscience of the proximity of the Divine; it was the terror of sin at the manifestation of sinlessness. These were testimonies of friends; but His enemics, in their testimonies of priends; but His enemics, in their testimonies were no less explicit. Thus, the centurion who presided over the crucifixion exclaimed, as he saw Him expire: 'Certainly this was a righteous man' (23<sup>47</sup>). The wife of Pilate made use of almost the identical expression when she sent to her husband the message: 'Have thou nothing to do with this just man' (Mt 2719). Pilate himself said: 'I find no fault in him' (Jn 196). And even Judas Iscariot, though he had known Him long, and had, at the moment when he spoke, a strong interest in recalling anything with which he could have found fault as an excuse for his own conduct, acknowledged that he had betrayed 'in-

2. Of more theological importance are the statements in what may be called the authoritative parts of the NT. St. John says: 'Ye know that he was manifested to take away sins; and in him is no sin' (1 Jn 3). Such was the total impression carried away by this disciple from the years of intimacy with his Master. Elsewhere he expresses the same sentiment more positively, as for instance in the prologue to his Gospel; but this statement of the negative may here suffice. Next to St. John in intimacy was St. Peter; and he summed up his experiences, very soon after these had been received, when, in his great speech on the Day of Pentecost, One' (Ac 3<sup>14</sup>); and that, with the process of time, his convictions on this point had not changed is proved by the declaration in one of his Epistles: 'Christ also suffered for sins, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (1 P 318). St. Paul echoes the same sentiment when he states: 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf, that we might become the right-eousness of God in him' (2 Co 521). No other NT writer has, however, set down statements on this theme so striking and beautiful as those of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who calls author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who calls Jesus 'holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners' (7<sup>28</sup>); and, in another passage, declares: 'We have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but one that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4<sup>18</sup>). These quotations are not exhaustive; but they are so directly to the point that it is useless to add to them. If there be any virtue in proof texts the sinlessness of Jesus is virtue in proof-texts, the sinlessness of Jesus is proved beyond contradiction.

3. Of all the testimonies of the NT, however, the one to which we turn with the keenest curiosity is the testimony of Jesus Himself; and we have to see whether He committed Himself on this subject. The result of such an investigation is perhaps less satisfying than might have been hoped. On one occasion, indeed, He said to His opponents: 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8st); and if, as appears to be the case, this was a general challenge in reference to His whole life and conduct, and not a denial of a particular sin, it would hardly have been possible to make a more distinct claim to sinlessness. On the same occasion He said: 'He that sent me is with me: occasion he said: 'He that sent me is with me: he hath not left me alone; for I do always the things that are pleasing to him' (v. 29). Very similar was His declaration on another occasion: 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (434). To the Apostles, at the Last Supper, He said: 'I will no more speak much with you; for the prince of this world cometh, and he hath nothing in me' (14<sup>30</sup>), which seems to be a denial that in Him there was any point of contact where the Evil One might bring his accusations or fasten his temptations. It will be observed that all these citations are from the Gospel of St. John; and there are none of equal force in the other Gospels.

But if the things about Himself which He says in this connexion are less striking than might have been expected, all the more impressive are the things about Himself which He does not say. He never makes any confession of personal sin. is one of the cardinal facts of the Gospels. not as if He had been one of those religious teachers who, whether deliberately or inadvertently, pass by the subject of sin. Not only did He spend a great deal of His activity in the denunciation of sin, but He taught His own intimate disciples to pray habitually for deliverance from it; no fewer than three of the petitions of the Lord's Prayer being to this effect. Yet what He advised others to do He never, as far as we can learn, did Himself. Of His intimate life of prayer we possess pretty ample records; but in none of these are there any confessions of sin. This omission is all the more remarkable when the practice of other conspicuous figures in Holy Writ is noticed. The most prominent names of the OT are all remarkable for their nent names of the OI are all remarkable for their frequent and ample confessions of personal guilt. Thus the Psalmist says: 'Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me' (Ps 51°); 'Isaiah says: 'Woe is me; for I am undone; for I am a man of unclean lips' (6°); Job groans: 'I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes' (42°); Ezra prays: 'O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God, if or our injunities are increased over our asnamed and offusit to fit up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our heads, and our guiltiness is grown up unto the heavens' (9°). With the corresponding figures of the NT it is not different. Thus, St. Paul cries: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me out of the body of this death?' (Ro 724); and even the saintly St. John confesses: 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us' (1 Jn 18). Thus, both the worthies of the OT, from whom Jesus learned, and the worthies of the NT, who learned from Him, speak on this subject with one consent; and it may be added that the more of religious genius any of them had, the more poignant were their cries for pardon. Jesus, however, differs in this respect radically from them all, and science must assign a reason for the contrast. If it was a defect, it was a serious one. If He sinned, like the other children of Adam, but failed to be humbled and to confess His fault, this brings Him down beneath the religious heroes of the race; for what feature of religious genius is more essential than humility? But if it was no defect, what other explanation of it can there be but sinlessness?

4. Objections. — Ever since the time of Celsus there have been objections raised to the sinlessness of Jesus, and exceptions, more or less specific, taken to His moral character. During the greater portion of Christian history, however, it has been taken for granted that He was without sin; this being the very least that has been spontaneously conceded by any affecting to believe on Him in any sense. Even the early Socinians were ardent defenders of this It was not till the age of Deism and doctrine. Rationalism that to express doubts on this subject became a common characteristic of unbelief. The revival of evangelical faith in the nineteenth century raised up a host of defenders, not only those in the full current of the revival being on this side, as a matter of course, but many distinguished scholars who stood somewhat aside, such as Schleier-macher, Schweizer, Hase, Keim and Weizsäcker being forward in the same cause. On the contrary, Strauss, in his books on the Life of Jesus, advanced further and further in the direction of denial; and Pécaut in Le Christ et la Conscience, 1859, displayed a zeal worthy of a better cause in heaping up every conceivable objection to the Saviour's conduct. On the whole, the great series of Lives of Christ, which have formed a leading feature of the theology of the last two generations, have been loyal to the conviction and testimony of Christendom; but, in the very latest productions which have appeared in the very latest productions which have appeared in this field, an uncertain sound is heard (see, c.g., O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, esp. p. 34; Weinel, Jesus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, esp. pp. 61 ff. and 274 ff.), so that it is quite within the bounds of possibility, or even probability, that this belief may have to be earnestly contended for in the not distant

The objections alleged are either (a) of a more general and philosophical order, or (b) relate to actions of Jesus in the Gospels which are considered inconsistent with a perfect character.

(a) In the days of the Old Rationalism the commonest objection was that sinless perfection is inconsistent with moral development: man has to raise himself from matter to spirit, and from imperfection to perfection. Kant held that virtue consists solely of moral conflict; and many, appealing to him, concluded that Jesus could not be a genuine man unless He began in imperfection and fought His way up to sinlessness. Similar to this is the well-known position of Strauss, that it is not the way of the idea, in fulfilling itself in actuality, to pour all its fulness into one specimen, which is thereby enabled to boast itself over all the rest; but that, on the contrary, it likes to display its riches in a multiplicity of specimens, which mutually supplement and complete one another. Such objections formed part and parcel of the intellectual world in which they were excogitated; and, as that world has long ago passed away, it is hardly necessary now to attempt the refutation of them.

Far more persistent has been the impression that sinlessness is inconsistent with genuine temptation; and as it is certain that Jesus was tempted, it may be argued that He cannot have been sinless.

Under the stress of this consideration, Schleiermacher, who made the sinlessness of Jesus the very basis of his speculative system, practically denied the reality of the temptations of Jesus Edward Irving, on the other hand, appealing to such texts of Scripture as Ro 82 and Col 123, taught that the human nature of Jesus had in itself the principle of sin and error, and not only was capable of erring and falling, but was disposed to all evil; although, by the energy of the Holy Ghost within Him and the energy of His holy will, He overcame every temptation as it arose.

energy of His holy will, He overcame every temptation as it arose.

What Irving and others who have agreed with him or adopted kindred notions have felt has been that, without such imperfection in the human nature of Christ as they postulate, there can have been no real conflict with evil, and that so the accounts of our Lord's temptation, which are intended to be so priceless to His tempted disciples, lose their virtue, the conflict being reduced to a sham fight. To this it has been replied, by Dorner and others, that the presence in the human nature of our Lord of the contrast between knowing and willing makes real conflict possible; for the knowledge is antecedent, and then the will has to be brought up to the level of knowledge. Further, the contrast between body and spirit makes conflict possible, because the body may, without sin, feel strongly all the instincts of life; yet the spirit may discern the necessity for overcoming these and accepting, as Jesus did, suffering and death in loyalty to a peculiar vocation. As a faultless man, Jesus had a right to all the rewards and pleasures which ought, in the nature of things, to ensue upon well-doing; and it could not be without conflict that He resigned His rights and embraced a lot so contrary to His deserts. In the little work of Meyer, mentioned below, the greater part of the space is devoted to the solution of these riddles.

However the enigma is to be solved, certain it is that Jesus was tempted. The scenes in the Wilderness, in Gethsemane, and on the Cross, when He is represented as in conflict with the powers of evil, were not less severe than the similar experiences of ordinary mortals, but far more so. His purity made the inrush of temptation more painful. His humanity had not the stolid calm of a lethargic temperament, but was sensitive at every pore; He felt not less but more than others the condemnation of unjust authority, the desertion of friends, and the apparent frustration of Providence. Even if the attempt to reconcile the two should be beyond the reach of luman wisdom, we will not surrender either member of the great assertion, that He was tempted 'like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>).

tempted 'like as we are, yet without sin' (He 415).

(b) The other kind of objection relates to specific statements of the Gospel history which are held to be inconsistent with sinlessness. Thus, it is contended that His staying behind at Jerusalem, when He was twelve years of age, and His answer to Joseph and Mary, were not worthy of an obedient child; and objection is, in like manner, taken to His sharp reply to His mother when she tried to turn Him back from the fulfilment of His vocation. In cleansing the Temple, He is charged with displaying undue vehemence, and it is held that He exhibited an arrogance unbecoming His youth and His position in His attacks on the scribes and Pharisees. In cursing the fig-tree, it is claimed, He gave way to temper; and, in the casting of the demons out of the possessed man of Gadara and giving them permission to enter the swine, with the result that two thousand of these were lost to their owners, He displayed a lack of respect for the rights of property. Most of such charges are venerable with age and have been answered so often that it may be scarcely necessary to attempt to answer them again; but there are two more, of which something may require to be said.

It has been held that the action of Jesus in pre-

It has been held that the action of Jesus in presenting Himself before John to receive 'the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins,' betrayed a consciousness of guilt. This objection has been recently revived by O. Holtzmann, who quotes from the Gospel to the Hobrews—a document to which he attaches great importance—a statement to the effect that, when solicited by His mother and His brethren to accompany them to the Jordan, Jesus demanded wherefore He should go, as He had no sin to wash away, but immediately checked Himself by adding, 'Unless, indeed, this is uttered in ignorance'; and the author adds that, unless Jesus had said this, no writer of a Gospel would have invented it. Much more, however, than is known of the Gospel to the Hebrews would require to be ascertained before this could be asserted; it may have been the organ of an Ebionite tendency in the early Church, to which such an invention would have been congenial (cf. Euseb. HE iii. 27). The movement of John had a positive as well as a negative side: it was not only a 'baptism of repentance,' but a great new consecration to God and country, in which Jesus was bound to take the lead; and many have believed that, even at this stage, He so identified Himself with His people that He felt their sin to be His own, and in the act of baptism symbolized that washing of it away which was to be accomplished through His death.

The other objection to which importance attaches is the answer of Jesus to one who addressed Him as 'Good Master'—'Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God' (Mk 1018). It is not obvious why Jesus should have objected to be called 'Good Master,' such a mode of address being, one would suppose, a form of courtesy in which there was no harm; and this suggests the probability that the humour or irony of Jesus may have been at play; so that it is dangerous to inter-pret Him too literally. What was it that He wished to turn the inquirer's attention to? Stier's dilemma ought not to be forgotten: 'Either, There is none good but God; Christ is good; therefore Christ is God: or, There is none good but God; Christ is not God; therefore Christ is not good.' The reading in Mt. (1917), where the point under discussion is the Good in the sense of the Summum Bonum, renders it dubious what was the real topic of the conversation. But if it really was about whether or not Jesus was good, then it is possible to say that Jesus was not 'good' in the same sense as God; because His goodness, being that of a human being, was only in process of becoming, and had to realize itself on every step of a long ascent. The comment of Dr. A. B. Bruce in EGT may be subjoined: 'The question means not "The epithet is not applicable to Me, but to God only," but "Do not make ascriptions of goodness a matter of mere courtesy and politeness." The case is parallel to the unwillingness of Jesus to be called Christ indiscriminately. Weinel complains that Weinel complains that this objection is usually answered with too much levity; and it cannot be denied that there is a body of objections worthy of candid and careful investigation. Not only will they bear pondering, but they will reward it; for if they do not cause the student to stumble, they will have the opposite effect of leading him further into the mystery of the Person of Christ.

5. The relation of the sinlessness of our Lord to other elements of the Christian system.

(1) It has an obvious bearing on the Virgin-birth.
Had Jesus been an ordinary link in the chain of humanity, He could not have been sinless; for 'there is none righteous, no, not one': in all who have descended from Adam by ordinary generation, there is a 'law in the members warring against the law of the mind.' It has been said, indeed, that immunity from this sad inheritance could not have been secured in the way suggested, because the motherhood of Mary, unless she also had been sinless, would have transmitted the tainted nature. We know, however, too little of the way in which the soul is transmitted to be sure of this. And if it must be allowed, on the other hand, that we know too little to have scientific assurance of the contrary, yet the providential arrangement seems intended to suggest this end. It may, indeed, be said that it suggests it too obviously, and that the story of the miraculous birth was an afterthought, to confirm the sinlessness. But the theory of the Gospel history which presents one part as litted to another with miraculous cleverness, so as to make one idea account for another, is not consistent with the simplicity of the character of the authors or the straightforwardness of their narration. There is a logic in facts as well as in ideas; and this seems to be an instance of fact answering to fact in the Divine intention, the human mind only discerning the fitness as it looks back on the accomplished

(2) It has a bearing on the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ. Some have, indeed, held it directly to prove His Divinity; because, they have argued, the moral force of mere manhood would not have been equal to the task of maintaining a life of sinlessness in a sinful world. If even Adam, in an empty and sinless world, fell, what chance was there of another, standing in a world so corrupt and a society so perstanding in a world so corrupt and a society so perverted as that in which Jesus lived, moved and had His being? To bring the Divine nature, however, into play, to account for the sinlessness, would obscure the reality of the temptation of Jesus; and it obscures the vital truth that His sinlessness was not only a gift but an attainment, which He had to secure afresh on every step of a human development, and which rendered Him which he had to secure arresh on every step of a human development, and which rendered Him supremely well-pleasing to His Father in heaven. God gave the Spirit without measure unto Him (Jn 3<sup>24</sup>); and, by constantly receiving this Divine communication and giving it free play within Him, He garrisoned His human nature against the advanced from This is a constant. vances of sin. This is enough to account for His constant victory over temptation. Although, however, His sinlessness does not directly prove His Divinity, it is not without a bearing on it of an important kind: it lends weight to all His statements, and especially to His statements about Himself. A sinless being could not make state-ments which were false, extravagant, or overweening. Now, Jesus made statements about Himself that either were visionary and unbecoming, or proved Him to be greater than the children of men; and if His character supplies strong reason for accepting these as words of truth and soberges. ness, the bearing of this fact on our beliefs about Him cannot be ignored.

(3) It has a bearing on the doctrine of the death of Christ. The Apostles of Jesus did not expect Him to die; and the reason of this was that they knew Him to be without sin. Death is for sinners; but why should one die who is sinless? This was the puzzle with which the followers of Jesus we perplexed when He was lying in the grave, and it seemed as if His cause had perished in this un-answerable enigma. It is well known what came, through the illumination of the Resurrection and I the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, to be the Apostolic solution of this mystery. The Apostles be-lieved and taught that He had, indeed, died on account of sin, yet not on account of sin of His own, but for the sins of others. Jesus Himself had declared in the days of His flesh that He would give His life a ransom for many (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). Had He been one of the sinful sons of Adam, He could have done nothing of the kind; for 'none of them can redeem his brother or offer to God a ransom for him' (Ps 49'). Had Jesus been a sinner like the rest, He would have had to die like the rest for His own sin.

There are probably other elements of the Christian faith on which this subject could be shown to have a bearing; but these will suffice. Since Ull-mann's celebrated exposition this argument has proved one of the handiest and most effective of apologetic weapons. Persons who have grown up in a Christian atmosphere readily yield to its truth; and then they can be shown how nuch more it involves. In those times of inward storm, due to many causes, to which young minds are subject, it is sometimes of the greatest advantage to find a spot of shelter in which to cast anchor, till the onset of doubt has subsided a little; and for this purpose the sinlessness of Jesus is without a rival. It is not a place to rest in, but a stage on the way.

SINNERS.—In order that we may understand what the word means in the Gospels, it is necessary to consider for a moment the peculiar view-point of the Law, by which the teaching of Christ and that of the Rabbis are utterly differentiated. To the latter the Law came with the inexorable demand for absolute and complete obedience, as something to be dreaded, therefore. Thus the mass of the people, who were ignorant of the endless Rabbinical precepts, were held to be 'accursed' (Jn 7°). Christ, on the contrary, saw in the Law a moral ideal, something to be befriended and loved. He bade men strive after attaining this ideal, which was the embodiment of love, and He sought to set them free from the Rabbinical interpretation of the Law. A mere outward violation of the letter of the Law did not necessarily constitute an offence. Thus did not necessarily constitute an offence. Inus He exculpated His disciples, who had plucked ears of corn on the Sabbath day, by citing the example of David (Mt 12<sup>1-4</sup>). He excused the healing of the impotent man (Jn 5<sup>1-9</sup>) by citing the custom of circumcising on the eighth day, though it fell on the Sabbath (7<sup>25</sup>). With Christ a higher principle always set aside the letter of the Law. This view-point fully explains His attitude to sin and to the point fully explains His attitude to sin and to the sinner. And yet these peculiar views of the Law are associated with the profoundest reverence for it (Mt 5<sup>171</sup>, 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>40</sup>, Lk 16<sup>17</sup> etc.).

1. Christ's relation to sinners.—Here His mission shone resplendent in all its fulness. For them He came to this world, to them He had a them He came to this world, to them He had a special message. (a) He freely mingled with them, and that without fear of contamination, Mt 9<sup>10, 11</sup> 11<sup>19</sup>, Mk 2<sup>15, 16</sup>, Lk 5<sup>50</sup> 15<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>. The Samaritan woman is a clear case in point, Jn 4. (b) He had compassion on them, Lk 7<sup>47</sup>. (c) He irresistibly drew them, Lk 15<sup>1</sup> etc. (d) He specially called them, Mt 9<sup>13</sup> | Mk 2<sup>17</sup> and Lk 5<sup>52</sup>. (e) He rejoiced in their salvation, Lk 15<sup>7, 10</sup> 18<sup>13, 14</sup>.

2. Use of the word 'sinners' in the Gospels .-The word αμαρτωλός from αμαρτία, 'sin' or 'error,' further, art. SIN.

is used in several senses. (a) The national sense. Thus it indicates the distinction between Jew and Gentile from the ethnico-religious standpoint. St. Paul thus later used the word, Gal 215 We who are Jews by nature and not sinners of the Gentiles.' Thus it is used Mt 264, Mk 144, Lk 247. See also Lk 632t, where ἀμαρτωλοί replaces τελῶναι and ἐθνικοί in the parallel passage Mt 545. Nes which would seem to indicate that St. Luke also uses it here in the national rather than in the ethical sense. (b) The social sense. Thus it seems to indicate the distinction between the righteousness of the Law-burdened Jew and his more ignorant brethren, who, not knowing the Law and therefore continually trespassing its commandments, were deemed 'accursed.' Here the word seems to have a negative rather than a positive meaning, pointing to the absence of legal righteousness rather than to actual transgression. Thus 'publicans' and 'sinners' are always associated in the Gospels. In this connexion the latter term does not qualify the moral status of the publican, but rather points to the forced association of the ignorant and ostracized elements of Jewish society with the hated minions of Rome. (c) The purely ethical sense. In this sense conscious or unconscious moral guilt is associated with the word. Thus Peter in Lk 53; 'sinners' and 'righteous' people are placed in antithesis in Mt 913, Mk 217, Lk 528; in Mk 888 the word is associated with μοιχαλ/ε; so also in the story of the sinful woman, Lk 737; so in the great parables of Lk 15, and esp. in the story of the healing of the man born blind, in Jn 9, where it repeatedly occurs in a manifest ethical sense. See,

SIR (κόριε). — The title is employed as a term of courtesy or reverence in various relationships. It is the salutation of servants (slaves) to their masters ('Sir, didst thou not sow good seed?' Mt 13<sup>27</sup>); of a son to a father ('I go, sir,' Mt 21<sup>30</sup>); of the priests and Pharisees to Pilate ('Sir, we remember that that deceiver said,' Mt 27<sup>53</sup>); of the Greeks to Philip ('Sir, we would see Jesus,' Jn 12<sup>21</sup>). In the English versions 'lord' (κόριε) is frequently used in the same sense ('Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents,' Mt 25<sup>20, 22, 24</sup>; 'Lord, let it alone this year also,' Lk 13<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>22</sup> 19<sup>16, 18, 20</sup>). It is also a term frequently employed in addressing Jesus, both by disciples and others ('Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean,' Mt 8<sup>2</sup>, Jn 11<sup>12</sup>); so the woman of Samaria says to Jesus, 'Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with' (Jn 4<sup>11</sup>). See art. Lord.

SISTERS.-1. Nothing is known positively of these female relatives of Jesus. There is but one incidental reference to their existence (Mk 63 = Mt 1356 al ἀδελφαί αὐτοῦ) by His fellow-townsmen of Nazareth, who were astonished and offended by His assumed claims to be their religious Teacher. The assumed claims to be their religious Teacher. knowledge which they possessed of His family affairs was too intimate to allow them to examine without prejudice the words and deeds of Jesus. The question as to the precise family relationship which His 'brothers' and 'sisters' bore to Jesus is one which has occupied the attention of scholars and writers in every age of the Christian Church (see art. Brethren of the Lord). It is, perhaps, significant of the estimation in which women were held, that although the names of Jesus' 'brothers' are given in detail, we are nowhere in the canonical Gospels told either the names or the number of His 'sisters.' That there were more than two seems to follow from the Matthean addition (πᾶσαι) to the Markan question, 'Are not his sisters here with us?' It is true that tradition ascribed two daughters to Joseph, though one uncanonical Gospel at least describes Joseph as acknowledging sons, but denying the presence of daughters in his household.

This interpretation of the words all sides of the result of the words all sides of the series of the words and the present writer to be warranted by the context, though doubtless the words have a primary reference to the Virgin Mary (see Lightfoot's 'The Brethren of the Lord' in Dissert. on the Apostolic Age, p. 28). The daughters of Joseph are almost universally said to be two in number ('Genuit quoque sibi . . . duas filias,' Hist. Jos. Fabri Lignarii, cap. ii.; 'Ambæ pariter nupserunt filiæ,' ib. cap. xi., cf. also pseudo-Matt. cap. 42), while there seems to be no agreement in these documents, nor, indeed, among Church writers generally, as to their names ('nomina duarum filiarum [erant] Assia et Lydia,' Hist. Jos. Fabri Lignarii, cap. ii.;' cf. the Bohairic Version of the same writing, which changes their names to Lysia and Lydia). Other writers give their names very variously as Mary and Salome, Anna and Salome, Esther and Thamar; while Theophylact curiously enough names three as the daughters of Joseph—Esther, Thamar, and Salome (see Doneho's Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, p. 27 n. 4).

These Apocryphal and Edgendary Life of Christ, p. 27 n. 4).

These Apocryphal additions can, however, have but little claim on our sympathy, and one Church Father at least betrays his sense of the inadequacy of the sources of his information by appealing to Scripture as his authority for the names Mary and Salome (Epiphanius, Hares. p. 1041, ed. Petav. referred to and quoted by Lightfoot [op. cit. p. 40]), which he chooses as the names of Jesus' 'sisters.'

If Jesus had sisters, as the writers of the first two Gospels evidently believed, it is easy to understand what was the source of His general attitude towards women which drew them to Him in humble and loving service (cf. Lk 7<sup>57L</sup>, 8<sup>1-3</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3-9</sup>= Mt 26<sup>6-13</sup>, Jn 12<sup>1-8</sup> 4<sup>7fL</sup>, 8<sup>10</sup>), outlasting in its loyalty the devotion of the majority of His disciples, and stretching beyond the cross and the grave (Mk 15<sup>40L</sup>, 16<sup>1</sup>, Mt 27<sup>50L</sup>, 28<sup>1</sup>, Lk 23<sup>40-15</sup>, 24<sup>1-10</sup>, Jn 19<sup>25</sup> 20<sup>1fL</sup>, 11<sup>18</sup>). Traces, moreover, of His keen appreciation of the beauty and happiness attaching to the home life of the human family may be seen in His reference to the highest act of self-abnegation demanded from His followers; where the pointed reference to 'sisters' (ἀδελφάs) alongside 'brethren' (ἀδελφούs) marks this characteristic feature of Jesus' teaching (see Mk 10<sup>29L</sup> = Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, Lk 14<sup>25</sup>).

2. On the sisters of Bethany see artt. MARTHA, and MARY § 3.

3. Amongst the witnesses of the Crucifixion mentioned by all four Evangelists were, according to St. John, two sisters—Mary the mother of Jesus, and His mother's sister. Though it has been argued that Mary the (wife) of Clopas ( $Mapla~\dot{\eta}~ro\bar{v}~K\lambda\omega\pi\hat{a}$ ) was the sister of the Virgin, it is now generally agreed that the interpretation of Pesh. (Jn 1923), which inserts the conjunction 'and' between the words 'His mother's sister' and 'Mary of Clopas,' is correct (cf., on the other hand, pscudo-Matt. c. 42: '... Jesus et Maria mater ejus cum sorore sua Maria Cleophæ,' where the reason given why two sisters should have the same name is that the first having been devoted to the service of the Lord, the second too was called Mary for the consolation of her parents). From a comparison of the names of the women who witnessed the Crucifixion, given by the first, second, and fourth Evangelists, the most likely conjecture would seem to be that by 'the sister of his mother' St. John meant his own mother Salome (see, however, Schmiedel's art. 'Mary' in EBi iii. 2960, which denies her identity either with 'Mary of Clopas' or with Salome; cf. also Edersheim, LT ii. 602, and Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.). If the identification by Hegesippus of Clopas with the brother of Joseph be correct, we have the interesting fact that this Mary, thus referred to by St. John, was closely connected with Jesus by the ties of family relationship (see Euseb. iii. 11, iv. 22).

SKULL, PLACE OF .- See GOLGOTHA.

SKY.—In the two places (Mt 16<sup>2</sup>, Lk 12<sup>26</sup>) where this word occurs in the AV of the Gospels, the term 'heaven' is substituted in RV. There is no doubt that this tends towards consistency of rendering, as heaven is the translation of the Greek word (οὐρανόs) elsewhere (see REDNESS OF SKY). Where 'sky' is referred to in the Gospels it is the usual sense of cloud region or aerial expanse that is intended. This was the primary sense, indeed, of οὐρανόs—the firmament, the vault above the earth. There is nothing in the two passages above to differentiate the 'sky' from the 'heaven' of Mt 2431. The word is the representative of the Hebren 24s. The word is the representative of the Hebrew most the upper regions. It reflects the old supposition that the firmament was an actual canopy above the earth. Still the figurative use of the term is indispensable even in scientific treatises (like, for instance, Tyndall's Fragments of Science). In both passages the immediate reference is to the meteorological interpretations of the colour of the

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—While δοῦλοι is the general term for 'a slave,' οικέτης (Lk 16<sup>13</sup>; cf. Ac 10', Ro 14', 1 P 2<sup>13</sup>) denotes specifically one employed in household service or in immediate attendance upon the master or δεσπότης. Except in the latter form the institution did not flourish amongst the Jews in NT times. Field-work was done generally by hired labourers ( $\mu t \sigma \theta \omega s$ , Lk 15<sup>17</sup>; or less technically  $\ell \rho \gamma d \tau \eta s$ , Mt 10<sup>10</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ja 5<sup>4</sup>). In large houses, especially of a Gentile (Lk 7<sup>2</sup>) or foreign type, there would be slaves, generally of non-Jewish or mixed blood, as also in the great establishments of the Sadducæan and priestly aristocracy. In Palestine as well as tradition to supply popular illustrations and give point to practical religious teaching; but features met with in Greek and especially in Roman usage must not be transferred without modifica-tion to the Jewish practice. Not only were the dimensions different, but the prevalent oppression and fear in the one case were replaced in the other by a general spirit of kindliness and content.

1. Jewish slaves abroad.—On several occasions before the Fall of Jerusalem, large numbers of Jews had been deported and sold into captivity. Such incidents were frequent during the wars of the Seleucids and Ptolemies (cf. 1 Mac 3<sup>4</sup>, 2 Mac  $8^{21}$ ), and recur during the period of the Roman over-rule (Jos. BJ vi. ix. 3). Herod ordained that thieves should be sold to foreigners; but the enactment aroused such a degree of animosity as rendered its enforcement impracticable (Jos. Ant. XVI. i. 1). The supply of Jewish slaves was kept up almost entirely from among prisoners taken in the numerous campaigns, and the children of those who were already in captivity, with a few who lost their freedom under the laws of the foreign country or city in which they resided. treatment, like that of other slaves, was as a rule cruel to the degree of barbarity. Exceptions are met with, where courtesy to slaves is commended, as by Seneca (Ep. xlvii.). But the great mass of evidence is on the other side. Pallas, a brother of Felix (Ac 23<sup>24</sup>), considered his slaves too abject to be spoken to, and would signify his pleasure to them only by a gesture or nod (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23). The slave was merely property, and could be transferred like any other property, and could be transferred like any other property. He was incapable of contracting a legal marriage, and was not regarded as invested with any rights. On the ground of expediency, he was gradually protected against excessive cruelty. By the Lex Petronia, which may have been first enacted in the time of Augustus, a slave could not be punished by condemnation to fight with gladiators or wild beasts; and the master's power of life and death was threatened, if not actually restricted, by Claudius. In such hesitating improvements of their condition Jewish slaves abroad would share.

The redemption of Jewish slaves was regarded in theory as a sacred duty (cf. Neh 58); but there is no evidence of any general attempt during our period to acquire the merit of such service. The wealth of the country was chiefly in the hands of those sections of the people in whom racial feeling was not strong; and the majority were at once too poor and too much hindered by political condi-tions to be able to act in other than rare individual cases. The price of a slave, or of his redemption, varied with his qualities, and with the state of the market. Exact particulars for the 1st cent. are not available. Ptolemy Philadelphus redeemed Jewish captives in Egypt at the price of 120 drawburg and the state of the state drachmæ, or about £4 each (Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 3). And Nicanor endeavoured to raise the Roman tribute of 2000 talents by the sale of Jews at the rate of ninety per talent (2 Mac 8<sup>30c</sup>).

2. Slaves in Palestine. — Nehemiah's influence had made it a fundamental rule in Jewish practice that no Jew should be held as a slave by another Jew (cf. Neh 5<sup>5</sup>); and as the rule obtained also in Talmudical times (cf. Winter, Die Stellung der Sklaven, 10 ff.), it is almost certain to have been observed in the intermediate period. Even thieves were not to be reduced to a state of permanent slavery; and while the disorganization of trade due to a strict observance of the Sabbatic law of Dt 15<sup>1-11</sup> was prevented by Hillel's statute of Prosbol, which made registered debts always recoverable, other means were adopted of freeing poor Jews from the burden of their mortgages than that of their reduction to actual servitude. Work was accepted and required as a substitute for repayment, but as far as possible the personal freedom of the debtor was respected. In regard to females, the Talmud decides that a wife can never be sold into slavery, but that a daughter under marriageable age can; with the apparent proviso that, if she be sold again, the purchaser must not be a foreigner. Amongst the Essenes, the holding of slaves was unknown and not allowed (Philo, ed. Mang. ii. 457, 482; Jos. Ant. xvIII. i. 5). In a few of the great houses of alien officials there would be the retinue usual in other lands; but even then the slaves would be chiefly of Canaanitish or mixed blood. In Jewish houses free service was the rule for men, whilst some of the girls might be servile in status, though comparatively unrestrained. By law, and even more effectually by usage and public sentiment, they were protected from many cruelties customarily practised upon their class elsewhere.

3. Treatment of slaves. — Discipline without undue laxity was recognized as the right treatment of slaves (cf. Sir 33<sup>246</sup>, where the two prominent of staves (cf. Sir 35", where the two prominent features are the severity to which the discipline might legally be carried, viz., 'yoke and thong' and even 'racks and tortures,' and the kindliness that was the customary rule). So in NT times the master could legally imprison or chastise a slave (Mt 25%, Lk 12% with the although the resting temperature and the seven the second of the s native rendering 'severely scourge'), though the power of life and death was withheld, as also any punishment that led to the loss of a limb. early tradition recounts a controversy between Pharisees and Sadducees, assumed to have taken place in or about our period, as to the incidence of the responsibility for an injury done by a slave (Yadayim, iv. 7). The solution of the Pharisees was that the slave himself, and not the master, must be held responsible, as the slave was capable of reasoning, and not to be classed with beasts of

Another regulation (Baba kamma, viii. 4) burden. required the slave to make compensation on his release, and thus has clearly in view a case of temporary servitude amongst Jews, akin to those met with in the OT.

At a time when Pharisaism was predominant, such slaves as were found in a Jewish household, whether Hebrews or aliens by birth, had on religious grounds to be treated humanely. They shared the family worship, and in regard to obligations were classed with the women and children to be bound to absence all religious ritual in the as bound to observe all religious ritual in the home, except the repetition of the Shema and the wearing of phylacteries. Laws of an earlier date required the circumcision of slaves (Gn 1712) and their participation in feast and sacrifice (Dt 1218 Such regulations could not have fallen into desuctude without involving the ceremonial pollution from which it was one of the first objects of the legalists of the first century to escape. The knitting together of master and slave in religious bonds supplied a strong motive for kindness and forbearance. And in later literature the life of the Jewish home is represented as united and happy, master and slave partaking of the same food, exchanging words of respect and tenderness, and mourning over the separation effected by death (Berakhoth 16b, Kethuboth 61). Altogether the condition of slavery, as far as it existed, was much less oppressive than in Greece or Rome, and was already being superseded by the freer re-lationships of voluntary service, which alone are in complete accord with the genius of Christianity.

5. Teaching of the Gospels.—The institution of slavery was not directly condemned by Christ, but its continuance was undermined by the new principles of social life which He emphasized. Supreme praise is passed upon service marked by absolute submission (Mk 10<sup>44</sup>). The title of slave is appropriated to the highest usage (Mt 21<sup>24</sup>, Mk 12<sup>2-4</sup>, Lk 20<sup>101</sup>.), and sanction is thus given to the 18 appropriated to the ingliest usage (at 21°, Mar 122°, Lk 20¹0°), and sanction is thus given to the practice which had applied it to Moses (cf. Jos 14°, Ps 105°), and made it the formal style of a prophet (cf. Jer 7°, Zec 1°, and the Pauline usage of the term). Redemptive love recognizes no distinction of the state of the stat tinctions of sex or status, but makes men of all social ranks equally responsible for their attitude towards God; and thus society becomes an organism of free men, amongst whom the only authority that is strictly imperial or beyond questioning is that of Christ. The bond-servant of Jesus Christ can be bound to no other master; and in their equal dependence upon Him disciples cease to be able to maintain artificial distinctions of grade or its literal and in its figurative meanings.

1. Literally, e.g. 'Joseph being raised out of sleep' (Mt 1<sup>24</sup>); 'Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep' (Lk 9<sup>52</sup>); (Jesus) 'findeth them asleep' (Mt 26<sup>40-43</sup>); 'Simon, sleepest thou?' (Mk 14<sup>37</sup>). Jesus, as is noted by all the Synoptists, fell asleep in the boat as He and His disciples were crossing to the other side of the Sea disciples were crossing to the other side of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8<sup>24</sup> | Mk 4<sup>38</sup> | Lk 8<sup>23</sup>). Mk. adds the detail that He slept 'on the pillow' (ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον), probably a boat cushion, or a headrest made of wool. Lk. indicates that He was fast asleep (ἀφυπνόω), which accords with the fact that

JOHN REID. SLOTHFULNESS.—1. Gospel usage.—The noun 'sloth' is not found; the adj. 'slothful' (δκνηρός) occurs once only (Mt 25<sup>28</sup>). The wicked, slothful, and unprofitable servant is silhouetted once, for all men and time. The words, 'Thou wicked and slothful servant,' were in the Gospel well coupled; and the first epithet was grounded on the second, he being therefore wicked, because he had been slothful' (Barrow). It is the man of one talent, and he who has buried the same, that is guilty of the sin of sloth. That is true psychology. But let every man give heed unto himself. Genius has yielded to this sin as well as mediocrity. Stewardship of five talents has been neglected, and equally in that case the 'precipitate' of character has been sloth.

2. The life of Jesus a rebuke to slothfulness .-The Saviour was in all respects a complete opposite to 'the slothful servant.' The zeal of the Lord ate Him up (Jn 2<sup>17</sup>). Early and late He wearied not in well-doing, but accomplished what was given Him to do. 'Our great example, the life of our blessed Lord Himself, what was it but one continual exercise of labour? His mind did ever stand bent in careful attention, studying to do good. His body was ever moving in wearisome travel to the same Divine intent' (Barrow). His practice stimulates to diligence, His preaching warns to avoid sloth. The Apostle Paul was built on the same model. When he bids men be 'not slothful in business' (Ro 12<sup>11</sup> AV), these are the words of a man who was in labours most abundant (2 Co 11<sup>23</sup>).

JOHN R. LEGGE. SLOWNESS OF HEART.—A disposition which our Lord discerned in His disciples, especially in relation to His Person and work (Lk 24<sup>26</sup> βραδείς τη καρδία). He connects it with emptiness of mind (άνόητος, cf. Bengel, who paraphrases, 'void of mind and slow of heart') as the joint cause of their failure to understand and believe the testimony of the prophets concerning Himself. This dual dis-position is characteristic of the disciples' attitude toward the whole of Christ's teaching (cf. Mt 1515-17 toward the whole of Unrist's teaching (ci. Mi 10-168-12, Jn 149); and the order in which the epithets are employed in Lk 2425 suggests that slowness of heart is the root from which dulness of mind concerning spiritual truth springs. The disciples believed, but slowly, and with a heavy heart. There was an element of reluctance in their faith. Jesus was an element of Messich thay expected and His was not the sort of Messiah they expected, and His teaching was not the kind of teaching they desired. He and His words, in consequence, encountered in their hearts an unwillingness to believe which generated, in its turn, failure to understand. Slowness of heart thus reveals a moral fault. The free action of faith is hindered by prejudice of one kind or another. The will is biassed in a different direction (cf. Jn 717). As Godet says, 'If they had embraced the living God with more fervent faith, the fact of the resurrection would not have been so strange to their hopes' (Com. on St. Luke's Gospel, vol. ii. p. 354). Slowness of heart is the opposite extreme to that over-quickness of faith which our Lord stigmatized in the parable of the Sower under the figure of the rocky ground. Between these extremes there is a quickness of heart which is ready to believe whatever bears the sufficient warrant of the Word of God. Of this quickness Nathanael is a striking instance (Jn 145-49). Thomas, on the other hand, illustrates slowness of heart, while Christ's treatment of him shows us how He deals with such slow believers and quickens their faith into great confessions (20<sup>24-29</sup>).

SMOKING FLAX (λίνον τυφόμενον, Mt 12°°).—The little earthenware lamp is largely replaced to-day, even in the houses of the fellahin in Palestine, by lamps made by travelling tinsmiths from the tins in which petroleum is imported. But the old-fashioned lamp, resembling those dug out of ancient graves, is still to be seen. Olive oil is poured into the bowl of the lamp, and for wick a few strands of flaxen fibre or cotton thread twisted together are inserted. As the oil is consumed the flame sinks, and the wick fills the house with peculiarly disagreeable smoke. The lamp must be replenished with oil, and the wick trimmed, or, as more frequently happens when the smoking stage is reached, the flax is 'quenched' and cast out.

SNARE (παγίς, βρόχος).—παγίς (Lk 21<sup>31</sup>, Ro 11<sup>9</sup>, etc.) is primarily a trap, then a trick or snare. βρόχος (1 Co 7<sup>36</sup>) is a noose or slip-knot for hanging or strangling, then a snare for birds, or the mesh of a net. We can hardly take  $\pi a \gamma l s$  in Lk 2125, with Godet (Com. in loc.), as a net enclosing a flock of unsuspecting birds. The idea in both words is simply that of taking unawares, as the bird in the fowler's trap—the fakhkh, in the use of which Arab boys are so expert—or the hare in the noose cunningly spread in its path.

SOCIALISM.—1. Definition, etc.—'The watchword of the Socialist is Co-operation; the watchword of the anti-Socialist is Competition. Any one who recognizes the principle of Co-operation as a stronger and truer principle than that of Competition, has a right to the honour or the disgrace of being called a Socialist.' This definition was written by Frederic Denison Maurice in the first of a series of Tracts on Christian Socialism, which was published in 1849. Maurice, Kingsley, and T. Hughes deliberately adopted the word 'Socialist' for the movement which they founded, and incurred, as Hughes has testified, much 'anger and bitterness' as a result; but, since then, the Socialist idea has had a secure place in the speculations and activities of modern Christianity. is evident, however, that Socialism so defined is a much broader thing than the State Socialism of economic theory, or than that of the Social Demo-cratic parties of contemporary politics. Fifty years ago, indeed, many men did regard competition as a stronger and truer principle than co-operation; and Socialism (in Maurice's sense) has had an easy victory over the laissez-faire Individualism which was dominant in the political economy of his day; in this sense the famous saying is true that 'We are all Socialists now.' But a man may be against Individualism or Anarchism, and to that extent a Socialist, and yet may be opposed to the current conceptions both of economic and political Socialism; he may possibly regard the growth of municipal undertakings with alarm, and he may even look, as Thomas Carlyle did, to the 'strong man,' and not to the democracy, for deliverance from the evils of insufficiently restricted competition.

Yet general principles are of more importance than economic theories which must necessarily shift with changing conditions of life; and Socialism, defined as the principle of fellowship, may safely claim to be an integral part of Christianity, working itself out in one age through feudalism and canon law, in another through representative government and factory legislation, and tending, through the improvement of individual character, to the ideal state. That ideal state might prove to be either socialist or anarchist, or to be (as society now is) somewhere between these two extremes; for, indeed, if men were perfect, the machinery of society would be a matter of indifference. It is because men are imperfect that the economic and political machinery is a matter of urgent importance. Here 'Socialism,' as an active Christian principle, comes in; for though Christians must always claim the supreme importance of personal regeneration, as against those who think that society can be made perfect by the mere operation of the State, it must also be admitted that a religion which attempts to deal only with the individual, and leaves society to its own devices and the laws of supply and demand, is untrue to itself, and is doomed to failure. Individual character cannot be regenerated while it is being destroyed by bad housing, or by intemperance, or by commercial selfishness and dishonesty, or while multitudes are 'submerged' and 'sweated.' or while multitudes are 'submerged' and 'sweated.' Such things as these are therefore the immediate concern of the Christian; and far more so the great causes—economic, political, ethical which he behind them. Now it is undeniable that, for a considerable period before Maurice wrote, the 'religious world' as a whole had ignored this truth, and had neglected its social duty to the weak and oppressed,—a neglect of which the results are still painfully evident to-day. There had indeed always existed a better tradition, the Quakers had been a powerful leaven of commercial morality; Wilherforce and his friends had, after a protracted battle of 20 years, conquered Individualism in the interests of the black slaves; Shaftesbury (a Conservative in politics) had already won a signal victory over the even more horrible white slavery' that went on in English factories. Both these men were devoted religious leaders but they were not the 'religious world'; hence the protest of the Christian Socialists,—a protest which has really changed the face of British Christendom.

The Maurician definition of Socialism is thus a very real one, and is practical as well as funda-mental. The Christian men who opposed Shaftes-bury were Individualists; they left society to the laws of supply and demand—in other words, to competition; they regarded the aim of Christianity as the salvation of individuals -or perhaps of a small minority of the elect, for Calvinian was in truth the theological parent of this Individualism. If Socialism be regarded broadly as the antithesis of Individualism, as a theory of life and not only of economics, then it is true that the Christian Socialists won the day and now hold the field. It will clear the ground if we give here a definition of Bishop Westcott in which Maurice's words are repeated and expanded:

reposited and expanded:

'The term Socialism has been discredited by its commaxion with many extravagant and revolutionary schemes, but it is a term which needs to be claimed for nobler uses. It has no necessary afforts with any forms of violence, or conflavation, or class selfishness, or financial arrangement. I shall therefore centure to employ a part from its instorical associations as describing a theory of life, and not only a theory of community in the means barulaism as the opposite of individualism and it is by contrast with individualism that the true character of Socialism can best be discerned. Individualism and Socialism can best be discerned. Individualism and Socialism correspond with opposite views of humanity. Individualism regards thousantly as marke up of disconnected or warring atoms. Socialism regards it as an organic whole, a sital unity formed by the confinancial of contributory members mutually interdiperated.

It follows that Socialism differs from individualism both in method and in aim. The method of Socialism is co-operation, the intehol of Individualism is competition. The one regards man as working against man for private gain. The aim of Socialism as working against man for private gain. The aim of Socialism is the attainment of some personal advantage—riches, or place or fame. Socialism seeks until an organization of life as shall secure for every one the most complete development of his powers. Individualism seeks primarily the satisfaction of the particular wants of each one, in the hope that the pursuit of private private private principle, the principle of brothler-cott, Socialism pp. 3, 4).

If the social principle, the principle of brothler-

If the social principle, the principle of brother-hood, had been forgotten, it certainly came to its own again in the 19th cent., though it may be at present rather overwhelmed by the problems which had grown up during its abeyance. Its rapid revival in the Churches was due to the fact that the men who proclaimed it were able to point to half-forgotten Scripture ideas—as with other objects. men had gone back to the teaching of Scripture at the Reformation. It was easy for the pioneers of the social revival to show that the Gospels and Epistles were full of social teaching, and gave no support to the doctrine of 'the devil take the hindmost,' or (in more subdued language) of noninterference. The following extract from a pro-nouncement of the entire episcopate of the Anglican Churches throughout the world (Lambeth Conference, 1887) shows, on the one hand, how completely the principle was accepted within 40 years of the first Christian Socialistic movement, and, on the other, how entirely its justification was felt to he in the NT. Such utterances seem common-place now, only because the Christian Churches have changed. They are not to be found in the official documents of the preceding era;

'The Christian Church is bound, following the teaching of "The Christian Church is bound, following the teaching of her Master, to aid every wise endeavour which has for its object the material and the moral welfare of the poor. Her Master taught her that all men are brethren, not because they share the same blood, but because they have a common beavenly Father. He further taught her that if any members of this spiritual family were greater, vicher, or better than the rest, they were bound to use their special means or ability in the service of the whole. . . . It will contribute no little to draw together the various classes of society, if the clergy endeavour in serimons and lectures to set forth the true principle of society, showing how Property is a trust to be adminstered for the good of Humanity, and how much of what is good and true in Socialism is to be found in the precepts of Christ."

2. The Gospals.—The Gospels are certainly full of those ideas which inspire the Christian Socialist. The Incarnation itself proclaims as the root principle of religion the unity and solidarity of the human race (this is worked out in Westcott, The Invariant Duties (S. P.C. K.)); and the manner of Christ's coming—His lowly birth, His humble companions, His hard life, His death at the hands of the Law—can well be claimed as democratic. He declared, indeed, at the outset, according to St. Luke (416), that He had come to preach good tidings to the poor; to His mother His coming meant the exaltation of them of low degree (1<sup>26</sup>); to His forerunner also it meant a certain levelling of existing conditions (3<sup>2</sup>), and indeed John the Baptist himself advocated that columbary communism which is an un-disputed characteristic of all carly Christian teaching ('He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none,' etc., 311). There is in all this a definite proclamation of brotherhood. When we turn to the teaching of our Lord, we find quite clearly that He concerned Himself with secular things, and did not give any justification for that other-worldliness' which would ignore physical evils. His miracles were in the main works of mercy, designed to reduce the misery, or, as at Cana, to increase the happiness, of everyday life. His parables teach social principles of the most far reaching importance. The parables, e.g., of the Kingdom explain the nature of the Christian religions expand the mature of the Cribbian fellowship, its inclusiveness (e.g. Mt 13<sup>24-20</sup>), its ultimate world-wide extension (e.g. 13<sup>24-20</sup>). The condemnation of riches could hardly be more strongly expressed than in the parables of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16), and of the Rich Fool (ch. 12), and in the warning about the needle's eye (Mk 102). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10) gives a new meaning to the word 'neighbour,' and teaches the obligation of what nowadays is called social service; and this lesson is even more strongly expressed in the most important parable of all—that of the Judgment (Mt 25<sup>31-45</sup>)—where we are told that salvation will depend on whether we have succoured the poor and outcast, with whom Christ identifies Himself.

*This extract is given because it emanated at a comparatively early date from a body which had for long been specially associated with conservative opinions. Nor must it be supposed that the movement which it illustrates is souffied to great limian. It is equally strong both among Protestants and Reman Catholics on the Continent of Europe and in America, indeed, it is numerically far stronger in the Continent than in Great Britain. The subject may be studied in Protessor Natica Catholic Secondary, Laveleye's Novalum of Toules, the Preface to Ensor's Modern Socialism, and other works mentioned at the end of this article. The most recent English work on the subject is Woodworth's Christian Socialism in English.

The Sermon on the Mount in this aspect may be called a simple manual of social teaching. It is sufficient to allude to the Beatitudes, and to point out how much of the teaching in the rest of the Sermon is still regarded as Utopian, as that about love of enemies (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>), oaths, non-resistance, litigation and property, free giving (Mt 5<sup>28-28</sup>), lending without interest (Lk 6<sup>24, 28</sup>), money-making (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>), worrying about the future (vv. 28-24). The Christian Socialist may agree with the 'Socialist of the Chair' that Collectivism would make these principles less difficult of application than they are to-day; but he would add the warning that the secular regeneration of the world can only be accomplished by spiritual means. One sentence of the Sermon sums up the whole truth, when, after picturing in a vivid image material wellbeing (vv. 28-29), our Lord says, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you' (v. 28-29). If we turn to another central part of Christ's teaching, the Lord's Prayer, we find again the

If we turn to another central part of Christ's teaching, the Lord's Prayer, we find again the social side interwoven with the spiritual. It was given as a private prayer (v. ), yet it begins, 'Our Father,' and is throughout a prayer for the human brotherhood. It asks for the hallowing of God's name, the coming of His Kingdom, and the doing of His will upon earth,—in other words, it teaches the Christian to pray for Utopia, and it makes incumbent upon him the duty of considering all social and political schemes with a view to the perfecting of society in this world. The prayer for daily bread asks that all may have the necessities of material life, and this again involves farreaching social considerations. The prayer for for giveness is accompanied by a special clause guarding it against an individualist interpretation. As for the prayer against temptation, the temperance movement alone shows that British Christianity has appreciated the social significance of that clause; and in other matters it is clear that, if the worship of Mammon be the antithesis of the worship of God, a society based upon commercial competition is constantly leading its members into the gravest temptation of all.

Christ then teaches that man has a double duty—to love God and love his neighbour. He must love his neighbour not less than himself, and must do to others as he would have them do to him. Christ condemns the rich and blesses the poor; He teaches brotherhood, social service, and the abnegation of private possessions; He teaches that men are to strive to bring about a Divine Kingdom of justice on the earth, and that they will finally be judged by their works of mercy to those whom the world despises. And, binding it all together is the gospel of Love which St. John has preserved most fully—'This is my commandment, that ye love one another' (Jn 15<sup>12</sup>).

3. The Apostles.—The rest of the NT contains abundant evidence that this social gospel was understood. Indeed, in the first flush of their enthusiasm the Christians of Jerusalem established a voluntary communism, and 'had all things common' (Ac 42-55). It was voluntary, and did not deny the right of a man to possess his own property, as St. Peter said to Ananias (54), but it shows that almsgiving had a very thorough meaning to the first Christians. The doctrine of equality and brotherhood was also strongly felt. St. Paul more than once had to remind slaves that though in the sight of God there was no respect of persons (Col 325, cf. Ja 26), yet slaves must not turn against their masters: this balance between the brotherhood of master and slave on the one hand, and the duty of slave to master on the other, are very beautifully expressed in Philemon (cf. 1 Co 720-24, Eph 63-9). This is characteristic of the early Fathers also (see below, 'Patristic Teaching'); the conditions of society were to be accepted, and men were to do their duty in them, although the Christian fellowship was working out towards a higher ideal (e.g. 1 Ti 6<sup>1-2</sup>, cf. 1 P 2<sup>13-17</sup>). But St. James (whose Epistle contains passages which st. James (whose Epistle contains passages which are often quoted on democratic platforms at the present day) is very definite as to the levelling power of the gospel, e.g. 'But let the brother of low degree glory in his high estate: and the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away' (12 10 cf. 26-10). St. Paul is as strong as St. James as to the danger of riches (e.g. 1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>), and the evil of covetousness (e.g. Col 3<sup>8</sup>), and the duty of mutual service (e.g. Ph 2<sup>4</sup>), and of mutual love (1 Co 13). But his most valuable contribution to the social aspect of Christianity is his teaching about the solidarity of mankind; the social principle in its very essence is in the declaration that There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye are all one man in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>); nor could it be better taught than by the illustration of the body and its members in 1 Co 12, and the great description of the unity of the Christian body in Eph 4. The fundamental doctrine of brotherhood and love is the theme of the First Ep. of St. John, in which it is definitely stated that without loving his brother whom he hath seen, a man cannot love God (1 Jn 420); that the children of God are distinguished from the children of the devil by their righteousness and love of their brethren (3<sup>10</sup>); that to dwell in love is to dwell in God (4<sup>16</sup>), and that 'every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God,' while he that leveth not, knoweth not God' (vv. 7. 8). This is indeed the evidence of salvation—'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren' (3<sup>14</sup>). It is clear, then, that from the beginning it was taught that Christianity had an intensely strong and real practical side in secular matters, that this side practical side in secular matters, that this side—the duty to the neighbour—was equally incumbent on the believer with the duty to God, and that it is bound up with the 'social' ideas of brotherhood, solidarity, unity, mutual love, co-operation, voluntary equalization of condition by giving up of possessions—in some cases, as in that of the Rich Young Man (Mk 10<sup>n</sup>), of all possessions; while there is throughout strong condemnation of riches, of luxury, pride, and the clinging to class distinctions. class distinctions.

4. Patristic Teaching.—There is not space to do more than allude to the teaching of the Christian Fathers. Authorities on the subject are given at the end of this article: some of their more salient sayings will be found in Nittl's Catholic Sociolism, where their socialist character is exaggerated, and in Carlyle's Medicaul Political Beonomy, vol. i., where this side is perhaps underestimated. The Patristic writings are, indeed, extremely difficult to estimate, because of the distinction between what was ideally right as belonging to God's plan (Jus naturale) and what was right under present conditions (Jus gentium)—a distinction which is characteristic of Cicero and Seneca as well as of the Christian writers of a later date. Thus the Fathers held that all men were naturally equal, but at the same time they accepted slavery, though indeed the manumission of slaves was a recognized Christian virtue. It was the same with private property. Extracts can be gathered from the Fathers which are as strong as anything in the writings of modern socialists; for instance, Proudhon's famous saying, 'La propriété, c'est le vol,' is almost exactly paralleled by St. Ambrose's 'Natura igitur jus commune generavit, usurpatio jus fecit privatum' (de Off. 28). But St. Ambrose does not mean that property is unlawful, only that it is not a 'natural' institution—it belongs to the jus gentium. In the same way he does not advocate land-nationalization when he says, 'Deus noster terram hanc posses-

elose in commune, homenous solvent size communicating a fruction communication introduces and available prosession and present of the formation in the formation of the control of formation in the formation of the control of formation in the communication and interest that give their a share of what maintains the control where the give their a share of what maintains the control of the control of private property in an artistic of and that it is not can if make a more property in an artistic of and that it is not can if make a more of the large of the control of the cont

SOCIAL LIFE. 1. State of society in the time of Christ. (1) Asympathetic recommiseration of the materials at our disposal has gone far to prove that the society of the Reman world as the Jugin ning of the Clarist in our was not as the absolutely rotten state apparently petercel by contemporary satisfies and moralists. The naturality rous and strictures cannot be in aided as applying to more than a proportion of the population. The visions and earnestness of their meanmentain in proofs in then selves of a spent to which the provident immerialities were often. The tage a not wholey had which has green in some of its non-bera to be ashamest. Juvenal denounces the arbum of tv with which slaves were so often treated good gives vivid and pungent utterance to an accious bendetness and party which would no burger that to be stiffed. From other sources of interestion it up and pears that there were modificants carees partie it incly in the provinces, which maintained a laudable level of life, keeping themselves free at least from the polluting and demoralizing vices of the capital and its urban imitators. Of them the worst that could be said was that they pursued empty lives devoted to frivolous aims and bubble ambitions, whose vanity was accentuated by their unconsciousness of it. The age was not without its high ideals and earnest idealists. But aspiration was crippled through lack of clearness as to the ideals it would realize. There are abundant manifest indications that a deep, strong, spiritual movement which made for better things had begun. Springing from a profound realization of the evils current, it yet had no clear understanding of their origin and causes, and blindly groped after ways of cure.

(2) It would seem as if the coming of Jesus opened the channels for the inflow of fresh Divine influences which voicelessly and mysteriously began to permeate human hearts and quicken a new and healthy life. The vague ideal which hung in solution in so many minds began to take shape and The Divine Spirit gave content and direction to the semi-conscious aspirations and halfblind desires moving restlessly in the deeps of the human heart, reinforced the spirit of reaction which had set in, imparting to its champions a new passion for the righteous, the pure, and the true.

2. Influence and methods of Jesus.—(1) Into the society in which this new life was stirring came Jesus, and very soon the influence of His teaching and spirit began to make itself felt. It would be an error, however, to attribute to that alone the social reformation which gradually evidenced itself as in progress. Other factors were already operating. The rebellion of misery against cruel economic conditions, a mutinous sense of the unjust and unjustifiable inequalities of life, the strong infusion of democratic sympathies into the govern-ing circles, through the increasing number of those whose native ability had secured them wealth and position, the mixing of different races whose blood was strongly impregnated with inherited qualities often anti-toxic and mutually corrective,—these were factors which contributed to bring about radical changes in outlook and conduct. social teaching of Jesus was not entirely new.
Much of it had already been the staple propaganda of eloquent and earnest advocates. But Jesus made the body of principles He inculcated vitalizing forces in the shaping of human society, determining and dominating factors in its evolution, after an unprecedented fashion. He made them the accepted and controlling commonplaces of re-form and reconstruction. He enunciated laws for the regulation of communal life which tended to eliminate the disorderly element of mere personal caprice and whim. In a word, He created a social

(2) In any consideration of Christ's influence upon social life, it must be clearly recognized that through the propagation of His teaching as through the infusion of His spirit into society. The work of His Holy Spirit in awakening men to the evils amidst which they lived, and impelling them to energetic suppressive and alterative measures, must be assigned its due place and value. The changes wrought upon society in the course of generations are the product of men educated upon the principles of Jesus, but freely using their personal judgment under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy

(3) Nor must it be left out of account that the fact of the Incarnation, theologically conceived and estimated, with its pregnant suggestions of the worth and destiny of man and the Divine hopes and aims regarding him, provided for thoughtful and responsive minds a purified impulse towards a new humanitarianism.

(4) Profound as the influence of Jesus upon social life has been, it was by no means His primary function to procure its reformation. The social rectifications which unquestionably trace their original impulse to Him are of the nature of by-products of His work. He came to reveal God to man and to bring man to God. Nevertheless, He had an ulterior purpose, to which this was in a sense a preliminary step, in the founding of an ideal community, designated the Kingdom of God, composed of individuals whose mutual relations were determined by the implications of their proper relationship to God. The immediate implication of the doctrine of the Ratherhood of God is the brotherhood of man. These two doctrines are basal to, and determinative of, Christ's whole ethical system. The ultimate aim of Jesus, then, may be said to have been social, inasmuch as the final end of His mission would be achieved only in inal end of His mission would be achieved only in the realization of a regenerate society.

(5) Jesus consistently set an ideal of perfection before men. Himself sinless, He would have all men sinless as well (Jn 5<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>11</sup> 'Sin no more'; Mt 5<sup>48</sup> 'Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect'). But this perfection was not merely a negative condition, a state of freedom from every evil spot or stain. The context of Mt 5<sup>48</sup> clearly indicates the connotation the word τέλεισε is intended to laye. It meant such perfection as is intended to have. It meant such perfection as that of His Father in heaven, which, on the posi-tive side, was determined by the gracious activities and loving ministries of which men were the objects and beneficiaries. Human perfection was then to be attained only through a life of similar beneficent activity. It cannot be achieved in isolation. Christ never contemplates human life so situated. Christ never contemplates human life so situated. He regards man as essentially a social being, whose full self-realization can only be attained in vital relationship with his fellows. No man may go apart by himself and live a truly godly or saintly life (Jn 17<sup>11-18</sup>). The ideal character, according to Jesus, is to be realized only through the proper discharge of the social responsibilities entailed by communal life (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>) Sin with Him, and sin of the most blameworthy kind, is largely neglect or failure to fulfil social duties and obligations (Mt 25<sup>421</sup>) The virtues, on the other hand, which distinguish the good man after the mind of Christ are those which emerge in a life of vigilant and incessant beneficence and self-sacrificing love (Mt 25<sup>502</sup>, Jn 15<sup>14</sup>). The whole spirit of Christ's teaching condemns the hermit existence as one which gravely imperils a man's title to be considered a citizen of the Kingdom of God. The root of the world's evil is selfish individualism.

(6). Jesus, then, was not properly a social reformer; He was an inspirer of social reform. He enunciated principles in the light of which the evil of prevalent conditions, practices, and accepted institutions became increasingly apparent. He changed things by first changing men. He made many things impossible by making them intolerable to the sensitized conscience and Christianized heart.

8. Attitude of Jesus to existing social relationships.—(1) All this is borne out by the consideration of Christ's attitude to the society of His own day. Upon its constituent elements He passed no strictures suggestive of an attitude of protest or condemnation. He accepted its inequalities of position and possessions without demur; nor did He range Himself with that species of socialism which anticipates an epoch when the relationships of master and servant, rich and poor, employer and employed, capital and labour, shall cease to exist (Mt 10<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17<sup>7-9</sup>, Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). These characterize the normal and stable state of society, which He seemed to regard as fittingly ordered to provide the opportunities or agencies for the evolution of the type of character which most conformed to the image of God, and the realization of the type of life which best expressed His spirit.

(2) If, then, the essential features of society as presently constituted undergo 'a sea-change into something rich and strange,' it will not be because Jesus deliberately legislated to that end, but because the spirit He infused into men, educated on His principles, demanded different conditions for its fuller and more perfect expression. His sympathies were interentially on the side of an induspathies were inferentially on the side of an industrial and economic order wherein individual talents, capabilities, and fidelities would have ample scope capabilities, and fidelities would have ample scope to prove and exercise themselves, and would meet with such suitable and proportionate reward as would stimulate and foster healthy aspiration, honest ambition, and those qualities of industry, integrity, and disinterested fidelity which go to form the ideal character (cf. Lk 12<sup>452</sup>, 19<sup>124</sup>).

(3) Jesus did not forbid the accumulation of private property. Rather He accepted it as a fundamental right of every man to possess in security whatever property honestly belonged to him (Mt 20<sup>15</sup> 25<sup>201, 59</sup> 13<sup>44-48</sup>). That is the underlying assumption of those maxims which inculcate giving, and of those utterances which approve a giving, and of those utterances which approve a saintly charity (Lk 630, 25, 25). He had no word of saintly charity (Lk 6<sup>201, 202, 203</sup>). He had no word of censure for the many persons of means whom He numbered amongst His friends. His disciples continued to own property (Jn 21<sup>207</sup>, Lk 19<sup>2-9</sup>), and His little company subsisted on a common, if meagre, purse (Jn 12<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>29</sup>). Poor Himself, He inflamed no envy of the rich, nor fostered any class feeling. Money He accepted as an effective instrument for the furtherance of the Kingdom of God. He recognized that, while for one it might be a He recognized that, while for one it might be a snare and therefore should be foregone (Lk 18<sup>22, 24</sup>), for another it provided means towards the better doing of God's will. He was urgent in His warnings regarding the spiritual dangers which attended its ampler possession. He magnified its subtle power to enthral the affections and divorce the heart from God by winning that trust for itself which should be reposed in Him alone (Mk 10<sup>24</sup>, Mt 13<sup>22</sup>). He vividly portrayed how it dried up the spirit of unselfish sympathies and tended to render men indifferent and callous to human need (Lk 16<sup>197</sup>.) He understood how its successful acquisition developed an unquenchable thirst for more sition developed an unquenchable thirst for more, and therefore He admonished all to beware of covetousness, the greedy spirit which wants more than it can profitably or enjoyably use (Lk 12<sup>15π</sup>). In various ways He impressed upon men that money was not the true wealth, and could not of itself procure true blessedness (Lk 18<sup>18-23</sup> 12<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>11</sup>).

See, further, art. WEALTH.

(4) It is evident that Jesus held the institution of the family in profound reverence. He expounded His theology in terms of its relationships. He displayed a peculiarly anxious concern in dealing with questions that affected its integrity. The state of things in His day urgently called for outspoken protest and warning. There was an increasing laxity of view and practice with regard to marriage. Divorce (which see) was common, and resorted to upon meagre enough grounds. The school of Hillel sanctioned it for no better reason than that a wife had spoilt her husband's dinner, this opinion being founded upon a liberal interpretation of Dt 24.
There is no subject on which Jesus spoke more uncompromisingly and unequivocally. He recognized that the stability and wholesomeness of social life depend largely on the health and purity of domestic life. While recognizing its physical basis, Jesus conceived of marriage as an essentially spiritual union. He regarded it as a Divine institution and ordinance, which involved the parties entering into it in the most solemn and sacred mutual obligations. In the highest, and to Him the only legitimate view of it, it was a consumma-tion of mutual love mediated by God Himself (Mt 196). That was therefore no true marriage which was entered into for the gratification of sensual passion or on the score of worldly considerations. It was not within the province of man to sunder those whom God had joined, i.e. to cancel their vows and annul the relationship that had bound them to one another. No human lawcourt has the right to undo the tie made and sealed by God Himself. See, further, artt. ADULTERY,

DIVORCE, EUNUCH, FAMILY, MARRIAGE.
(5) Jesus, then, acquiesced in the indefinite continuance of the ordinary relationships of life then obtaining, as constituting the normal state of society. He gave no countenance to anarchism. He Himself offered an example of law-abiding citizenship, consistently demanding that due respect be paid to the requirements and enactrespect be paid to the requirements and enactments of the civil power legislating within its own proper sphere. He rebuked the spirit of revolt which demurred to the right of government to levy taxes, He himself submitting to be taxed, even when He might have claimed exemption (Mt 17<sup>276.</sup>). He consistently acquiesced in the right of properly constituted authorities to act in accordance with their legal powers; He would permit of no resistance to the emissaries of the Sanhedrin sent to arrest Him. The case against Him founded on charges of law-breaking collapsed. Filate, with the best will, could find no fault in Him (Lk 2314).

4. Jesus nevertheless did not fail to denounce with vehemence current injustices and abuses. His recognition of the prevalence of oppression, extortion, corrupt practices, and the pinched poverty due to them, not only finds explicit and scathing utterance (Lk 20st), but is reflected in many of His parables and implied in many of His sayings. Yet He does not speak as if the emergence of these were the inevitable outcome of established social conditions. The blame is always laid upon individuals who callfilly abused their powers and individuals who guiltly abused their powers and opportunities. He allowed no word to escape His lips which might countenance the methods of violent revolution. He started no popular agitation to secure social reconstruction. No forcible alteration in the mere externalities of life would ensure the disconnection of the secure social reconstruction. the disappearance of prevalent evils. Jesus plainly taught that social amelioration must be brought about by the gradual assimilation of the mass to the ideal type, and the infusion of the principles of His gospel into all the veins of the body politic (Mt 1333). By evolution, not by revolution, lay the path to the realization of the Kingdom of heaven. Jesus did not share the prophetic enthusiasm of impatient expectation to which the Day of the Lord seemed already at the doors. From the beginning He impressed it upon His disciples that it was indefinitely far off (Mk 4<sup>26ff</sup>, Mt 24<sup>14</sup>). He had a profound appreciation of the protracted manner in which a regenerate state of society of a stable kind may only be attained, through the working of healthy spiritual forces in individual hearts (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). In this He stood alone. His doctrine surprised and perplexed His disciples. It was out of harmony with the traditional beliefs and hopes on which they had been nurtured (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>).

Nevertheless, Jesus did not anticipate that the Kingdom would come by a peaceful and progressive process of evolution, without the shocks of revolution. He foresaw that the forces of reform would rouse the strenuous hostility of antagonistic spiritual elements in society, with the consequent outbreak of anarchic convulsions (Mt 24<sup>3n</sup>.). Indeed, He anticipated that the ideal society would never be attained as the result of pure evolution. The forces of evil would refuse to be ousted, and would prove too strong to be suppressed. Successive Divine interferences would be required, cessive Divine interferences would be required, culminating in a final catastrophic one, to secure their suppression and the realization of the Kingdom of heaven on earth in stable and universal sway (Mt 10<sup>21</sup> 11<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>41.49</sup>).

5. Fundamental principles of Christ's social teaching, and their outcome.—(1) Jesus laid the foundation of the social structure of the future by His doctrine of the equal essential worth of the individual. This had already been preached with individual. This had already been preached with conviction and power, but with little practical outcome. Rigid lines of demarcation continued to separate the various classes in Roman society (cf. Dill, Roman Society, p. 270 ff.). It was through Jesus that the doctrine ceased to be little more than an academic proposition, and became a vitalizing element in civilization, and a regulative principle in the development of the new social organism. He laid the foundations of a pure, organism. He laid the foundations of a pure, universal democracy—a democracy based, not on equality of personal possessions, but on equality of individual rights. He awakened a new sense of the essential dignity of human nature, and gave a meaning and a value to the most obscure life. He invested the common people with a new self-respect which elevated and fortified, and with a sense of personal responsibility which steadied and deepened, while eliminating the dangerous sense of purposelessness and insignificance. Every human being was a storehouse of Divine potentialities; His whole ministry consistently enforced and illustrated this pregnant truth. Though consenting to social inequalities, He did not allow these to be regarded as the sign or token of any differences in the intrinsic worth of the human soul. In His intercourse with all sorts and conditions He maniintercourse with all sorts and conditions He manifested a lofty indifference to rank and position, practically ignoring the artificial distinctions of society (Lk 7<sup>266.</sup>). There was no human being beneath respectful regard or outside the radius of brotherly love. This He drove home by incarnating God's concern for the outcasts and the fallen, the pariahs of society. The express purpose of His mission was to seek and save that which was lost. By His self-sacrifice on the Cross, necessitated to procure redemption, approved and accepted by the procure redemption, approved and accepted by the Father, He made plain that the worth of the individual soul was, in God's regard, beyond calculation.
Thus was a new sense of the sacredness of personality impressed upon the mind and heart of the world. From the acceptance of this doctrine flowed many and far-reaching consequences. Life might no longer be held cheap. Every human being, whatever his position, had certain rights which must be respected.

(a) Slavery could not and did not long persist as a normal institution of society. It speedily came under the ban of healthy Christian sentiment (Philem <sup>16</sup>). Such a condition was not consonant with the essential dignity of human nature as hall-marked by Christ. It became impossible to regard human beings as mere goods and chattels, to be bought and sold as household furniture. Nor might they be treated with the callous brutalities of an inhumanity which made no distinction between slaves and beasts. The slave was also a man, and entitled at least to the regard proper to one possessed of an immortal and priceless soul.

(b) Woman also came into her kingdom. Generally speaking, she had been treated as an inferior being, who had duties but no rights, except what man chose to grant her. Her nature was 'cribb'd, cabin'd, and confin'd.' There were indeed many and brilliant exceptions in women who dignified the sex and won the warmest admiration. But the common contempt in which woman was held inevitably reacted on her nature, and, by lowering her self-respect, made of her what went to confirm the general opinion regarding her. Jesus changed all that. He emancipated her from her position of sex-inferiority. He did this by Himself treating her as an equal, in no wise of less essential worth than man (Lk 10<sup>2862</sup>, Jn 11<sup>5</sup>). He gave her peculiar honour. Some of the most significant incidents in His life are associated with women (Jn 4<sup>95</sup>. 11<sup>227</sup>). He overturned the estimates of the past and revoked its unquestioned judgments. See, and revoked its unquestioned judgments. See, further, art. WOMAN.

(c) Jesus was the Saviour of the child. He put an end to the inhumanities with which unwelcome infants were treated (Mt 18<sup>6</sup> 10. 14, Lk 17<sup>3</sup>). He gave the child an importance which resulted in increasing attention being paid to its well-being. The Early Church led the way in interpreting and applying the mind of the Master. Wherever His spirit has been most active, there has the child been the object of the most thoughtful and solicitous care. One of the fruits of the Reformation was the new interest taken in the education of the young. The modern deep and earnest study of child life, the many and varied institutions for promoting the physical and moral welfare of the young, are the outcome of a deepening and more sympathetic appreciation of the worth Jesus gave to the child (Mk 9<sup>23-37</sup>, Mt 18<sup>5</sup>). See, further, art. CHILDREN.

(2) Jesus preached the brotherhood of men, based on their common relationship to the Father-God, to whom all alike owe their being. linked the whole human race in a common kinship. The Stoics had ineffectively taught this doctrine. Jesus made it a substantial fact. Through Him it became a principle profoundly influential in determining the nature of the relations between man and man. It operated towards the obliteration of the artificial distinctions between class and class which obtained in a society ordered according to pagan ideas and ideals, distinctions which almost implied the tacit assumption of a gradual differ-entiation of nature. The Early Church gave practical illustration of the necessary outcome of Christ's teaching in their gatherings for worship, where rich and poor, master and slave, employer and employed, mingled indiscriminately, with the freedom and mutual regard based on the cordial recognition of their common brotherhood.

(a) Through the inculcation of this doctrine Jesus generated a social conscience, the sense of individual responsibility for the corporate well-He sowed the seed of the fruitful idea of the solidarity of the race. He gave a new meaning to the word 'neighbour,' and exalted neighbourliness to the rank of a supreme Christian virtue (Lk 10<sup>202</sup>.). He widened the area of duty till it embraced the whole of mankind (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>). There is no horizon to the sphere of personal obligation. It reaches to the circumference of human need.

(b) Jesus thus evoked a new sense of humanity. He gave it a comprehensiveness, an outlook, and an insight, which it never possessed before. The an insight, which it never possessed before. The Mosaic Code contains many enactments relative to the treatment of strangers and foreigners, but They were these rested on no broad human basis. instructed and qualified by considerations of nationality, antecedents, and prudential policy.

Jesus refused to allow barriers of race to restrict the outflow of the spirit of beneficent love (Mk 728, Jn 42. 40). He taught it to reach out to the uttermost, as well as to reach down to the lowermost. His Church was to make the brotherhood of man a visible reality, environing within it people of all nations and tongues (Lk 1329, Jn 12205.). The duty of preaching the gospel to every creature involves the obligation of treating all alike in the spirit of the gospel. The sympathetic appreciation of the Heavenly Father's attitude to the erring and the wretched, as pictured in the parables, and as reflected in His own life, set men of whatever race or condition in a new light. The outcast, the fallen, the deprayed, all those whose moral and spiritual condition classed them amongst the lost, became the objects of a compassion which yearned for their restoration. Their recovery became the serious concern of every soul bent upon the imita-tion of God. Christ infused the Saviour-spirit into the world, to which all need is a summons to help, and in whose eyes every sinner is a possible saint (Mt 1290, Lk 2363). There was no bondage to sin from which emancipation was not possible, no far country from which there was no return. Despair was a word foreign to Christ's vocabulary (Lk 635). He instituted the method of redemption by pity and love, whose intelligent application is gradually operating to effect what He proved in individual instances it was actually fitted to achieve (Jn 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 19<sup>15</sup>.). He discredited the method of spiritual cure which relies upon threats and penalties alone.

(c) He inaugurated the day of specifically Chrisan charity. Charity had been exercised before, tian charity. but it was largely a matter of expediency, or the outflow of a mere pitifulness for misery and want. Jesus gave it a new heart and a new will, a new sight and a new insight. It was not to be left henceforth to a few munificent gentlemen like Pliny to dispense. Its exercise became the duty of all alike, according to their ability and opportunity. The organization of charity has been justly characthe organization of charty has been justly characterized as the finest achievement of the Early Christians (v. Dobschütz). Jesus erected charity into a supreme Christian virtue. He regarded its absence as a convicting proof of the absence of that spirit which qualified for entrance into the Kingdom of God. That was a sure indication of a soul out of fellowship with God (Mt 25<sup>415</sup>, Lk 12<sup>206</sup>. 1620 n.). Jesus enjoined as a primary duty the prompt and ungrudging use of one's means in the relief of necessity of whatever kind. The priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side were transgressing the first and last law of love. Jesus would allow of no limit to the sacrifices one must be prepared to make in obedience to its legitimate demands (Lk 1233). Charity must not be of the nature of unwilling acquiescence in a begging request. It must be the fruit of that spirit which is ready to give more than is asked, and will err on the side of generosity rather than of meanness (Lk 630). Yet the exercise of charity must not be indiscriminate or unregulated. must not be indiscriminate or unregulated. It must always tend to promote the ends of the law of Christian love. It must be regulated by regard to the Golden Rule, interpreted in the light of the Heavenly Father's example. It must be well considered, ever keeping in view the highest welfare of those who invite its aid. Each case must be taken on its own merits. Charity is legitimate, only when it subserves the spiritual interests of the individual assisted,—when it makes him not only better off, but a better man. It is forbidden to give after such wise as will only encourage or confirm evil habits. To do so were to keep the lower law while breaking the higher, the law of Christian love, which forbids the infliction of the ultimate moral injury that inevitably eventuates from indiscriminate and heedless giving. We must always do the studiously loving thing. True charity finds its exemplar in the Heavenly Father, who will not give what is harmful or useless, but only good things (Mt 711, Lk 1113); and it seeks with wise concern to foster the virtues of self-reliance, self-help, manly independence, and industry, whose exercise reduces the occasions of charity.

(3) Jesus preached life as a stewardship, and its powers, means, opportunities as a trust from God for the proper use of which each man was answerable. Talents must be regarded as gifts, to be used, not for the possessor's selfish purposes, but for the ends of an altruistic love. The teaching of Jesus uncompromisingly condemns the life which is spent in the pursuit of wealth for what it may yield of selfish pleasure, and the expenditure of means on purely personal gratification (Lk 12<sup>185</sup>). We are given that we may give. 'A man does not own his wealth; he owes it.' From the highest point of view, there is no such thing as private means. All possessions are a public trust. Jesus was urgent in His demand for the generous openhandedness of a large-hearted benevolence whose instinct was always to consent or comply rather than to refuse or withhold (Mt 542). To those who exercised it He made the most lavish promises (Lk 638 18285.). The only saying preserved in the Canon outside the Gospels is an incitement to unselfish liberality on the ground of the blessedness it procures (Ac 2015). Jesus bestows as strong condemnation upon the indifferent spirit which fails to use its means for the right ends, as upon those who wantonly abuse them for the wrong ones (Mt 2526., Lk 18<sup>1967</sup>). Means must always be regarded as a means. Their exploitation for selfish or sinister purposes invites and incurs penalties of the direst kind (Mt 24<sup>51</sup>). The same duties and responsibilities are laid upon small means as upon large,—upon the man of one talent as upon the man of ten (Lk 16<sup>11</sup> 19<sup>13-27</sup>).

SODOM —The overthrow of the civiles of the

SODOM.—The overthrow of the 'cities of the plain' was, according to Hebrew traditions, a Divinely-sent catastrophe, second only to that of the Deluge. The sinfulness of Sodom (often with the addition of 'Gomorrah') is frequently referred to as typical of terrible wickedness (e.g. Dt 32<sup>32</sup>, Is 1<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>, Jer 23<sup>14</sup>, La 4<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>36</sup>. Wis 10<sup>6-6</sup>); and even more frequently is the devastation of the guilty cities typical of Divine punishment. And similarly in the NT:

1. Mt 10<sup>18</sup> Lk 10<sup>12</sup>. In St. Matthew the words occur in the course of our Lord's charge to the Twelve. If they came to any place in which their words were not received, they were to shake off the dust of their feet; 'Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city.' In St. Luke, on the other hand, the words form part of the charge to the Seventy; he has 'Sodom' for 'the land of Sodom,' 'Gomorrah' is omitted, and instead of St. Matthew's favourite expression èν ἡμέρα κρίστως ('in the day of judgment'), is used èν τῆ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη ('in that day') [D ἐν τῆ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, so Syrr.]. In Mk 6<sup>11</sup> the whole phrase from St. Matthew (exc. Σοδόμοις ἡ Γομόρροις for γῆ Σοδόμων και Γομόρρων) is inserted in A and some Latin MSS. Hence it found its way, through the TR, into the AV.

Our Lord here implies the great fact, which in the passage dealt with in the following section He states more clearly, that since privileges bring responsibilities, their neglect brings punishment. And therewith He further implies the mysterious truth that at 'the day of judgment' the punishments awarded to men will vary. 'It shall be more tolerable—more bearable' cannot be a mere figure of speech. The same truth is taught in Lk 12<sup>47t.</sup>, and its converse in Lk 19<sup>16-19</sup>.

2. Mt 11<sup>23-24</sup>. Our Lord uttered Woes against three Galilean cities which refused to accept His mighty works and repent (v.<sup>20</sup>). These denunciations were a practical carrying out of the figurative injunctions which He gave to His disciples in 10<sup>14</sup>. The three cities named are Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum. The two former He compares with Tyre and Sidon; and to the latter He uses somewhat similar language in referring to Sodom:

'for if in Sodom had been done the mighty works 'for if in Sodom had been done the mighty works  $(\delta i \nu \delta \mu \epsilon i \epsilon)$  which are being done in thee [the city], it would be remaining until to-day. However, I say unto you [the people] that for the land of Sodom it shall be more tolerable in the day of judgment than for thee [the city].' St. Luke has not preserved this reference to Sodom, though he gives the denunciation against Capernaum (10<sup>15</sup>). With regard to Mt 11<sup>24</sup> Wright (Synopsis<sup>2</sup>, p. 216) says that the author 'appends a sentence which reminds us of [Mt] 10<sup>15</sup>. These refrains are very effective for Church reading, but they often seem to be for Church reading, but they often seem to be editorial.

The typical use of 'Sodom' as an example of sin reaches its height in Rev 11s, where Jerusalem is described as 'the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt.

3. Lk 172. This passage, like the two preceding, is absent from the Markan tradition. Sodom is here not so much a type of sin as of sudden and fearful destruction. Our Lord uttered many logia concerning the coming of the Son of Man. In one of these (Mt 24<sup>37-38</sup>, Lk 17<sup>26.</sup>) He likened the 'parousia' (Mt.)—the 'days' (Lk.)—of the Son of Man to the Deluge in the days of Noah. St. Luke alone adds, 'In like manner as it came to pass in the days of Lot; they were eating, drinking, buying adding plattice healthing but the days of the strength of the strengt ing, selling, planting, building; but in the day that Lot went out from Sodom, he rained [Gn 19<sup>24</sup>] κύριος εβρεξεν] fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed (them) all. Likewise shall it be in the day that the Son of Man is revealed.' The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is also coupled with the Deluge in 2 P 2<sup>5-7</sup> as an example of punishment. SOLDIERS.—Throughout the Roman Empire, and especially in a practorian province like Syria, of which the various divisions of Palestine prac-tically formed part, soldiers were a common sight, and took a prominent share in the administration of The references to them, however, in the Gospels, except, as is natural, in connexion with our Lord's trial and crucifixion, are not numerous.

1. In Lk 3<sup>14</sup> we read of soldiers who came to John the Baptist and asked him what they were to do. The word here is στρατευόμενοι (not στρατιώται) and implies that they were on active service at the time. They can hardly have been Roman legionaries, but may have been members of Herod Antipas' army engaged in some local expedition, of which we know nothing, or even, as Ewald supposes, only a kind of police or gendarmes employed in custom-house duties. The Baptist's answer to their inquiry shows what the temptations of such folk were in those days. They must be careful, he says, henceforth not to do violence or extort money by false accusations, and to be content with their pay.

2. In Mt 8° and Lk 7° the centurion (no doubt a proselyte, though a Roman officer; cf. Ac 101 who desired to have his servant healed, speaks of the soldiers who were under his command, and, in contrast to (1) above, his remarks bring out forcibly the idea of discipline and organization, which was to be found in a Roman legion.

3. The armies (στρατόπεδα) that would encircle

Jerusalem in the fatal siege of Titus (A.D. 70) are referred to in Lk 21<sup>20</sup> (cf. 19<sup>20</sup>).

4. In the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son

Mt 221ff.) we read of the armies (στρατεύματα) which

- the king sent to avenge the murder of his servants.

  5. After the trial before Pilate, when our Lord had been scourged and condemned to be crucified, Pilate's soldiers on duty took Him into their own quarters, and, gathering the whole band together, proceeded to treat Him with the grossest insults and mockery (Mt 27.7, Mk 15.6, Jn 19.2). And during the long hours of crucifixion He had to endure similar meta-transfer. to endure similar maltreatment from the soldiers who were in charge (Lk 23%; cf. Mt 27%, Jn 19<sup>23</sup>). It is recorded also (Jn 19<sup>23, 24</sup>) how they parted His garments among them (see COAT and QUATERNION); and further that, when the end had come, finding He was already dead, they refrained from breaking His legs, as Pilate had ordered, before taking Him down; but 'one of them with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith there came out blood and water' (Jn 1922. 34).
- 6. Lastly, soldiers were keeping guard at the sepulchre when the Resurrection took place (Mt 278sr. 28<sup>11-13</sup>; see WATCH). C. L. FELTOE.

SOLITUDE.—We may infer from the phrase used that our Lord frequently sought solitude during the period of His ministry. Sometimes He retired from the multitude, but did not seclude Himself from His disciples (e.g. Mt 14<sup>13</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>). At other times His solitude was absolute, and He only status of the History of the second sec returned to His disciples or was rejoined by them after an interval (e.g. Mt 142, Mk 125, Lk 516 612). It is this latter complete solitude that is of importance to the student of our Lord's Person and

1. We observe that He sought solitude, or, if the phrase is permissible, was forced into solitude, at certain critical times of special trial. The battle of the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>1st</sup>, Mk 1<sup>12st</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1st</sup>) was fought out in solitude. No human being was within call, and only after the victory was won did angels come to minister to Him. The final did angels come to minister to Him. The final struggle against the weakness inherent in the flesh took place in solitude (Mt 26<sup>4</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>). Although He yearned for human sympathy, He deliberately withdrew Himself from the companionship of His disciples. The account of the supreme crisis of His work of redemption witnesses to a solitude too complete and awful for our understanding (Mt 2748). We ought perhaps to class the solitude which He sought after the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14<sup>23</sup>, Mk 6<sup>46</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup>) with the three instances just mentioned. The people wished to make Him a king, and may well have suggested a temptation similar to that recorded in Mt 4<sup>8</sup> temptation similar to that recorded in Mt 48.

2. Our Lord sought solitude in order to obtain spiritual help for specially important work (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>), and spiritual refreshment after periods of exhausting labour (Mk 1<sup>23, 45</sup>, cf. Lk 5<sup>16</sup>). We may suppose that on these occasions, as on another, 'virtue had gone out of him, and that in a literal sense 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses' (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>), thereby coming to feel the need for fresh intercourse with the Father unvexed with human companionship.

A very curious and suggestive commentary on this twofold use of solitude in our Lord's life is afforded by the experience of the earliest monks, those Egyptian recluses whom we shall not be wrong in regarding as specialists in the spiritual life. They believed that in solitude a man is exposed to the full fury of the powers of evil, that temptation is not completely conquered because not met in its utmost strength except by him who ventures to meet it alone (Cass. Coll. vii. 23; Athanas. Vita Anton. xiii.). Their thought would explain our Lord's 'being led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil '(Att 41). It was, no doubt, necessary (cf. the general conception of Milton's Paradise Regained) that He should be exposed to the utmost strength of the Tempter. Therefore He faced the Evil One in strength of the Tempter. Therefore He moed the Evil One in solitude.

The hermits also believed that spiritual communion with God and the graces which flow from it are attainable best in solitude. The abbot Allois sums up their teaching in his deeply suggestive word, 'Except a man say in his heart, "I and God are alone in the world," he cannot have peace '(Verba Seniorum, ap. Rosweyd, Interpr. Pelagio, x. 5; see also Cass. Coll. xix. 5, xxiv. 4). In this respect their experience fits in with our Lord's retirements in search of refreshment and strength.

The literature of early Western monasticism and much of the teaching of the later Mystics on the subject of solitude fall into line with the recorded experience of the Egyptians, and form a further commentary on the recorded facts of our Lord's solitude. On the one hand, there is an evident dread of the extreme temptations of solitude, and a feeling that they ought not be faced except by those far advanced in the spiritual life. On the other hand, there is a recognition of the possibilities of spiritual advancement which solitude affords (see, besides books cited below, Cass. Inst. v. 4; Basil, Reg. Fus. Tract.; Reg. Brev. Tract.; Bened. Reg. i.; Joann. Olim. Grad. iv. etc.; Basil, Bpp. ii., xxiii., xiii.; Bened. Reg. iv., xiviii. etc.).

SOLOMON. — Jesus makes two references to Solomon, speaking on one occasion of his 'glory and on another of his 'wisdom.' In Mt 628=Lk 1227 He places the pure natural beauty of the illies above the consummate type of artificial splendour, and uses the contrast to point the lesson of trustful dependence upon God, the Giver of all that is necessary for the body as well as for the spirit. In Mt 12<sup>12</sup> = Lk 11<sup>31</sup> the eagerness of Solomon's contemporaries to hear his words of worldly wisdom is contrasted with the indifference and spiritual blindness of the men of Jesus' own day, who failed to understand and appreciate the truer wisdom of a greater teacher.

SON, SONSHIP.—

wife, which definitely = 'son,' is of commonest occurrence in the Gospels, though the more indefinite views is also frequently used interchangeably with wife. The use of views in the vocative as an affectionate form of address ('child,' 'my child') is specially noticeable (see, e.g., Mk 22, Lk 248 15'39, Mt 2128). The latter term is several times rendered 'son' in EV without discrimination. RV, indeed, usually indicates 'child' in mg. as the exact equivalent, but this is not always the case (see Mt 2128 riens).

1. The duties and privileges of the filial relation find frequent incidental illustration in the Gospels. The son has a natural claim on parental bounty (Mt 7°); he is the object of deep parental love and solicitude (Mt 10<sup>37</sup> 20<sup>20L</sup>). (A peculiar appeal to such solicitude is made in Lk 14°, if we are to follow the best attested reading (see RVm); though the collocation of vios and Bous is so odd that it is a temptation to defy the canons of textual criticism, and, following rather the analogy of kindred passages (13<sup>15</sup>, Mt 12<sup>11</sup>), still read 6vos). By consequence, strife between father and son is a most painful form of estrangement (Lk 12<sup>63</sup>), whilst the restoration of a happy relationship between those who have been so estranged calls for the highest rejoicing (Lk  $15^{22-24}$ ). The natural heirship of the son appears in Mk  $12^6$  (and parallels) and in Lk  $15^{12}$ , where the technical term  $(\tau \delta \ \epsilon \pi \iota \beta d \lambda \lambda \sigma \nu \mu \rho \rho s)$ for the heir's portion occurs (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr. p. 230). In the former instance—the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen—the position of an only son as carrying with it sole heirship is emphasized. The ὁ νίδι ὁ ἀγαπητός of Lk 20<sup>13</sup>, in this connexion, appears to be tantamount to ὁ νίδι ὁ μονογενής (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), as denoting an only son (cf. also Mt 3<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>5</sup> etc.). In the latter case (Lk 15<sup>12</sup>) we have a son claiming and obtaining his inheritance during his father's lifetime. This serves the purpose of the parable; but it may be doubted whether such an occurrence was common in actual life. The counsels of ancient Jewish prudence (Sir 33<sup>192</sup>) were, at any rate, dead against it. The more usual course is exemplified in the case of the elder son, whose share in the patrimony was still in his father's hands (Lk 15<sup>31</sup>), but was fully assured to him in spite of his complaint in v. 30 (δ καταφαγών σου τὸν βίον). A special instance of a son's privilege is made use of in Mt 17<sup>256</sup>; the sons of 'the kings of the earth' are exempt (έλεύθεροι) from the tribute exacted from their subjects.

On the other hand, the duty of sons to render obedience, service and help to parents similarly appears. The parable of the Two Sons (Mt 21220.) thus illustrates filial dutifulness and undutifulness. The significance of our Lord's words, 'Behold thy son,' in Jn 1928, is at once understood as securing loving care and provision for His mother (v. 7). Christ's interpretation of the Fifth Commandment as involving the duty of helping and supporting parents in case of need, is accompanied by a biting denunciation of the Pharisaic ruling that such duty could be nullified by a vow (Mk 7<sup>10f.</sup> Corban).

It is clear that Jesus found in sonship an instrument of prime importance for the illustration and enforcement of His teaching. It is certain His exemplification of the filial relationship in His own life was perfect. The scanty hints of Lk 2*0-2*2 (in such striking contrast to the volubility of the Apocryphal narratives) may be accepted as witnessing to such a fulfilment of filial duties during the long years of silence as makes Him the very 'flower and pattern' of all good sons. Mary's surprised expostulation in v. 48 suggests the perfect dutifulness of His childhood's years; and we may be sure the child was 'father of the man,' as to what He was in the after-time as (probably) the mainstay and head of the home at Nazareth on the death of Joseph. Yet the day also came when He illustrated in His own experience His own exacting demand (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>), and showed how filial regard must yield to higher claims, summing all up in the impressive logion of Mk 334. (= Mt 12491., cf. Lk 821). Lk 1128 embodies a similar sentiment.

2. Arising out of the notion of the filial relation in its natural sense, we have the idiomatic use of the phrase 'son of' as a familiar characteristic of the Gospel phraseology. A poetic feeling underlies the description of a wise man as a 'son of wisdom,' and at the same time its appropriateness is self-evident. υίδε and τέκνον both occur in this connexion, and instances of the use of the idiom found in the Gospels may be grouped as follows: (a) = bein the Gospels may be grouped as follows:  $(a) = belonging to, connected with, or destined for. Persons are described as sons 'of the kingdom' (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>33</sup>); 'of this world' (age) (Lk 16<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>34</sup>); 'of the bridechamber' (Mk 2<sup>19</sup> ||); 'of Jerusalem' (=inhabitants) (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>); 'of the Pharisees' (followers, adherents, Mt 12<sup>23</sup>=Lk 11<sup>19</sup>); 'of the evil one' (Mt 13<sup>38</sup>; Twentieth Cent. NT renders simply 'the wicked,' evading a personal significance in <math>\tau o \bar{v} \sigma \sigma \eta \rho o \bar{v}$ ); 'of Gehenna' (Mt 23<sup>15</sup>); 'of perdition' (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>); 'of the resurrection' (Lk 20<sup>36</sup>). (b)= characterized by certain qualities: 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3<sup>17</sup>); 'of peace' (Lk 10<sup>6</sup>); 'of light' (Jn 12<sup>36</sup>); 'of wisdom' ( $\tau \dot{\epsilon} \kappa \nu a$ , Mt 11<sup>19</sup>=Lk 7<sup>35</sup>); as similarly 'of consolation' in Ac 4<sup>36</sup> (this without reference to the correctness of the etymology indireference to the correctness of the etymology indicated). (c)=descendants: 'sons of them that slew the prophets' (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>); 'of Israel' (Mt 27<sup>9</sup>, Lk 1<sup>16</sup>); 'of Abraham' (τέκνα, Jn 8<sup>39</sup>; νίδε, Lk 19<sup>9</sup>, cf. 13<sup>16</sup>).

Deissmann (Bible Studies, pp. 161-160) labours to modify the common explanation of such circumlocutory forms as Hebraisms and due to 'the Oriental spirit of language' (Buttmann, quoted in loc. cit.). As features of NT diction he is willing to see in them a 'Hebraism of translation' (due to Semitic originals rather than to a Hebraistic style or habit in the writers themselves), but is eager to maintain that such constructions are not foreign to the gentus of Greek. He is not, however, entirely successful. Of course, the use of the phrase "sons of as = inhabitants or descendants, may be widely paralleled in various languages (as, e.g., the Hotteris Join Agassa), but in manifold other uses, especially as in (b) above, the case is different. The expression uses vayse (in Horace, Hims forthases) is noteworths, but 'one swallow does not make a summer'; and, moreover, Platon uses of ispense, specially addited by Deismann, hardly affords a true parallel. In Phasta 275 D, e.g., as (appased inpea, denoting the productions of art, a painter's sumby, falls short of such uses as are indicated in (b), whereby personnal qualities are described. The expression is, on the other hand, so characteristic of Semitic speech as to amount to an idom, and the OT writings abound in it. Its occurrence in the NT is best explained in this connexion and it is difficult to think that it might have occurred in exactly the same way had the writers been writing in an independent Oreak style.

2. An arresting feature in the teaching of Jesus is His description of men as the sons (viol. rizre) of God. The most conspicuous name that He uses for God in His relation to men is that of 'Father,' usually with the Jesush addition of 'in heaven' or 'heavenly.' Some of His most noticeable parables and illustrative sayings are based on the relation of father and son as best representing the relation between God and man (see, e.g., Lk 15<sup>116</sup>, Mt 7<sup>96</sup>). See artt. CHILDREN OF GOD, SON OF GOD.

See artt. CHILDREN OF GOD, SON OF GOD.

Notice may be taken of the curious phrasing of Lk 20% sine flaw are inservature seas iver. This per at seems to limit the description sons of God' in those who are accounted worthy to attain the resurrection life (* 20). They are sons of God farough being sons of the Resurrection' (Weymouth). Or perhaps we may equally well interpret by mying that the fact of their having risen above that they are God's sons. It has to be pointed out, however, that this is part of an expansion of our Lord's reply to the Sadduress quite peculiar to Lk, presenting a striking divergence from the Synoptic parallels. It seems to be increly an amplification of the term setty-size, itself a Lukan semi hay for the sampler of appears of Mt. and Mk. At any rate, it cannot be pressed as as to conflict with the general representation of men as being all God's sons in one way and another, found so often in the timpels. A commercial with Eo 819 may be suggested (cf also phrasing in Eo 19).

4. The term 'son' is used of Josus Himself in

4. The term 'son' is used of Jesus Himself in various ways. (a) In the ordinary sense of the word He is described as 'the son of Joseph' and 'the son of Mary.' See Mk 62=Mt 13*=Lk 4*. In 6* (cf. 1*) is also in close agreement with Lk 4*, with the interesting addition, 'whose father and mother we know.' (This is one of the smaller points in which the Johannine Gospel stands on a basis of common tradition with the Synoptics). The expression in Mt 13** à 700 rexrors vide, may possibly have originally meant no more than à rixror in Mk 6*. Cheyne's conjecture, that 'Jesus the son of Joseph' may mean 'Jesus a member of the house of Joseph' (EB: ii. 2598), may be ingenious, but is an unnecessary departure from tradition. We cannot arbitrarily push aside the plain suggestions of the Birth-narratives and the genealogies as to the personality of Joseph in this compaxion.

It is to be pointed out that it is only in the account of the visit to Nazareth, as above, that the Synoptista explicitly indicate such a designation of Jesus. (The Johannine instances are in quite different connexions). Corresponding references to His parentage are found, however, in such passages as Lk 2<sup>28-21</sup> ('his father and his mother,' 'his parents,' 'thy father and 1') and Mk 3<sup>215</sup>, with its parallels. The dominant presentment of our Lord in the Gospels transcends the interest attaching to simple human relations. See also the following three articles.

as a title of the Messiah, except in Mt J<sup>1, 20</sup> (cf. Lk I<sup>27</sup>), where it has the ordinary genealogical force. For the general discussion of the Messiahship of Jesus, and of the Messiah as king, see MESSIAH: the present article concerns only the mass of this particular title.

1. The Messianic value of the title comes out forcibly in the puzzling question put by Jeans to the Pharisces (Mt 22<sup>482</sup>, Mk 12<sup>38</sup>, Lk 20<sup>4</sup>) a questhe Pharisees (Mt 22° , Mk 12° , Lk 20°) a question that they were unable to answer: 'The acribes say that the Christ is (to be) the Son of David; but David calls him Lord; how then is he his son?' The passage is not to be interpreted as a repudiation of the title on the part of Jesus. Of such a repudiation there is no evidence either in His own teaching, or in other parts of the NT. On the contrary, the relationship is specifically taught by St. Paul (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>3</sup>), seemingly as of some importance, and it is assumed of the Messiah in the Apocalypee (Rev 5' 22'4). The passage is a repudiation of the notion of the Jews—implied in their use of the hotion of the Jews—implied in their use of the title—that it fully expresses the functions of the Messiah. The Messiah does not owe His dignity to His Davidio descent. His work far surpasses that of the great king of Israel. The proper answer to Jesus' question would have involved an entire reconstruction of the ideas of the Jews concerning the Messiah, of which they were, of course, utterly incapable. If Jesus did not expect this result to follow from His question, He could at least show by it the logical absurdity of the emphasis they put upon the Davidic sonship. The connexion of the Messiah with the royal house and city was deemed so essential, that Jesus, of Galilean extraction, was declared by some to be ineligible to the high office.

2. The particular phase of Messiahship which the title properly expresses is, of course, the royal estate and function. Such was the case when it was applied to Jesus on the occasion of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21<sup>8-18</sup>). It was so understood, and the anger of the priests and scribes was aroused in consequence. Compare also the Annunciation (Łk 1<sup>28</sup>), where it is said that Jesus shall be given the throne of His father

David.

3. There is, however, no reason to suppose that, as used in NT times, the title alluded to military prowess, or to a career of conquest on the part of the Messiah. Indeed, the Hosannas of the people were in praise of very different qualities. Such a conception of the force of the phrase is entirely inconsistent with the cry of the blind men (Mt 20<sup>30</sup>. [=Mk 10<sup>31</sup>, Lk 18<sup>30</sup>.] and 9<sup>31</sup>) and of the Cananitish woman (Mt 15<sup>23</sup>), 'Son of David, have mercy.' The title came naturally to the lips of those who sought Jesus' aid in their great distress. Likewise the works of healing which He had wrought called forth—so characteristic were they of the Messiah who was expected—the query whether this might not be the Son of David (Mt 12<sup>23</sup>).

4. These NT applications of the title are in close harmony with the OT description of the Messiah. David was the founder of the kingdom of Israel. Whenever in later centuries the nation and its welfare were in the mind, the thought naturally turned to David. When the house of David no longer ruled, and the kingdom was shattered, prophets and singers lamented the misfortunes that had overtaken David and his house. When their hopefulness and faith in God expressed itself in visions of a bright future, they naturally spoke of a second David, a branch of his house, who should restore the nation to its former prosperity. As the past, and especially David's rule, grew fairer by contract with the dismal present, so the new kingdom of David in the future was pictured in extravagant colours. The Kingdom should extend over the whole earth, irresistibly, triumphantly. But this conquest was not conquest for conquest's sake. It was a process without which the longed-for prosperity could, in their imagination, not be realized. It was but an incident in the larger blessedness of the future. To the

Jew of the later pre-Christian centuries, David stood for much else besides military prowess and political prestige. If this element had been predominant, it would have been incongruous to ascribe to him so large a part of the Psalms as bear his name. If we seek for the cause of this change of emphasis, it is doubtless to be found in the very distress that they suffered. That distress was personal, individual. Character became the condition of enjoying the benefits of the new Kingdom, and in turn the new Kingdom—Messianic, ideal—was to exist for the sake of the individual, to save him from his woes, and to lead him to righteousness. Ps 72, in spite of its warlike sentiments, is the utterance of one to whom, after all, the welfare of the people, the oppressed and the defenceless, is paramount. These are the poor and the blind to whom Jesus gave salvation, by such ministry proving, even to His contemporaries, that He was worthy to be called the Son of David. See also art. son of God.—As the word 'Christ,' which was at first a title, has come to be a proper name, this change being, indeed, accomplished even in the NT, so the title 'Son of God' is now appropriated to the Second Person of the Trinity; and the ordinary reader of the Bible assumes this to be the meaning wherever he finds the phrase. He has only, however, to read with a little attention to perceive that this is an assumption which ought not to be made without inquiry, because in Scripture there are many 'sons of God.' (1) The angels are thus designated, as when in the Book of Job (387) it is mentioned that at the dawn of creation 'the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' (2) The term is applied to the first man, when, in Lk 3, the genealogy of the Saviour is traced back to Adam, 'who,' it is added (v. 20), 'was the son of God.' And, if the general scope of Scripture may leave it questionable whether the same high title can be applied to all the first man's descendants, the authority of our Lord may be claimed, on the ground of the parable of the Prodigal Son, as deciding the question in the affirmative. (3) The Hebrew nation collectively is frequently thus designated, as when, in the land of Midian, Jehovah sent Moses to Pharaoh with the message: 'Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my firstborn, and I say unto thee, Let my son go' (Ex 4224). Whether, according to Scripture usage, it was applicable to individual Israelites, is not so clear, but probably it was; for not only did the Jews, in speaking to Jesus, claim, 'We have one Father, even God' (Jn 841), but Jesus Himself said, 'Let the children first be filled' (Mk 7"). (4) It was a title of the kings of Israel. Thus, in Ps 89281, an ancient oracle is quoted in which Jehovah says of King David, 'He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the rock of my salvation; also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth.' Similarly Jehovah says of King Solomon (2 S 714), 'I will be his Father, and he shall be to me a son.'
(5) In the NT the title is conferred on all who believe in the Saviour. Thus, in the Prologue to the Gospel of St. John, it is said, 'But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name' (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>); and, in his First Epistle, the Evangelist exclaims, 'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God' (1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>).

It would require some investigation to determine what is the reason for the bestowal of this lofty title in each of these cases, and in all probability the reasons might be different in the different cases. In the case of the angels, the relation suggested may be that of the Creator to His creatures; and this notion may cover also the application to men in general, who were made in 'the image of God.' The application to the nation of Israel refers undoubtedly to the choice which the grace of God made of the Hebrew people from among all the natious of the earth; and in the Jewish kings this grace reached its climax. In the case of Christians, the reasons are obvious in the texts quoted in reference to them. It is usual to lay all the emphasis on the sentiments entertained by God towards those honoured with this title, as if it expressed solely His choice of them; but Nosgen (op. cit. infr.) contends that in all cases at least some reason for the designation must lie in the qualities or history of the person designated; and this is a contention which seems to have common sense on its side.

It will thus be seen that 'the son of God' was a phrase much in use in the world before it was attached to our Lord; and the question naturally arises, from which of its anterior uses it was that its transference to Him took place. In all probability it was from the fourth mentioned abovethat is, its application to the Jewish kings. If the application to the nation culminated in that to the kings, so the application to the kings culminated in Him who was to be the fulfilment of the regal idea in Israel. That is to say, the term is, in the first place, politico-Messianic. But it does not follow, as stoo often assumed, that this is its only sense. On the contrary, in all the deeper passages where it occurs, whether in the Synoptics or in In., it points strongly to the personal qualities of Him who bears it, and to an intimate relationship with Him whose Son He is said to be. The political title rests upon personal qualities and experiences; He is not the Son of God because He is the Messiah, but, on the contrary, He is the Messiah because He is the Son of God. That is to say, the term is ethico-religious. But it does not follow, as is often assumed, that because it is official-Messianic and ethico-religious it is not also physical or metaphysical. On the contrary, the closeness of the ethico-religious relation may be such as to demand a metaphysical relationship of an intimate and peculiar kind between Father and Son. It seems to be strangely forgotten in many quarters that ethical intimacy is, in all cases, limited by the closeness of metaphysical relationship: the limitation of the intimacy between a dog and a man, for example, is due to the lack of metaphysical unity between them, whereas the closeness of sympathy and intimacy possible between a woman and a man is due to their metaphysical oneness. There is no reason whatever why all the three kinds of relationship indicated above should not be united; in point of fact, they often are. The kingship of a king, for example, may be, first, official, he being actually the reigning monarch; secondly, personal, he possessing the ethical qualities which become and secure his position; thirdly, physical or meta-physical, because he is of the blood royal, and has in his composition the hereditary instincts of long descent. In like manner the Messiahship of Jesus may rest on a spiritual and ethical relationship to God; but this may be of so intimate a kind as to demand a peculiar relationship to the Father physically or metaphysically; and in all the Gospels there is reference, more or less, to all the three.

1. The Synoptics.—In the Synoptics Jesus does not, of His own motion, call Himself in so many words 'the Son of God.' But the title is applied to Him in about twelve passages in Mt. and fully half that number each in Mk. and Lk., and in several of these cases He treats this application in such a way as to show that He adopts it. On several occasions (six times in Mt., once in Mk., thrice in Lk.) He denominates Himself 'the Son' in such a way as to prove unmistakably that He regards Himself as 'the Son of God': and many times in all three Gospels (over a score of times in Mt., thrice in Mk., nine times in Lk.) He in the same way refers to God as His Father. (The quotations in detail will be found on p. 86 of Stalker's Christology of Jesus, mentioned below in the List of Literature).

(1) Beyschlag observes (NT Theol. i. 68) that the occurrence of the term in the mouths of others shows that it has its roots in the OT and was already current in Israel, and therefore, that for the sense in which Jesus applied it to Himself we must go back to the OT. It is also usual to state that it is employed in the pseudepigraphic litera-ture of the period between the OT and the NT as a synonym for the Messiah. If, however, the only two passages of this sort supplied by Dalman (op. cit. infr.) be referred to, it will be found that this notion rests on a very slender basis. If the TR of Mk 1<sup>1</sup> be correct,—'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God,'—it would be rash to Jesus Christ, the Son of God,—It would be rash to limit the Evangelist's intention to the Messiahship; but the reading is suspected. In Lk 125 the reason why Jesus is to be called 'the Son of God' is supplied in the memorable statement to Mary, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee.' This power of the Highest shall overshadow thee.' This is a physical explanation of the term, which it is rather surprising never to find elsewhere. The nearest approach to it in the Gospels would be the exclamation of the centurion at the Cross, 'Truly this was the Son of God' (Mk 1529); but it is dubious what a heathen may have meant by such an observation.

Still more dubious, one would suppose, must it remain what the demoniacs intended by calling Jesus by this title, though it is usually taken for granted that they must have used it in the Messianic sense, because they also sometimes acknowledged Him as the Messiah. When Satan, in the Temptation, played with the title, he was obviously referring back to the voice which, at the Jordan during the Baptism, recognized Jesus as 'the Son of God'; but how much that voice intended, or how much the Tempter understood of what it meant, might require considerable discus-

When 'they that were in the ship' on the occasion when Jesus stilled the tempest and rescued St. Peter from the sea, 'came and worshipped him,' saying, 'Of a truth thou art the Son of God' (Mt 1433), the most natural interpretation may be that they were acknowledging Him as the Messiah. If they were, they anticipated, in a remarkable manner, the subsequent confession at Cæsarea Philippi; and this raises a doubt which may incline us to understand their language rather as an involuntary recognition of the Divine in Jesus, occasioned by the sight of a remarkable miracle.

Undoubtedly the most convincing case for the identity of meaning in the terms 'the Messiah' and 'the Son of God' is the confession of the Twelve, through the lips of St. Peter, at Cæsarea Philippi; because, whereas St. Matthew reports them as confessing, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (16<sup>16</sup>), the other two Evangelists omit the second phrase (Mk 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>20</sup>). Now, it is argued, they could not have omitted this, had it contained a momentous addition to the acknowledgment of the Messiahship; against which the only caveat that can be hinted is that there are many examples to prove that it is perilous to rest much on the silence of one or more of the Gospels.

Another passage which is confidently appealed to as demonstrating the identity of meaning between the two terms, is the demand addressed by the high priest to Jesus, on His trial, to say whether He were 'the Christ, the Son of God.' Yet, in report-ing this incident, St. Luke excites doubt as to the identity, because he represents Him as being asked first simply if He were 'the Christ'; but when He wound up His reply with the imposing words,

'Hereafter shall the Son of Man sit on the right hand of the power of God,' they proceeded, 'Art thou, then, the Son of God?' and the affirmative answer to this second question seems to have shocked and irritated them far more than the answer to the first, occasioning a tempest of rage and insult in all present, with a unanimous agreement that He had been guilty of blasphemy (Lk 2200). H. J. Holtzmann, who writes with extra-ordinary feeling on this subject, recently, in a review in the Theologische Literaturzeitung, declaring it to be a shame that Protestant scholars should even doubt the identity, affirms that 'the blasphemy can only have been found in the fact that a man of God and going forward to a shameful death, should have dared to represent himself as the object and fulfilment of all the Divine promises given to the nation'; but the blasphemy is far more obvious if the claim to be 'the Son of God' was understood to mean more than even Messiah-

From the foregoing examination of the passages the phrase is used of Jesus in the Gospels where the phrase is used of Jesus by others than Himself, it will be perceived that there is considerable variety of meaning and appli-cation; it certainly is Messianic, but it is not uniformly or exclusively so.

(2) When we turn to the passages in which Jesus speaks of Himself as 'the Son,' or calls God His Father, the official-Messianic element is almost entirely absent, the language being that of inti-macy and confidence. Here and there, indeed, there may be Messianic associations involved, as when Jesus promises to the Twelve that, in the day of the full manifestation of the Kingdom, they shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 1928), or when He predicts that on the judgment-day He will appear in the glory of His Father and of the holy angels (Mk 828); but, as a rule, one might read the greater number of as a rule, one might read the greater number of these sayings without being reminded that they proceeded from the lips of one claiming to be the Messiah. The consciousness to which they give expression is that of a personal relationship, as when, in Gethsemane, He prays, 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt'; and, farther on, 'O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done' (Mt 26.9° 4°); or when, on the cross, He cries, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do'; and, farther on, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23.4 4°).

The climax of this ethico-religious sentiment is reached in the great saying of Mt 11.2" || Lk 10.22

reached in the great saying of Mt 11" Lk 10" 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.' In recent times this passage has attracted great attention, not a few looking upon it as the profoundest utterance of Jesus in the Synoptics. Holtzmann, indeed, hesitates between such a decision and a suggestion of Brandt's that it is a cento, put into the mouth of Jesus, of words borrowed partly from other Scripture and partly from the Apocrypha; but by Keim it has been reverentially interpreted, and scholarship has, on the whole, knelt before it as expressing the innermost mystery of the consciousness of Jesus. The words were spoken at a crisis, when He was roused out of deep depression at the apparent failure of His mission, by the return of the Seventy, bringing a joyful account of the results of their labours. 'In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight' (Mt 11256.). Then followed the words already agnit (Mt 11—). Then followed the words ancomy quoted. The first of them, 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father,' may be best understood, as is suggested by Lütgert (op. cit. infr.), of the Messianic dominion in its widest extent, as it had been promised in prophecy from of old; while the next words, 'For no man knoweth the Son but the Father, etc., express the consciousness of His own right and ability to fill this position, because He has all the resources of the Divine nature to dispense to those who come to Him. This is why He proceeds immediately to say, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (v. 28). The mood in which He was consisted of a joyful uprising within Himself of the consciousness of all He was able to do for those who trusted Him; and this was due to His inti-mate and perfect union with Deity.

Most scholars, however, hasten to add that this sonship was purely ethical, and was not different from that to which He was prepared to introduce His disciples. He showed, it is remarked, the true pathway to this position, and the one by which He had reached it Himself, in such sayings as the following: 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you; that ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust '(Mt 5<sup>461</sup>). Certainly this sonship of Jesus is ethico-religious, and this indicates the pathway by which the disciples of Jesus may participate in His sonship; but that His sonship and theirs are in all respects identical is contradicted by the unfailing usage of Jesus in speaking of God as 'my Father' and 'your Father,' but never as 'our Father.' Of this difference Holtzmann makes light in the same way in which he lays down the wholly unsupported assumption that Jesus prayed the Lord's Prayer with the disciples, including the fifth petition; but the fact is a radical one; and the conclusion to which it points is not without other confirmation.

Thus, in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, the owner of the vineyard, after sending servant after servant to negotiate with the labourers, sends his own son, Mk. adding 'his well-beloved,' by whom Jesus obviously intends Himself. Of course, it may be said that the Messiah was different from all the prophets, and that this difference may be indicated by the difference between a son and a servant; but the analogy would be closer if a more intimate and personal relationship were assumed.

One of the most striking passages pointing in the same direction is one that, at first sight, seems to point the opposite way. In Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, speaking of a date in the future, Jesus says, 'But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.' Naturally this has been often quoted as a conclusive disproof of the orthodox doctrine of the Sonship of our Lord, and it has been one of the chief occasions for the invention of the kenotic theories, as they are called, of His Person; but, on the other hand, it is one of the clearest indications of a consciousness superior to clearest indications of a consciousness superior to mere humanity, for it places the speaker above both men and angels so obviously, that even Holtzmann, in an unwonted outburst of concession, exclaims: 'This is the single passage in which the Son, while opposed along with the angels to the Father, appears to become a metaphysical magnitude' (NT Theol. i. 268).

The inference appearing to follow from the passage just quoted is that Jesus was a Being above both men and angels, but inferior to God. But a more profound and true knowledge is supplied by the most impressive passage of all on this subject in the Synoptics—the words of Jesus with which the First Gospel concludes: 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world' (28<sup>197</sup>.). The close resemblance will be world' (28<sup>197.</sup>). The close resemblance will be noted between the opening words of this statement and the opening words of the saying in Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, already commented on. The promise, 'Lo, I am with you alway,' has likewise a parallel in Mt 18<sup>20</sup> 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' But the association of 'the Son' with the Father and the Holy Ghost is the most remarkable expression in the Synoptics of the self-consciousness of Jesus. How much it implies is a problem for dogmatic theology; but it is enough to remark here that it undoubtedly runs up into the ontological or metaphysical. Of course, its authenticity as a or metaphysical. Of course, its authenticity as a saying actually proceeding from Jesus has been fiercely disputed, and in certain quarters the air is affected of treating it as beyond dispute an addition to the actual words of Christ; but its place in the ordinance of baptism connects it closely with the Author of that rite; and there is no reason for rejecting it which would not, at the same time, imply the rejection of the whole section of the life of our Lord which follows His death on

But a more profound and true knowledge is supplied

2. The Fourth Gospel.—When we turn from the Synoptics to the Fourth Gospel, we are immediately conscious of being in a different atmosphere and at a different altitude, and the effect is at first bewildering. Instead of a studied reticence on the subject of who and whence He was, such as we encounter in the previous Gospels, Jesus places this subject in the foreground, and instead of letting His higher claims escape only at rare intervals and in the society of His chosen friends, He proclaims them to all and sundry, and, as one might say, from the housetops. This raises many questions as to the origin and purpose of this Gospel, which cannot be fully discussed in this place; but it may be said that, if both representations are to be accepted as historical, we must conceive the words of Christ as having ranged over a wider area than is usually assumed. His mind there were circles of thought as diverse as those of the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, there must have been ample spaces round both circles, in which the outer elements of both might touch and blend. There is a tendency, due to the preoccupation of study, to narrow the life of Christ down to what has been actually recorded; but this is in many ways misleading, and it is mistaken. It is certain that the acts recorded of Him are only a few stray flowers thrown over the wall of an ample garden; and it is not unreasonable to infer that the same is true of His words.

As, however, we grow accustomed to the new environment in the Gospel of St. John, we begin to perceive that the figure which stands in the midst is not so different as it appears at first sight from the one we have just been studying. He is still 'the Son of Man' as well as 'the Son of God,' though the proportion in which these names occur is reversed. The way in which He here calls Himself 'the Son' and God His Father is exactly similar to the usage in the Synoptics, only He has these terms far more frequently on His lips. Not a few of the most astonishing statements He makes about Himself are substantially anticipated in the verse of an earlier Gospel so frequently referred to, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>. He does not hesitate, even in Jn., to may 'my Father is greater than I' (14"), or to speak of God as 'my God' (20"). We have here the same three elements in the sonship as formerly—the theocratic Messianic, the ethicoreligious, and the physical or metaphysical only they may be mingled in somewhat different proportions. The Messianic we see in its most unmistakable form in the testimonies of the Haptist (1"), of Nathanael (1"), of Martha (11"), and of others; but the boundaries of the other two will require more careful investigation.

Two things are new—the description of the Son ms 'only begotten' (1<sup>16,16</sup> 3<sup>16,16</sup>), and the claim to pre-existence on the part of Jesus.

(1) The adjective posserve describes the unique Sonship of Jesus. St. John is not unaware that there are other sons of God. So far from it, his Gospel opens with the great statement, already quoted, 'But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name' (Jn 1<sup>13</sup>); and in his First Epistle he exclaims, 'Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is' (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>); but such are not sons of God in the same sense in which Jesus is 'the Son of God.' Wherein, then, does the uniqueness consist? It cannot lie in the ethico-spiritual region; for it is there that in this respect Jesus and those who receive Him are one, except in degree of intimacy with the Father. Most assume that it lies in Messishship; and, no doubt, in being the Messish, Jesus is unique. Even Weiss takes it for granted that this is where it lies, contending again and again that nothing metaphysical is suggested. This, however, is a mere piece of dogmatium; for the uniqueness might quite as well lie in this quarter. In fact, the verbal idea in the adjective rather suggests it, and it is very significant that St. John treats the claim of Jesus to Sonship as involving equality with God. In 5<sup>10</sup> we read, 'Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said that God was his Father, making himself equal with God'; and in 10<sup>20</sup> 'The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thes not, but because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God,' this being because He had stated, 'I and my Father are one' (v **).

stated, 'I and my Father are one' (v **).

The force of this is turned saide by Wendt with the assumption that these noise are from the pen of a rediactor, who, both here and elsewhere, has smought confusion in the record emanating from the disciple whom Jesus lovest. Beyerhing takes the bull more boldly by the horns with the suggestion that these remarks of the Jesus are quoted as evidences of their percentity and stupidity, the sayings of Jesus on which they were comments not having implied at all what they supposed. But it may be left to everyone to my whether or not this is a natural manner of reading St. John a narrative. At all events, as a historical statement, it is of the utmost importance that by the contemporaries of Jesus His claim to be the Son of God, put forward as it was by Him, was interpreted in this way

(2) The passages in which Jesus claims pre-existence are four -0.0 'What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before '; 8.0 'Verily I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am'; 174.5 'I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do; and now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was'; and especially, 1725 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world'; to which may be added 16.0 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.' In all these cases, not excepting the last, the leaving of the world—

Beyachiag attacks the pre-sistence with vigour, and displays remarkable ingusuity in explaining it of an ideal statemee in the mind and purpose of God. Thus, before God thought of Abraham. He was thinking of Jesus, who was anterior and superior in the Drivine plan. But, after the laborious analysis is over, these great myings draw themselves together again and stare the reader in the face as a united and coherent aspect of the self-consciousness of Jesus. Wendt applies to these taxts his favourite davice of showing that what is mid of Jesus, and is supposed to imply something superhuman, is also applied to others of whom nothing superhuman can be predicated. Thus, if Jesus (1999) says to the Jesus, I speak that which I have seen with now Father, 'explaining, further on. 'I a are of your father see with my Father,' He adds, 'And ye do that which I have seen with now father,' explaining, further on. 'I a are of your father see the devil, and the lasts of your father ye will do' (4° 4), and the argument is, that if this implies that Jesus pre-existed with God, it must imply also that the Jesus spe-existed with statement of St. Paul, that 'the saints shall judge the world' (I Co 59), is used to take all the greatness and solemnity out of the statements of Jesus as loc the position which He is to occupy at the Last Day as the Judge of the quick and the dead. Wendt habitually reduces the great myings of Jesus to the lowest possible terms, and then assumes that this must be the meaning in every case. But the reader wearism of such a process' he level that surely Jesus cannot have put the minimum of significance into His words on all occasions, or, if so, how is the town the surely Jesus cannot have put the minimum of significance into His words on all occasions, or, if so, how is the town the surely Jesus cannot have put the minimum of significance into His words on all occasions, or, if so, how is the town when the minimum of the main and the behavior of th

The witness of Jesus to His own pre-existence is not confined to the texts just quoted, remarkable as these are, but pervades the whole mass of His words in the Fourth Gospel, and forms the pre-supposition of all the rest of His utterances about Himself. It is by commencing at this starting-point and following this clue that the student finds everything expanding before him as he goes on, and all the various ideas arranging themselves in their places on the right hand and on the left.

Whether there be any analogy to the consciousness of Jesus at this point in what some of the ancients believed about his life being a reminiscence of a life preceding, or in what some of the modern poets have hinted about human beings trailing clouds of glory from an antecedent home, may be left to everyone's own judgment, but Jesus habitually spoke as if He were conscious of having had an anterior existence, where He had seen and heard what He repeated during His earthly life, and had received commandment how He should afterwards act. Thus to Nicodemus He says (311-12), 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Non of Man which is in heaven.' In the great intercessory prayer He says to His Father (175), 'I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have surely that I came out from thee, and they have surely that I came out from thee, and they have surely that I came out from thee, and they have surely that I came out from thee, and they have scious of having been 'sent' into the world. This recalls the mission of the prophets of the OT, who, though not haunted by any reminiscence of a previous state of existence, yet were all profoundly conscious that they had been chosen and ordained to do a particular work at a particular time; some, like Jeremiah, being told that even from the womb they had been destined to their peculiar vocation. With this prophetic consciousness that of Jesus was in close analogy; yet the references to it suggest a deeper mystery. Corresponding with this sending on God's part is a 'coming' on the part of Jesus Himself; and in some of the passages in which He says, 'I am come,' there is the same suggestion of something weighty and more than usually significant. Not infrequently both conceptions are blended, as in 628 I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me'; or 722. 29 'Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not; but I know him; for I am from him, and he hath sent me'; or 8<sup>12</sup> 'If God were your Father, ye would love me; for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me.' Cf. 5<sup>22</sup> 24 25. 37. 28 6<sup>44</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 28 8<sup>16</sup> 18. 28. 29. 42 94 10<sup>26</sup> 11<sup>42</sup> 12<sup>44</sup> 49 15<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 18. 20 20<sup>21</sup>; also 6<sup>33</sup> 28 7<sup>14</sup> 939 1010 1627. 28.

The object or purpose for which He was thus 'sent' and 'came' into the world is expressed in a great variety of forms, all of which, however, are more or less suggestive of the dignity and uniquemore or less suggestive of the dignity and uniqueness of Him of whom they are predicated, though of course some make this impression more than others. Thus He comes to reveal the truth and to glorify God thereby. So He said to Pilate, 'To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth' (18<sup>37</sup>). In His great High-Priestly prayer He says to the Father, 'I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do'; again, 'I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world'; and again, 'I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it; that the love where-with thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them' (17<sup>4</sup> 6.26). So illuminating and comprehensive is this revelation, that He calls Himself 'the light of the world' (see 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>36</sup>. 4<sup>5</sup>). Sometimes He comes to judge. He even goes so far as to say, 'The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son' (5<sup>22</sup>). Sometimes He comes to 'save,' as in 10<sup>9</sup> 'I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture'; or 12<sup>47</sup> 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.' But oftenest His mission is to give life, this being expressed in a great variety of forms. Thus, in 10<sup>10</sup>, He says, 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.' Sometimes the opposite alternative is tragically suggested, as in the well known 316, where 'to perish' stands in contrast with 'life'; or in 851 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death,' where death awaits those who do not receive 'life' from Christ. Frequently the adjective 'eternal' is joined with It is a peculiarity of the Fourth Gospel to conceive of eternal life as capable of being enjoyed even in the present world; but it also compre-hends the future, and this is sometimes the ruling The intimate connexion of Jesus Himself with the bestowal of this life is extremely significant. Thus, in 526, He claims, 'As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself.' At the grave of Lazarus He exclaimed, 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.

yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and be-lieveth in me shall never die.' The communication of natural life is interchanged with that of spiritual life; in 521, for example, He says, 'As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will'; and farther on, at 523, it is added, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live.' The personal share of Jesus in all this is further indicated in His claim to be the bread of life (6<sup>27, 32, 33, 47, 51</sup>), and to give the water of life (4<sup>10, 14</sup> 7<sup>57, 38</sup>). In view of such sublime statements, the term 'Messianic' is frequently used in a way that is a delusion and a snare. What explanation of such pretensions is it to say that He who made them differed from other men and prophets by being the Messiah? The possession of no office whatever is able to make a mortal capable of such functions: there must be something far above the competency of mere man in any one who can be the subject of such pre-In Cur Deus Homo Anselm develops the dicates. argument that, the Person being such as He was, the work must be Divine; but the logic tells equally in the opposite direction: the work being such, the Person must be Divine.

Some of these works are, however, invisible, because spiritual, and some belong to the distant future. Hence Jesus could not show Himself in the act of doing them. But He did works, which all could see, that were signs and guarantees of these. He healed the blind, in order to prove that He was the organ of revelation; He raised the dead, in order to prove that He would be the Lord of the resurrection at the Last Day. So He Himself interpreted His miracles; and He appealed confidently to their evidential power, 'If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but, if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me and I in him' (10<sup>37.38</sup>; see also 1<sup>48</sup> 4<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 11<sup>4.15</sup> 14<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>25.24.26</sup>).

All the time, however, whilst doing His works on earth, He was in uninterrupted communion with His Father in heaven, actually speaking of Himself once (3<sup>13</sup>) as 'in heaven,' if the reading can be trusted. Such expressions have been used to break down the testimonies to His pre-existence. as if none of these might mean any more than such an ideal presence elsewhere. But this is a distinct aspect of His testimony to Himself, a distinct aspect of His testimony to Himself, and there is no inconsistency between the two. His works, His works He knew to be all the Father's (7<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>10, 24</sup> 5<sup>19, 29</sup>). He could say, 'He that sent me is with me; the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please Him' (8<sup>29</sup>). With the most touching naïveté He spoke of the Father's love to Him and His own love to the Father (10<sup>17</sup> love to Him and His own love to the Father (10<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>23, 24, 26</sup>). He strives for language strong enough to express the unity between His Father and Himself (638 1038 1410 1721). At last the climax is reached in the utterance which brought down on His head the charge of blasphemy, 'I and the Father are one' (10°0).

Though, however, thus united with God on earth, He longs for return to the other world, which is His true home. To this He often refers, not infrequently connecting the thought of going thither with that of having come from the same place; and what could be more natural? Thus, in 814 He says, 'Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true; for I know whence I came and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come and whither I go': and in 162 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world:

Such is a slight sketch of the Christology of Jesus as presented by St. John. Not every statement is expressly connected with 'the Son of God' ment is expressly connected with 'the Son of God' in so many words; but this is the phrase that embodies all these various elements. The summits of the testimony are such verses as 5<sup>23.25</sup> 8<sup>88</sup> 10<sup>15.30</sup> 11<sup>4.25</sup> 12<sup>45</sup> 13<sup>31.32</sup> 14<sup>4.7.2.13.14</sup>. Longer passages specially worthy of consideration are 3<sup>10-21</sup> 5<sup>19-47</sup> 6<sup>32-40</sup> 8<sup>42-47</sup> 15. 17. In one passage He deals directly and deliberately with the charge that, in calling Himself 'the Son of God,' He was making Himself could with God. Here was an apportunity of disequal with God. Here was an opportunity of disequal with God. Here was an opportunity of disclaiming anything of the kind, and explaining, as many are now forward to do for Him, that the question was only of function and character, not of nature. He did, indeed, refer to some who, in the OT, were called 'gods' on account of function alone; but He set His own claim above theirs as supported by a far higher reason: 'If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came, and the Scripture cannot be broken, say we of him the Scripture cannot be broken, say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Sonof God?'(10<sup>35f</sup>.). And He goes on to affirm, 'The Father is in me and I in him'(v.<sup>38</sup>). It is true that it is arguable whether in these words only function is referred to, but the point is that something deeper is not only not excluded but suggested. Those who believe that all such expressions have reference to superiority of function and character, but not of nature, have no difficulty in finding words by which this distinction can be made perfectly intelligible. Why then did Jesus, when perfectly intelligible. Why then did Jesus, when thus directly challenged, not find such words? The numerous sayings quoted in the foregoing paragraphs amply prove that, in speaking of His own origin and the source of His authority, He habitually used language of dazzling splendour and magnificence. Was this an exaggerative manner of expressing what was ordinary, or was it an effort to body forth in human speech what was to glorious to be expressed? The halo round was too glorious to be expressed? The halo round the head of 'the Son of God' is not an invention of primitive Christianity or ecclesiastical councils— for whatever excesses of superstition or dogmatism these may be answerable—but is due to the consciousness and the testimony of Jesus Himself; and by the character of Him who was 'meek and lowly in heart, as well as by the conviction of His power to save wrought by centuries of experi-ence into the mind of Christendom, the acknowledgment is demanded that it is not an exhalation from beneath, but an emanation from the eternal throne.

SON OF MAN.-1. Occurrences of the expression in the NT.-

(a) In the Gospels it is found in the following passages—eighty-one in all: Mt 820 95 1023 1119 123. 22. 40 1337. 41 1613. 27. 28 173. 12 23 1928 2013. 28 247. 30 bts. 37. 39. 44 2531 262. 24 bts. 45. 64.—[30 times]; Mt 210. 28 2631. 38. 99. 12. 31 1033. 45 1326 1421 bts. 41. 62.—[14 times]; Lk 524 68. 22 724 262. 22. 44. 86 1130 128. 10. 40 17.2. 24. 25. 30 183. 31 1910 2177. 36 2222. 48. 69 247.—[25 times]; Jn 151 313. 14 677. 38. 62 28 28 28 28 MT 1223. 24 bts. 1331.—[12 times]. It is obvious to remark that these eighty-one passages do not by any means represent as many different occasions on which the phrase is reported to have been used. Thus of the thirty passages cited from Mt. it will be found on examination that nine have direct parallels in both Mk. and Lk.; that four have parallels in Mk. only, and eight in Luke only; while the remaining nine are peculiar to Matthew (see the tables provided by Driver in Hastings' DB iv. 579, Schmidt, BB iv. 4713, and by J. A. Robinson in The Study of the Gospels, p. 581. To the parallel passages in the Synoptics, which exhibit diversity in regard to this particular expression, attention will be directed later.

(b) Apart from the Gospels 'the Son of Man' is found only in Ac 756 (cf. Lik 2269). In Rev 113 and 1414 the expression used, though akin, is not the same: it is 'one [sitting] like unto a son of man,' which is a precise reproduction of the phrase in Dn 713.

With but one exception the name as found in the Gospels is used only by our Lord Himself. The exception is Jn 12<sup>24</sup>, and even there it is presupposed that Jesus had spoken of Himself as the Son of Man.' 'The multitude therefore answered him, We have heard out of the law that the Christ abideth for ever; and how sayest thou, The Son of Man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of Man?' The multitude are familiar with the title 'the Son of Man'; to them it is a designation of the Messiah; their difficulty is to reconcile Messiahship with exaltation through death. The impression derived from this passage, that the title under discussion was by no means new upon the lips of our Lord,however great the access of content it received from His employment of it,—is confirmed by the significant fact that throughout the Gospel narrasignificant fact that throughout the Gospel narratives there is not a trace that disciples, or the wider public, were in any wise perplexed by the designation. This fact, it may be remarked in passing, has not been allowed its due weight by those who, like Westcott (Gospel of St. John, p. 33 ff., 'It was essentially a new title'), regard the designation as originating with our Lord; or who, like B. Weiss (NT Theol. i. 73), explain the employment of it by Jesus on the supposition that, if not new, it was not one of the current Messianic titles. If new, or unfamiliar, the frequent use of such a self-designation must have occasioned remark, and called for explanation, which would surely have found record in one or other of the Evangelic narratives. If then the Gospels, both by what they say and by what they leave unsaid, favour the view that 'Son of Man' was already known, prior to the ministry of Jesus, as a Messianic title, it becomes needful to trace, in so far as we may, its history. Next, we must try to ascertain at what period in His ministry this title was assumed by our Lord, and why He used it with such marked preference; and, finally, we must seek an explanation of the absence of the name in NT writings other than the Gospels.

Source of the title.—Baldensperger, writing in 1900 (Theol. Rundschau, p. 201 ff.), regards it as one of the 'fixed points' gained in the course of recent discussion, that the origin of the NT phrase, and in large part its explanation, are to be sought in the OT, and especially in Dn 713. Previous dis-cussion had been limited too exclusively to the Gr. expression ὁ υίὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; and, owing to such limitation, results were obtained (such as that our Lord reiterated 'His mere humanity,' or that He was 'the ideal man,' or that 'nothing human was alien to Him') which stood in no obvious relation to passages in which the title is predominantly used passages bearing on our Lord's Passion and Parousia. The appropriateness of the use of the title in sayings of the latter class was at once apparent when it was viewed in the light of Dn 7<sup>13</sup>. The Not that the title itself is to be found there. writer of Daniel describes a vision in which four great beasts come up from the sea—a lion, a bear, a leopard, a beast with ten horns. They are judged by the 'Ancient of Days,' and their dominion is taken from them. Thereupon the prophet pro-

'I saw in the night visions, and, behold, there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a son of man, and he came even to the ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given to him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

It will be noted that in this more accurate rendering (that of the RV) the phrase which is of most moment in the subject now under discussion is quite indefinite. 'one like unto a son of man,'i.c. one with human attributes in contrast to the ferocity of 'the beasts.' The question at once arnes, Whom are we to understand by the 'one like unto a son of man'? The answer most commonly given has been --the Messish; and there is much to be said for that answer yet, in spite of the dissent of a large number of more recent exegetes. They point to the fact that when Dantel receives the interpretation of his vision (727-27), not a word is said about the 'one like unto a son of man,' but with threefold iteration (vv. 182 287) it is asserted that after judgment upon the beasts, dominion will be given to 'the saints of the Most High. Hence it is said that on the testimony of the text of Daniel itself, the 'one like unto a son of man' of Daniel itself, the 'one like unto a son of man' does not denote a person, but 'the glorified and ideal people of I-rael' (see, e.g., Driver, Com. on Daniel, p. 102, Drummond, Jewish Memid, p. 229). So strongly indeed has this view impressed itself upon the minds of some, that they apply the impersonal interpretation of the phrase in Da 7.2 as a test to the passages in which our Lord is represented by the Evangelists as using the words 'the Son of Man.' Thus J. Estlin Carpenter (The Sanovte Gaspels, pp. 372, 388), regarding the obrase Symptoc Gospels, pp. 372, 3889, regarding the phrase in Daniel as 'emblematic and collective,' and maintaining that Jesus used it in its original meaning, arrives at the conclusion that 'wherever . . . the term is individualized and used Messianically, we have evidence of the later influence of the Church. Jesus never used it to designate Himself.' It is obvious that the application of such a canon would have far-reaching results. But is the interpreta-tion upon which it is based quite sure? The writer of Daniel does not regard 'the saints of the Most High as coming down from heaven. They are already upon the earth, suffering the oppression of the tyrant symbolized by the 'little horn,' and awaiting deliverance and reversal of condition, which come when the Most High sits for judgment. It would surely be somewhat incongruous to symbolize the saints passing from the depths of misery to exaltation by one who descends from heaven to earth. On the other hand, it accords entirely with the conception which dominates Dn 7 of a complete change of conditions, if by 'one like a son of man' we understand a Divinely empowered Ruler sent from on high to reign where the 'four kings,' the 'great beasts,' whose origin had been of the earth (v. 17), had borne sway.

If it be urged that had the writer of Dn 7 intended the Massiah In v 13, he readd not have omitted mention of Him when he greet out to interpret the vision, and could not have epiden so threserved of the heatowal of Aingdon, and dominon' upon the mints of the Most High, it may be replied that it is quite in harmons with what may be downed in other prophetic writings, if the thought of the author of Da with found to detell more on the glories of the higdon of the latter days and the felicity of those who have part in it, than upon the Messiah. There is no warrant therefore as they seek to portras the latter future conet all direct reference to the Messiah. There is no warrant therefore as Driver (who bowever, holds that 'the title—does not to Dariel directly fenote the Messiah. There is no warrant therefore not for him the hidden is not to be thought of without we king! Another is also no sufficient warrant to assume that if in the rive lat a side no sufficient warrant to assume that if in the rive lat a side in there is mention of the Messian is that the two is in interpreted. It is through have nooting which how the wise in a interpreted. It is through no consideration to the Messian in terpreted and it is through no consideration to the Messian in the protection of the Nessian has the Messian how the Messian have dropped no consideration of the Messian was introduced on have dropped no consideration of the vision, where Hi is minimized in a significant but the form of that his high mint has himself that the 'none like union as a queried but also in the following for that his him himself himself that the 'none like union as no of many is no other than Michael himself himself and the himself himse salf, the guardian angel of larsel ('Michael your prince,' Do 10%) a belated expedient, affording no real assistance. The absence of any mention of the guardian angel in the interpretation of the states is not more case of explanation than the absence therefrom of the mention of the Messah. Indeed, of the two conceptions, that of the gift of everlasting dominion over all peoples to the guardian angel Michael, being the more unfamiliar, would argently demand some explicit word of explanation.

In order to discover how Jewish readers of the Book of Daniel in the time shortly preceding and shortly following our Lord's ministry interpreted that figure, which was presented so suddenly, to be so speedily withdrawn, we turn to the evidence of the Simildudes of the Book of Enoch and of 2 Esdras. Both books are quite certainly of Jewish origin, and both afford unmistakable testimony as to the deep impression made by the apocalyptic teaching of Daniel, which would carry with it familiarity with the concept of 'one like a son of man.' The date of the Book of Esdray is undisputed; it belongs to the closing decades of the hirst century of our era, approximately to A.D. 81. The date of the Similifiedes—a later portion of the Book of Enoch is more open to doubt, R. H. Charles (Book of Enoch, p. 29) holds them to have been written between B.C. 84-79, or B.C. 70-64. Schurer (HJP II. III. 68) places them somewhat later: 'at the very monest, in the time of Herid,' i.e. between R.C. 37-4. Thus, according to both these authorities, the Similitudes are pre-Christian. Whether they have been subjected to interpolations at Christian hands has been much debated. The plea that such interpolations, had they taken place, must have gone further, appears conclusive. Schürer (i.c.) claims, with reason, that 'this much at least ought to be admitted, that the view of the Messiah presented in the part of the book at present under consideration (the Similandes) is perfectly explicable on Jewish grounds, and that to account for such view it is not necessary to assume that it was due to Christian influences. Nothing of a specifically Christian character is to be met with in any of this section 'We are concerned here with the Messianic teaching of the Similitudes only so far as they adopt and develop the concept derived from Daniel of a heavenly 'Son of Man. The following extracts (cited from Charles' tr.) may suffice :

In ch. 46, knoch is represented as saying, when relating his vision of the Judgment. sum of judgment was committed unto him, the Bon of Man, and he caused the sinners and those who have led the world astray to pass away and be destroyed from off the face of the earth.' These passages leave no room to question how the author of the Simolivisdes interpreted Baniel's 'one like unto a son of man.' To him the phrase characterized no symbolic figure, but a colestial person, Prunely endowed with world wide choulmon, and appointed to be the judge of all men. The electricitie expression is un process of becoming a title, passing through demonstrative stages -'this Bon of Man.' I that Bon of Man, a concipe as 'the Bon of Man,' a leave the like unto a son of man, as we find in the Similitades, but the dependence upon Daniel and the Messianic interpretation of the 715 is not less clear. Endras is represented as recreating a dream, in which he may coming 'up from the midst of the sea as it were the likeness of a man, and I beheld [he proceeds], and, lo, that man flew with the clouds of banwen and when he turned him. And after this, I beheld, and, lo, there was gathered together a multitude of uen, out of number, from the four winds of heaven, to make war against the man that had come out of the nea. This multitude he destroys by the interpretation of the nea. This multitude he destroys by the interpretation of the dream, he is told 'Whereas thou savest a man coming up from the ninds of the sea, the ware is be whom the Most fligh high hepts a great season, which by his own self shall deliver his creatures and he shall order them that are left behind. Behold, the days come when the Most High will beyn to deliver them that are upon the earth. . . and it shall be when these things shall come to pass, and the signs shall deliver had restricted be force, then shall not be further explained to be limit, of them shall not be further explained to be limit, of the man are come for their wickedness. And he shall destroy them without labour by the law, which is likened unto fire.' The 'procamble multitude is further ex

The writings of Enoch and Esdran are, it is reasonable to assume, only the survivors of other Apocalypses of the same period, which in like manner founded themselves on the vision of Daniel, and sought to supply in their own way what the prophet had left untold concerning 'one like unto a son of man.' If so, that phrase would also in-evitably turn in the popular mind into a definite Messianic title, calling for no question when it was heard from the lips of Jesus, unless it were as to His right to appropriate it. It is suggestive to find that later on a more subordinate expression in Dn 72 was adopted in similar fashion, and that the u='son of cloud,' or 'cloud-man,' became a Rabbinic title for the Messiah (see Levy, NHWB,

At this point it is needful to pause to consider how our Lord's use of the expression 'the Son of Man' is affected by the fact that He spake Aramaic. If a star row desparent is turned into Aramaic, does it give an expression which could be employed as a title. Or, to put it otherwise, is perhaps a class Or, to put it otherwise, is perhaps o clos T. dreparov & mustranslation of the words actually nttered by Jesus, or an expression of later growth imported into His sayings by Greek speaking Christians? Within the last docade, more especially, these questions have been keenly discussed. Wellhausen gave stimulus to the debate by a footnote in his  $IJG^2$  (1895, p. 346), in which he said Since Jesus spoke Aramaic He did not call Him self o was not desposed, but barnasche; that, however, means 'the Man,' and nothing else, the Aramesans having no other expression for the notion. The earliest Christians did not understand that Jesus called Himself simply the Man. They held Him to be the Messiah, made accordingly a held film to be the Messiah out of barnascha, and translated it not by d desperor, as they should, but quite erroneously by d this row desperor. Wellhausen further lays stress on the fact that St. Paul makes no use of the expression 'Son of Man, and refuses to admit any evidence which might be cited from Enoch, on the arbitrary plea that 'the Son of man in the Book of Enoch must be left out of account, so long as it is not established that the relative portion of the book was known, or could be known, to Jesus.

In 1896, H. Lietzmann published a brochure- Der Messohen-In 1886, H. Lettmann published a fracture— For Methodrical solation which after a review of previous symbons, he enters into a discussion of "Son of Man" in Araman, with the result that he declares the expression to have been in Califfman Araman, 'the most colouriese and indeterminate designation of a human individual—one that hight be used as an indefinite pronoun (p. 36). The use of "12 in the compound phrase is described as a 'genuine Semilic pleonam,' and it is maintained that no intelligible distinction existed between Fist and F1 "3,

The translation should have been $1.50. server until not do, according to Lactimann, since that could be no distinctive designation, and the Evangelists do hoost certainty intend the phrase they use as a definite title, but "Jesus has never used the title "Soc of Man" of Himself, since in Aramane' to does not exist, said for linguistic reasons cannot exist" (op. cit. p. 85). The formula is to be regarded as a terminal technique of Hellenistic theology, which, originating in Christian Apomityses, was applied first to passages relating to our Lord's Return, then to His Passion, and finally to other sections of the narratives.

In 1999, Wellhausen returned to this subject (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, Sechstos Heft), and in the main declared his adoption of Lictimann's conclusion that Jesus, speaking Aramalo, could not make the difference which is made in Greek between made in the Gospeis it is not authentic, but is derived from interpreters and editors. Wellhausen withdraws from the position he had formerly advocated, that Jesus did adopt the Man" as a title, meaning thereby that He fulfilled the blead of humanity. He now declares that to impute which a meaning to our Lord is not warrantable, and that in the absence of that meaning the supposed title would be whose meaningless, and therefore it was not employed. The use of $1.50. that thereafter a became the custom in all passages which refer to the Hectury of Jesus is not authentic, the argumentum existentioned than another than substolupinal passages (op. cs. p. 210). Wellhausen again addinges in confirmation of the position that this self-disagrantion of Jesus is not authentic, the argumentum existention that his self-disagrantion of the position should content hand. Then followed the mane image in other than unifical should b

On the other hand, Dalman (the Worte Jess, 1898 [Eng. tr. 1992) and Schmiddel (Protestant Monatakette, 1898, fields 7 and 8) called in question the linguistic premises of Lietzmann and Wellhausen and contested their conclusions. Thuy both maintain that Jesus did certainly call Himself the Son of Man, using the title in a Mensianic sense and with direct reference to Dn 713 though both hold the primary sense of 4 a son of man, in that verse, to be collective and not personal. Dalman adduces evidence to show that 'the Jewish Halsstinian Arabustic of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for a large state of the surfier issued visually for the of the earlier period possessed the form whit for a human being, while to indicate a number of human beings it employed occasionally ##3# "13. The singular number $738 "13 was not in where the appearance being due to instation of the Hebres text, where (spart from Earklei) Dist 12 is confined to poetry, and, moreover, uncommon in it. The case in Dis 713, where the person coming from heaven is described as 608 702, "one like unto a son of man," is just as uncongenial to the style of pross as the designation of God in the same verse as FET PID "the advanced in data' (op. cst. p. 237). Moreover, just as in Hebrew CHE 13 in never minde definite, so is the definite expectation stelled no 'quite unboard of in the older Jewish Aramac literature.' The common use of $18 no 'man' in Jewish Galilson and Christian Palestinian literature is to be regarded as a later innoration. That this later usage was not already in segue in the dialect spoken by our lovel (of which no written specimen from His time is in existence) is demonstrated by His words as reported in the Compels. '"Man. 'both is the singular and in the shural, is frequently enough the subject of remark. How is it that see as force notice in the Heleinster reporters, agant from the self-appellation of Jewise—have designedly avoided it although Jesus had on all occasions and nothing but "non of man" for "man." That cannot be considered likely.' Hence against Lietimann and Wellissusen Bulman holds both that 'bon of sum' was a possible expression in the Aramac of our Lord's day, and that by its singularity it was adapted for use as a title. 'To the Jews it would be purely a Biblical word. To the same effect Schmiedel, who simis up his view of the linguistic part of the controversy thus the Aramac Levicon 'nous not man because means "man," and nothing more, but it must rim thus because these "man," and nothing more, but it must rim them because the means "man," and nothing more, but it must rim them because the meaning to be extant, and to have been so already second incessing to be extant, and to have been so already before the line of Jesus (if 204). The above linguistic discussion has demonstrated considerable diversity of opinion, as could hardly fail to be the case in the absence of any contemporary example of the dialect spoken in Galilee at the time of our Lord's earthly ministry. In their estimate of probabilities afforded by cognate dialects, or by later usage, scholars are sure to differ somewhat. Nevertheless, the whole investigation has been fruitful in suggestion to the NT critic. But the attempt made in connexion with it to account for the presence in the Gospels of 'the Son of Man' on some other grounds than that it represents a self-designation employed by our Lord, can only be characterized as an elaborate failure. Wellhausen's invocation of hypothetical Apocalypses to explain the presence in the records of Jesus, and in those records not in the apocalyptic passages alone, of a title which (ex hypoth.) He did not use, removes no difficulty, but only calls aloud itself for explanation how such a thing could be. The belief that the title is the genuine utterance of Jesus is left unshaken.

3. When did our Lord adopt the title 'Son of Man'?—There can be but one answer, if we are justified in assuming that 'the Son of Man' was already a Messianic title before our Lord employed it. He can have adopted it only subsequently to St. Peter's confession of His Messiahship at Cæsarea Philippi. But do the Gospels lend colour to any such limitation? Turning to the earliest of the Synoptics,—and we may confine our attention just now to the Synoptics,—we are met by the significant fact that St. Mark has the phrase only twice (2<sup>10, 26</sup>) prior to the Cæsarean incident; St. Luke has it four times (5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>5, 22</sup> 7<sup>34</sup>), and St. Matthew nine times (8<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 10<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 12<sup>6, 32, 40</sup> 13<sup>37, 41</sup>). Thus, in by far the greatest number of cases the title occurs subsequent to Peter's confession. What, then, is to be said as to its occurrence in such cases as are prior to that confession? No one answer will suffice. Certainly it will not do to resort to the expedient of saying that the title was but little known, and that its Messianic application might be missed until our Lord Himself, late in His ministry, brought it into direct relation to Deniel's prophers and the delay the literature. Daniel's prophecy; or to adopt the alternative offered by Holtzmann (NT Theol. vol. i. p. 264) of saying that 'the son of man' or 'man' was used by Jesus at first in its ordinary significance, and then, by reason of the stress He laid on it, came to be to the disciples an enigmatic word, which brought them to see that their Master was a man not as others, but with a unique calling, and at length to find in Him the Messiah. Either supposition would leave unexplained how the adoption of the title, whether unfamiliar or familiar, could have passed unchallenged, and not have called forth questions as to the sense in which Jesus was using the words. As little is help to be found in Fiebig's suggestion that one reason why our Lord chose this title ('the Man,' according to Fiebig), was that men would find in it a meaning, though they might fail to apprehend the meaning with which Jesus employed it (op. cit. p. 120). again, allowance is not made for the extreme difficulty of supposing that a speaker could apply a title to himself unless it were with an obvious purpose, which his hearers would certainly discern. There is not the least ground for supposing that it was a more usual thing in Aramaic than it is in our own language for any one to speak of himself in the third person. Such a form of speech might lend itself to more definite self-revelation, but clearly it was in no wise calculated to secure self-concealment. Wrede, in a note in ZNTW (1904, Heft 4), urges that in recent discussions about the 'Son of Man' too little attention has been given to the really astonishing fact that Jesus is represented in the Gospels as quite habitually speaking of Himself as of a third person, and yet, so far as the Gospels show, no one thought it strange. Wrede is justified in saying that only our early familiarity with the language of the Gospels makes us insensible to the difficulty created by the frequency of the recurrence of the title; but he surely greatly exaggerates the difficulty when he finds in it a most convincing argument to deny that Jesus used this self-designation at all. Certainly it was an unusual and striking form of speech to adopt. But that constitutes no suffi cient reason for assuming that our Lord did not adopt it, even because it was more calculated to arrest attention when He desired to lay stress on His Messianic claims, and on special aspects of them. The real difficulty lies in the supposition that an unwonted form of speech, most calculated to provoke inquiry concerning the speaker, was adopted by Jesus at a time when, according to the testimony of the Synoptics, He studiously avoided making His identity known, when He had not even affirmed His Messiahship to the inner circle of the Twelve. It is needful, therefore, to look in detail at the passages cited above, in which the title is found prior to the declaration of our Lord's Messiahship. For that declaration, see Mt 16<sup>16</sup>, Mk 8<sup>29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>20</sup>.

Taking first the passages in St. Mark, with their parallels in the other Synoptics, and turning to Mk 2<sup>10</sup> (cf. Lk 5<sup>24</sup>, Mt 9<sup>6</sup>), we are confronted at once with the representation that quite early in His ministry, when in the presence of hostile scribes, Jesus definitely identifies Himself with the 'Son of Man.' '... that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins ... I say unto thee, Arise.' It is, of course, possible that the incident is not here in its due chronological position—that it properly belongs to a much later time in the Evangelical narrative. But there is no reason, unless it be the presence of the phrase now in question, to think so. More likely is it that in this case the ambiguity of the Aramaic is accountable for the presence of the title in the Greek rendering. The scribes were charging Jesus with blasphemy because He assumed to pronounce the The scribes were charging Jesus with forgiveness of sins, that being, as they held, in the power of God only, and not in that of any man. Jesus responds by undertaking to afford a convinc-ing sign that even 'a man [meaning Himself] hath authority, etc. Such a reconstruction of the passage finds support in Mt 93, where we read that the multitudes who stood by 'glorified God, which had given such authority unto men'—the multitudes understanding our Lord to have employed no title, and taking the expression He used in its collective sense

In Mk 226 (cf Lk 65, Mt 128) our Lord's argument in regard to the observance of the Sabbath seems to demand that 'man' should be substituted where we now read 'the Son of Man.' He is vindicating the action of His disciples, and asserting for all others the same freedom in regard to the use of the Sabbath as they had exercised. Jesus is not concerned to assert His own personal rights, but those of His followers, and of all who suffered from restrictions which threatened to turn that which was given for man's benefit into a bondage. 'The Sabbath was made for man . . . so that man is lord [or rather "owner"—κύμων answering here to a familiar sense of the Hebrew ""—Swete, Com. on St. Mark] even of the Sabbath.'

Taking next the two remaining pre-Cæsarean occurrences of 'the Son of Man' in St. Luke, the earlier of the two, Lk 622, presents little difficulty. It is an obvious case of an editorial insertion of the title. Where St. Luke has 'for the Son of Man's sake,' Mt 511 has, 'for my sake'—the latter being clearly the earlier form of the saying. Lk 724 (cf. Mt 1112) is quite conceivably another case of the reverent substitution by tradition of the title in place of a pronoun. Our Lord is contrasting His action with that of the Baptist. What more likely than that He should say, 'John the Baptist is come . . . I am come'? The title can be deemed here in no wise essential.

It remains to glance at six passages in the First Gospel besides those already mentioned, in which 'the Son of Man' is found prior to Peter's confession. Taking these cases in order of their occurrence in the Gospel, it is sufficient as to the first, Mt 820, to note that its parallel is Lk 950—i.e. according to St. Luke the incident of the scribe who volunteered to follow Jesus was subsequent to Peter's confession. There is no reason to suspect here any misconception of our Lord's words on the part of His translators. He cannot have said that in contrast to beasts and birds 'man' hath not where to lay his head. The contrast drawn is between such creatures and Himself, the Messianic 'Son of Man.' If even He had no resting-place, His followers might know thereby what hardship they must be prepared to undergo. Mt 1020 is quite clearly not in its true chronological order; it belongs to a later time than the first mission of the Twelve, and to a connexion in which a larger work was contemplated than that with which they were then entrusted. But the Evangelist, following his preference for topical arrangement, has linked these later words to the instructions given to the Twelve when they were about to set out on their earliest missionary expedition.

Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, when compared with Lk 12<sup>10</sup> and with Mk 3<sup>20</sup>, is found to be a combination of two different reports of our Lord's saying as to blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Mk 3<sup>20</sup> has no mention of 'the Son of Man,' but it has the expression, quite unique in the Gospels, 'the sons of men.' It runs thus: 'All their sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and their blasphemies . . but whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit. . .' In the parallel in St. Luke, the unwonted phrase 'the sons of men' disappears, and its place is taken by the familiar expression 'the Son of Man,' and the entire saying is modified in accordance therewith. That St. Mark has the utterance in its genuine form is unquestionable. Whether it properly belongs to the period before the incident at Cæsarea, or, as St. Luke suggests, was later than it, it did not contain the title 'the Son of Man.'

Mt 12<sup>20</sup> (cf. Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). It is sufficient to point the test of the suppose the serious containt to the sufficient to the sufficient to sufficient to the sufficient to the Mt 1240 (cf. Lk 1120). It is sufficient to point out that St. Luke places this saying in order of time considerably later than does St. Matthew, and as before, preference must be given to St. Luke in a matter of chronological order.

Finally, the parable of the Tares, in the explanation of which the title appears twice (Mt. 1337. 41)

Finally, the parable of the Tares, in the explanation of which the title appears twice (Mt 13<sup>st. 41</sup>), may, with good reason, be said to belong to a late period in our Lord's ministry. It owes its present position to St. Matthew's desire to bring it into the collection of parables comprised in his 13th chapter.

Thus, of the instances in which our Lord's self-designation appears in the Synoptic Gospels prior to their recital of Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi, there is not one which can, on examination, be held to afford proof that this Messianic title was used by Him before His follower had declared Him to be the Messiah, or to invalidate the assumption that the use of the title by our Lord began at the time of that declaration, not earlier.

In St. Matthew's account of the incident at Casarea there are remarkable additions, both to our Lord's question and to Peter's answer. In Mt 18<sup>13</sup> we read: 'Who do men say that the Son of Man is?' The answer is given: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' In Mk 8<sup>27</sup> the question is: 'Who do men say that I am?' The answer is simply: 'Thou art the Christ.' St. Luke (91<sup>23</sup>) agrees, with but slight variations, with St. Mark. He has: 'Who do the multitudes say that I am?.'. The Christ of God.' We have here another case—the most notable of all such cases—in which the title has been substituted for the pronoun which our Lord employed. It is possible that in this case the additional clause was first appended to Peter's answer, and that the substitution in our Lord's question was occasioned by it—a substitution which represents the desired answer as already provided in the statement of the question. Holtsmann may be right in suggesting that doctrinal interests are answerable for such a result. He says (op. cit. vol. 1, p. 258) that 'the First Evangelist appears as the theologian, who sees in the "Son of Man" the obverse of the "Son of God," and so prepares the way for the doctrine of the two natures.' Whether the clauses in question are to be ascribed to St. Matthew himself, or whether they may be due to the theological tendency of a later hand, may be regarded as an open question.

For other instances than those already cited of

For other instances than those already cited of this variation—the title appearing in one Gospel, but not in the parallel passage in another, or in the other two—see Lk 12° as compared with Mt 10<sup>32</sup>; Mt 16° cf. Mk 9¹ and Lk 9²′; Mk 10° and Mt 20°, cf. Lk 22°′; Mk 8°¹ and Lk 9²′, cf. Mt 16°¹.

As to the occurrence of 'the Son of Man' in the earlier chapters of the Fourth Gospel, it need here only be pointed out that such occurrence is in entire accord with the representation of St. John, that from their earliest association with Him our Lord's followers knew that He was the Divine Christ. The declaration of Messiahship and the use of the title are concurrent in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptics. This agreement is to be emphasized here: the reconciliation of the view, which represents our Lord's Messiahship as declared from the outset of His ministry, with the threefold testimony that such declaration followed only when disciples had received prolonged training in the course of that ministry, does not come within the scope of our present purpose. The first occurrence of the self-designation in St. John's Gospel affords a striking parallel to our Lord's use of it in response to Peter's confession (Mk 8<sup>29, 21</sup>). Nathanael declares Jesus to be 'the Son of God . . . king of Israel,' and to that confession Jesus responds with the promise: 'Ye shall see the heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man' (Jn 1<sup>51</sup>). Similarly in 3<sup>15</sup>, it is when Jesus has declared to Nicodemus that He has Himself descended from heaven and can therefore tell of heavenly things, that He goes on to designate Himself 'the Son of Man,' and to foretell His suffering on behalf of man. Here it may be noted that in the Fourth Gospel, precisely as in the Synoptics, not a hint is given that the title was unfamiliar and one that called for explanation. Nicodemus was not indisposed to ask questions; but St. John leaves us to infer that as to this designation he found no difficulty. Three times in ch. 6 (vv. 27. 53. 62), in connexion with the discourse in which Jesus speaks of Himself as 'the bread which came down out of heaven,' the title occurs, accompanying and used to emphasize an open declaration of our Lord's claims as to His Person and Work.

The later occurrences of the title in the Fourth Gospel all, with the exception of 9<sup>35</sup> (if ἀνθρώπου be the right reading there), are found—as is the case with most of its later occurrences in the Synoptics—in passages relating to our Lord's Passion, or to the glory which would follow thereon. This fact suggests, at least in part, the answer to a further inquiry which must now be made.

4. Why did our Lord adopt this in preference to any other Messianic title?—Nowhere does He tell us in precise terms; but His usage leaves no room to doubt that its attraction lay in its freedom from the limitations which beset other Messianic

(a) First and foremost, it permitted the blending of the conception of the Suffering Servant with that of the Messianic King. That was the great enlargement which Jesus gave, in His use of it, to the title He adopted. True, there was nothing in Daniel's delineation of 'one like unto a son of man' to suggest such a blending, but there was also nothing to preclude it. Whether the coming of nothing to preclude it. Whether the coming of the heavenly Son of Man in glory, and for universal dominion, was to be preceded by a coming in humiliation and a reascension through suffering, the state of the state the writer of Daniel did not tell. But what the prophet failed to disclose, Jesus revealed. He was indeed the son of man, whom Daniel beheld, but passing through a phase of existence anterior to that of which the seer had a glimpse, and a phase which none were anticipating. Jesus was indeed the Messiah; but the expectations which gathered about that name made no allowance for that which was foremost in the purpose for which He came to earth. Hence, no sooner did His disciple exclaim 'Thou art the Christ,' than 'he began to teach them [the disciples] that the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and the chief priests and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again.' Put even so, as a fresh disclosure concerning the Son of Man, the teaching was not easy of reception, as Peter's remonstrance showed; but to have said at that juncture that the 'Son of David,' or 'the Christ,' must suffer and be killed, had been to make the teaching yet harder of reception.

As Dalman says (op. cit. p. 205): 'The name Messiah denoted the Lord of the Messianic age in His capacity as Ruler; in reality it was applicable only when His enthronement had taken place, not before it. Suffering and death for the actual possessor of the Messianic dignity are, in fact, unimaginable according to the testimony of the prophets. When Jesus attached to the Messianic confession of Peter the first intimation of His violent death, He did so in order to make it clear that the entrance upon His sovereignty was still far distant. . But the "one like unto a son of man" of Dn 71s has still to receive the sovereignty. It was possible that he should also be one who had undergone suffering and death.'

Hence, in reiterated statements to the disciples concerning the death toward which He moved, the invariable self-designation on the lips of our Lord is 'the Son of Man.' See Mk 9<sup>8, 12, 51</sup> 10<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>21, 41</sup>, and the parallels in St. Matthew and St. Luke. Only when the Crucifixion and the Resurrection were accomplished facts, in the light of which His disciples might discern how false and misleading had been their narrow conception of what Messiahship could be, does Jesus speak to them of Himself snip could be, does Jesus speak to them of Himseli in other terms: 'Behoved it not the Christ to suffer these things?' and again: 'Thus it is written that the Christ should suffer' (Lk 24<sup>26, 46</sup>).

(b) If 'the Son of Man' was a title capable of being associated with suffering and death, it was a title already associated with the glorious coming of One about half have evaluating rule over a grant of the state of the s of One who should have everlasting rule over a world in which the powers of evil should no more have sway. That was the form of expectation present to the mind of Jesus as He passed on His way to the baptism of suffering, and that was the form of Messianic hope which He sought to strengthen in His followers as He spoke to them, with growing frequency, of the coming of 'the Son of Man.' The utterances concerning the return of 'the Son of Man' in glory, and the predictions that 'the Son of Man' must suffer and die, are in strict correlation (see Bousset, Jesus, p. 92 ff.). It is this coming from heaven, this realization of the Kingdom of heaven upon earth, to which Jesus looks forward. Wholly unlike the anticipations entertained by men around Him concerning the Davidic Messiah, the vision of Daniel is that which Jesus again and again calls to mind. He will come 'in the glory of the Father with the holy angels' (Mk 828); 'They shall see the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory' (Mk 13<sup>26</sup>; see also 14<sup>20</sup>); 'When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all the angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all the nations: and he shall separate them one from another . . .' (Mt 25<sup>315</sup>.). This function of separation, of judgment, is not in the Danielic sketch of 'the son of man'; it is a feature added by our Lord. In Daniel the judgment is effected by the Most High. It is significant of much, that Jesus, while adopting and citing that prophecy, does not hesitate to modify it in this important particular, and to declare that it is He who will come to be our Judge (cf. Jn 5<sup>27</sup>).

(c) If 'the Son of Man,' telling of descent from heaven, spoke of a closer association with God than did any other current Messianic title, so did it speak also of closer association with man—with the race. All narrow particularism falls away. He who bears this title is no mere 'Son of David,' or 'King of Israel.' Especially when regard is had to the idiomatic use of in Aramaic, as of in Hebrew, such a title expresses in the strongest possible way that He who is called by it has the nature and the qualities of [mankind, and that He who calls Himself by it claims thereby relationship with man everywhere.

It is in such reasons as these that we may find the true clue to our Lord's adoption of this name not in its supposed unfamiliarity, nor in an ambiguity enabling the speaker to use it in one sense, while He could confidently anticipate that it would be understood in another by His hearers.

5. Why did our Lord's followers, with the exception of Stephen, not apply this title to Him?—The fact that a designation which meets us so frequently in the Gospels is, with the single exception of Ac 756, wholly absent from the rest of the NT, is remarkable and significant. But of what? Wellhausen and Lietzmann answer, of this that it was released to the second of the second o this: that it was unknown to St. Paul and the other writers of the Epistles and to the author of the Apocalypse that such a title was employed by Jesus, and that the presumption is that only after their day was it introduced into the Gospels. But how this could be done, and how such an important modification of the most cherished records of the Church could be carried out with such enduring success, there is nothing to show. Certainly it is not safe to conclude that St. Paul and other NT writers did not know that this was our Lord's selfdesignation because they make no direct reference to it. Schmiedel (l.c. p. 260 f.) points to He  $2^{6f.}$  as affording evidence that the name was not unknown to the writer of that Epistle. Similarly, he holds that St. Paul in 1 Co 15<sup>27</sup> makes his reference to Ps 8 because of the presence in that psalm of the terms which he associated with his Lord—'the Son of Man.' Schmiedel is on firmer ground when he goes on to rebut the contention, that had St. Paul known of the title he must have cited it in such a verse as 1 Co 1547. He urges that it should be borne in mind that St. Paul wrote for Greeks, who would not, like the Jews, understand by 'the son of man' simply 'man,' but would take 'son' quite literally. To this may be added that, apart from the suggestion of a purely human parentage, which Gentiles might receive from the title, its use would for them lay an undue, and therefore a misleading, stress on our Lord's humanity. To the Jew 'the Son of Man' suggested the Lord from heaven; not so to the Gentile Where the association of the name with beavenly origin and majesty could not be assumed, there the Apostles and early exponents of Christianity adopted other terms as they spoke or wrote of their risen and ascended Lord, and proclaimed Him as 'the Christ, the Son of God' (Jn 2021). To use the words of Dalman (op. cit. p. 266), 'the Church was quite justified in refusing, on its part, to give currency to the title; for in the meantime "the Son of Man" had been set upon the throne of God, and was, in fact, no longer merely a man, but a Ruler over heaven and earth, "the Lord," as St. Paul in the Epustles to the Thessalomans, and the Teaching of the Apostles in its apocalyptic statement, rightly designate Him who comes with the clouds of heaven.'

In short, the absence of the title 'the Son of Man' from other early Christian records than the Gospels, is significant of the widening range of the Church's appeal beyond the confines of Judaism; its retention in the Gospels is no less significant of the fidelity with which the words of Jesus were preserved by His followers.

BOP.—1. The meaning of the word.—'Sop' occurs in EV only in Jn 13<sup>20</sup> ble 27. <sup>20</sup> (AVm 'morsel'). It is akin in derivation to 'sup' and 'soup,' and denotes food soaked in liquid before being eaten. denotes food soaked in liquid before being eaten. The Gr. word in each case is ψωμων, dim. of ψωμών, 'a morsel.' ψωμών does not occur in LXX, but ψωμόν is found in Ru 2<sup>14</sup>, Job 31", and in EV is rendered 'morsel.' Its use in Ruth—'Dip thy narreal (ψωμών) in the vinegar'—is exactly analogous to that of ψωμών in John.

2. The values of the son given to Judge a Edera

2. The nature of the sop given to Judas. - Eders heim (LT ii, 506) and others, on the ground especi ally of the definite art. (τό ψωμίον. Edersheim says, "Mark the definite article—not "a sop"), hold that it was a specific sop, used at the Passover supper in the time of Christ, which consisted of a piece of the flesh of the Paschal lamb, a piece of unleavened broad, and some bitter herbs, all wrapped together and dipped in the hardseth -a sauce made of raising dates, and other fruits, mixed with vinegar—and then passed round to the company by the host, Jesus, as the host at the Last Supper, would hand this sop, first of all, to Judas, who is supposed to have occupied the place of chief honour at the table (see art. PASSOVER [I.], p. 3260, and UPPER ROOM). It is not enough to brush this view aside, as Meyer does, on the ground that, according to John, the Last Supper was not a Passover meal; for, even though it was not the regular Passover of the Jews, it may have been a Supper of a similar kind (see art. Passover [IL], p. 327b). On the other hand, Edersheim's argument from the definite art, is precarious, since its use in v. so, is doubtful see WH); and, in any case, the Evangelist, writing long afterwards and with a profound sense of the momentous character of the incident, probably wrote 'the sop,' meaning thereby 'the traine sop,' 'that fatal sop,' -which sealed the trainer's doon. It seems much more probable, then, that this sop was not the specific Paschal sop passed round to the company by the host, but a particular sop that Jesus offered to Judas on purely personal grounds. At an Oriental feast the host sometimes presented a guest with a special tit-bit from the food on the table, as a distinguishing mark of his favour. And it was not by any accident of Judas' position at the table, but because of a deep purpose in the heart of Jesus, that this sop was given.

3. He argusteance.—This offering of the sop to Judas, which is not mentioned by the Synoptists (though Mt. and Mk. make Jesus say that the betrayer should be the one who dipped his hand with Him in the dish [Mt 26<sup>22</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22</sup>]), comes before us with a double significance. (n) It was a sign given to the beloved disciple, in response to his question, 'Lord, who is it?' that Indaa was the one of the company who was about to betray his Master (vv. 28. 28). (b) But it was much more than this. There was nothing hypocritical on Christ's part in the action. He did not make a show of riendliness to Judas merely for the sake of giving John a private sign. What was commonly under-stood to be a token of hospitable goodwill was, without doubt, meant in this case to be the expression of a feeling deeper than any ordinary human affection, and at the same time to be a last appeal to the better nature of this erring disciple, with a note of warning underlying the appeal (cf. vv. <sup>13</sup> a). A whole world of blessed possibility lay for Judas in that proffered sop; Divine love was in it, and free forgiveness, and full restoration—if only he would repent of his meditated crime. And just because of the immensity of meaning that lay in Christ's grit was the awfulness of its result. Judas 'received the sop' (v."), and doubtless ate it. He understood what Jesus wished him to understand —the mingled love and warning and promise and appeal that lay in His act. But at this crisis of his fate he closed his ears to Christ's offers and his heart to Christ's grace. And immediately the light that still lingered in him was turned into darkness For 'after the sop, then [rere—at that very moment] Satan entered into him.' 'The violent effort he Satan entered into min.

made to close his heart to the heavenly power opened it to the powers of evil' (Godet). Jesus knew that all was over. 'That thou doest,' He knew that all was over. 'That thou doest,' He said, 'do quickly' (v."). And so Judas, 'having received the sop' [note the significant repetition of the ominous word], 'went out straightway: and it was nuclif.

SORROW, MAN OF SORROWS .- We shall find in the Gospels no theory of sorrow, or abstract discussion of the problem of pain and suffering. The problem is taken for granted, and a solution is given. The solution is experimental, and centres round the life of Christ. If we ask why sorrow comes, the answer is not speculative, but practical: we are simply pointed to His experience (He 12). Accordingly, the method of this article will be to deal first with Christ as the Man of Sorrows, and afterwards with the meaning of sorrow in human life generally, and particularly in the life of the Christian.

1. The 'Man of Sorrows.'—The phrase comes from Is 53' (ποκτο ε'π; LXX, δεθρωποι όν πληγβ ῶν; Vulg. rerum dolorum).

Objection has been taken (e.g. by Cheyne, G. A. Smith, Skinner, Workman) to the rendering 'sorrows,' 'pains' being preferred in this verse and the next as a nearer parallel to 'pi ('sickness' rather than 'grief'). But the Oxford Heb. Lex. gives many instances of both the vb. and noun as referring to mental pain, and classes this passage under that head. While allowing that the picture in Isaiah is primarily of physical suffering, we may without hesitation retain the familiar rendering of AV and RV.

The title is never applied to Christ in the NT. the title is never applied to Christ in the K1. It belongs, in fact, to popular rather than to technical phraseology, expressing in picturesque form what the theologian means by speaking of Christ as the 'Suffering Servant of Jehovah.' Either phrase implies equally that the prophecy of Is 53 was in a true sense fulfilled in Him. What-ever may have been the primary historical bearing of that passage, it is generally admitted that in the time of Christ there was no expectation of a suffer-ing Messiah. The indications of the Gospels and Acts agree completely with the evidence of pre-Christian Jewish literature. 'The idea of the Messiah's sufferings is not found in any Jewish document up to the close of the first century' (Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 123). 'Man of Sorrows' would have been the last title to have caught the popular imagination of that age. 'Son of David' expressed the contemporary hopes of what the Messiah was to be. That the one title has been entirely displaced by the other is significant. The one is national, more or less materialistic, pointing to an earthly kingdom. The other expresses the universal attraction of Christ, His spiritual empire over the hearts of men, and the means by which His influence has been won. See, further, art. MESSIAH.

2. The nature of the sorrows of Christ.— Though, as noted above, the phrase 'Man of Sorrows' may be retained as the translation of Is 533, there can be little doubt that the general picture of the passage in its literal sense is of one Job; many see in it the description of a leper, as in Ps 88. If the view is correct that it was never intended to apply to an individual, but was typical of the nation, or of part of it, it will none the less remain true that the figure the writer has chosen is that of bodily sickness. The sorrows of Christ were not of this nature, nor was His appearance unattractive, still less repulsive, as of one suffering from a loathsome disease. In the Gospels but little stress is laid on the physical sufferings even of the last days. He Himself expressly deprecates so doing (Lk 23<sup>26</sup>). He once refers to the privations of His life (Lk 9<sup>56</sup>) in order to check one who had not counted the cost of discipleship. A single word from the Cross (Jn 1928) has to do with His bodily Where the thought of His own sufferings comes to His mind, the impression we have is of spiritual sorrow (Mk 10<sup>32</sup> 14<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>50</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), and commentators of all schools have connected this sorrow with His contact and conflict with sin. He sighs at the presence of the deaf and dumb man (Mk 7<sup>34</sup>). When face to face with death, He is moved with sympathetic compassion (Lk 713); He groans in spirit, is troubled, and weeps (Jn 11<sup>23</sup>). The underlying thought in these passages seems to be His sense of what lies behind human suffering. So it is different degrees of sin at which His sorrow is invited by the sense of the is implied or expressed;—dulness, unbelief, or hardness of heart in the disciples (Mt 168, Mk 821 919 1012 1427. 37, Lk 2238, Jn 149);—the wilful blindness and opposition of His countrymen (Mk 38 68 812, Lk 1218). Crossilly significant out the leavest to Lk 13<sup>15</sup>). Specially significant are the laments over Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>, Lk 19<sup>41</sup>). He is grieved at ingratitude (Lk 17<sup>17</sup>), at lack of hospitality (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>), at the profanation of the Temple (Mt 2112), above all, at the treachery of Judas (Mt 2620, Jn 1321). He feels sorrowful compassion over the multitude without a shepherd (Mt 936, Mk 634). On the other hand, His joy is specially mentioned at the conquest or removal of sin (Mt 18<sup>13</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>5</sup>). A study of these passages will show the sense in which He was a Man of Sorrows. On the one hand, He was brought into a relation to sin from which His nature shrank, and which even seemed at its climax to lead to a separation from God (Mk 1524). On the other hand, in His conflict against sin He was spiritually alone. He knew more clearly than any the nature of sin and its results. He saw what man might be if he chose, and what in fact he was. He realized every hour the tragic irony of the situation, that He had come to His own and they would not receive Him. The horror of His rejec-tion by His countrymen lay not so much in the suffering it implied for Himself, as in their own loss of opportunity. Is 53 was profoundly true. did not perceive or desire the beauty of His holiness They despised and rejected His message; they hid their face from Him because they could not bear to look on the splendour of the goodness and love He came to reveal.

3. The necessity of sorrow in the life of Christ came from the spiritual character of His work. From the point of view of the disciples, and the popular conception of the Messiah, a certain amount of conflict and hardship could readily be allowed for. The Roman could not be expected to yield without a blow; and as it became clear that opposition from within His own nation was to be expected, temporary disappointments and mis-understandings would fall within the disciples' scheme of the future. They were ready for the hardships of an earthly struggle, i.e. to drink His cup as they understood it. They were not prepared for the Cross, because they had not a deep enough conception of His work. Not Roman or Sadducee, but sin, was the enemy; His end was the establishment of a spiritual and universal empire. The national mission of the Son of David had passed into the world-wide mission of the Servant of Jehovah, + and the means which might have sufficed for the one would no longer serve the other. His work moved on a higher plane, and the weapons of His warfare must be more mysterious and spiritual than any outward miracle. These weapons were the attractive and atoning power of service, and sorrow. Mk 10<sup>45</sup> shows this clearly. The Cross, the life of service, and all it implied of sorrow and suffering, were necessary because He had come to give His life a ransom for many (cf. Jn 1232).

The fuller discussion of the redemptive value of Christ's sufferings belongs to other articles (see art. ATONEMENT). It must suffice here to insist on what all theories admit, that only as Sufferer could He be Saviour. He had come to serve God could He be Saviour. He had come to serve God as man; therefore suffering was necessary to the perfection of His obedience (He 2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>). It is a fact of history that as the Sufferer He has conquered and drawn men unto Him. The title 'Man of Sorrows' expresses, more perhaps than any other, His attractive power; it has been the inspiration of Christian art and music. The thought underlying it is not primarily any logical theory of lying it is not primarily any logical theory of Atonement, but the all-embracing sympathy of the God-man. His 'Come unto me' (Mt 1128) is a comfortable word, because it is spoken by One 'who, in that he himself suffered being tempted,

* From this point of view the nearest parallel to Christ is Jeremiah, the 'man of sorrows' of the OT. There, too, we have the one standing in moral solitude over against the whole nation, in bitterness of soul because he knows that none will listen to his message. If, as is often thought, his experience had some share in moulding the conception of Is 53, that chapter forms a close link between him and Christ, pointing back to the one and forward to the other (cf. G. A. Smith, Isaiah, vol. ii. ch. 2, etc.).

is able to succour them that are tempted' (He 218

4. The Christian conception of sorrow.—Sorrow is, properly speaking, a psychological term, being a description of a state of mind. It should be distinguished from the suffering, mental or physi-cal, which may be its occasion. We may define it as the sense of discord, the consciousness that things are not as they should be, in ourselves, or in the world. It is an experience peculiar to man, and can be attributed to animals only by an effort of personification. In the fact of its being a privilege peculiar to man we may begin to see comething of its purpose.

'The inherent necessary in man of sorrow . . . testifies that his essential constitution and nature, as man, is something which all this world's life and the conditions of it by the very fact that they are what they are—annot match and cannot mately. The very constitution of his being said the necessary conditions of his life are out of harmon; together. They do not and cannot fit, the one is too small to mitight the other. Set man, being what man is, in this world, as the conditions of this world are, and the necessary result is, scoper or later, sorrow' (Moberly, Sorrow, Sin, and Beauty, p. 7).

To a creature made in the image of God, sorrow is the necessary condition of the struggle against sin in an imperfect world. Given the fact of sin, suffering ceases to be a problem. Only in a perfect state could it be desirable that sorrow and sighing should flee away.

Hence if sorrow is a privilege of man as a spiritual being, we shall expect to find that it is in a special the privilege of the Christian. The second sense the privilege of the Christian. The second Beattude (Mt 5') speaks absolutely of its blessedness. The underlying thought seems to be that dissatisfaction with things as they are will lead to the effort to right them. Discord within the soul, i.r. sin, is specially in view. Mourning is the evidence of the break-up of the self-complacency which is the chief obstacle to the Kingdom of God, Sorrow, indeed, is of no value unless it leads to the straying after higher things. There is no blessed ness attached to vain regret for the past (Mt 2511 778, Mk 10<sup>23</sup>, or to the norrow which finds its vent in weary sleep in tead of in prayer (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>). The bearing of pain, voluntary or otherwise, is in itself neutral; it is effective only when it is the means of rooting out from the self a cause of offence (Mt 5<sup>26</sup>, etc.). The sorrow which is fruitful is the travail which issues in the birth of a new life (Jn 12<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>21</sup>). The one object of the purging is that the branch may bring forth more fruit (Jn 152).

If sorrow is a necessary accompaniment of the attempt to right things in oneself, it will also accompany the attempt to right things in the world. It was Christ's experience, and it will be the experience of His followers (Jn 15<sup>20</sup> etc.) as they share His work. The traditional saying of Christ that 'he who is near me is near the fire.' (Orig. Hom. in Jer. xx. 3) is at least authentic in spirit. The disciples must bear the cross He bears (Mk 8th), drink His cup, and be baptized with His baptism (Mk 10<sup>26</sup>), carry H<sub>15</sub> yoke (Mt 11<sup>26</sup>). The aword must pierce the Virgin's heart because of her nearness to Him (Lk 2<sup>26</sup>); even the Innocents suffer neconsciously on account of their connexion with Him (Mt 2<sup>16</sup>). The via dolorom is the only road to union with Him. +

In Ju 16 the sorrow of the disciples is contrasted with the transient joy of the world. The world rejoices (1629) as having been freed from one who was a dangerous innovator as well as a condemner of its ways '(Westcott, ad lor.); i.e. it is satisfied to have no Christ, even to have removed Him, and is content with things as they are. The sorrow of the disciples is connected with the departure of Christ. The primary reference is to the immediate Christ. The primary reference is to the immediate crisis, but in all ages His disciples will have sorrow in all that hinders their full vision of Him, the complete establishment of His Kingdom, and His return in glory. Though He has overcome the world, they must have tribulation in it, till the victory won ideally is realized in fact (16<sup>28</sup>). Sorrow cannot be completely turned into joy till what is, is identical with what should be, till He returns again and we see Him as He is (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). As we said before we find no abstract discussion of the said before, we find no abstract discussion of the nature and meaning of sorrow. The solution of the problem is found in the experience of Christ, which is the experience of the Christian. Sorrow is bound up with every attempt to combat sin in the self and in the world. It is the reaction the self and in the world. It is the reaction against sin, and those who feel this most keenly must drink most deeply of the cup. The consola-tion lies in the fact that the disciple is sharing the lot of His master here, and will share His joy hereafter (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>21</sup>). 5. Sorrow and happiness.—It would be an inadequate treatment of the teaching of Christ to conceive of sorrow merely as the condition of future happiness. Christianity is a religion of present happiness. An exultant joy is the note of the songs which hailed Christ's birth. Joy is a present fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>20</sup>); the Kingdom of God is now joy and peace (Ro 14<sup>27</sup>). The promises of the New Heaven and the New Earth are not purely eschatological; they belong, ideally at least, to our life now. One of the characteristic paradoxes of Christianity is that its sorrow and happiness coexist. Again we turn first to the experience of Christ. He is the Man of Sorrows, yet we cannot think of Him for a moment as an unhappy man. He rather gives us the picture of serene and unclouded happiness. Beneath not merely the outward suffering, but the profound sorrow of heart, there is deeper still a continual joy, derived from the realized presence of His Father, and the consciousness that He is doing His work. Unless this is remembered, the idea of the Man of Sorrows is sentimentalized and exaggerated. And again the disciple shares the experience of His master. Neither Christ nor the true Christian can for a moment wish, like a Job or a Jeremiah, that he had never been born. The Beatitudes express His own humanly discovered secret of happiness; He has Himself known the blessedness of mourning, though never, of course, over His own sin, and He imparts the secret to His follower. And though the promises of Jn 16 can be completely realized the promises of Jn 16 can be completely realized only when the Christian departs to be with Christ (Ph 129), yet even now His joy is in him and is fulfilled (Jn 1512); even now, in prayer and in communion with Him, he knows the joy which no man can take from him (Jn 16<sup>22, 22, 23</sup>). 'Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing' (2 Co 6<sup>10</sup>), is the paradox of the gospel, and each side of the paradox is needed to counteract an unbalanced view of life. On the one hand, sorrow is no figurent of the imagination, to be thought away. It is a fact of life, and a neces-sary fact, necessary to the perfection of the sinless One, much more to our own; the condition of all progress and of all true work for God. This is the truth ignored by the 'sky-blue' optimism, which strives to live ever in the sunshine and blinds itself to sin.† On the other hand, sorrow is not the last word of life. The world is a sbeyes, a creation of word of life. The world is a sisquer, a creation of order and beauty. We find in Christ's teaching

* See the remarkable passage in Ro  $5^{23}$ , where Nature is represented as sharing in the imperfection and hopes of man. Cf. Randay Headlam, set to:
† It need hardly be added that this thought dominates the rest of the NT  $(c.g. \text{ Ph } 31^6, \text{Col } 1^{24}, 1 \text{ P } 41^5)$ .

nothing of the sentimental attitude, which looks on suffering with complacency, as though it were good in itself. To Him evil is evil, and suffering is suffering; He came as the Saviour to destroy them. Here Christianity is in strong contrast to Buddhism, and to all forms of morbid asceticism. Bacon's aphorism that 'prosperity is the blessing of the OT, adversity the blessing of the NT,' is true only when it is understood that beneath the adversity, and the sorrow of heart which it brings, there is even here and now the peace which passeth understanding, the joy which comes of union with Christ, of sympathy with man, and of work for God.

EOUL.—In every not of thinking, a distinction exists between the thinker and his thought, or, as it is otherwise expressed, between the self and the not-self, the ego and the non-ego, the thinking subject and the object of thought. This ego, self, or thinking subject, is denominated the soul ($\psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), or spirit ($\psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), \psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), or spirit ($\psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), \psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), \text{or spirit} ($\psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), \text{or spirit} (\psi_{1/2}\text{if}, \psi_{1/2}\text{if}), \text{or some some some important physical organ, but in the NT it is clearly distinguished from the body as an immaterial principle, the seat of conscious personality, and essentially immortal (Mt 10^{20} \text{etc.}; \text{sec} IMMORTALITY). There was much speculation in our Lord's time, and had been for some two centuries, on the mysterious questions of the soul's origin and destiny. Some, following Plate and Philo, believed in its eternal pre-existence (cf. Wisself NV); others (mainly orthodox Rabbis) in its creation at the creation of the world (cf. 2 Ra 4\psi_{1/2}\text{if}); others (perhaps the majority) in its concreation with the body, which is apparently the doctrine of the OT (Is 44^{2, 2s} 49^{2, s}, Job 31^{15}). A few supported the Platonic speculation of metempsychosis (so apparently Josephus; see BJ III. viii. 5). The disciples of Jesus were aware of these discussions, and on one occasion asked Him whether a certain man had been born blind as a penalty for sins committed by him in a previou

1. The use of ψυχή in the Gospela.—In the Pauline Epistles, as is well known, there is frequently a decided difference of meaning between ψυχή and πνεύμα. There ψυχή is used for the principle of life of the natural man, while πνεύμα is the principle of supernatural life which manifests itself in the regenerate Christian. Hence the derivative ψυχαό (literally 'soulish') comes to be used in a depreciatory, and even in a bad sense (1 Co 12<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>14</sup>, Ja 3<sup>15</sup> Jude <sup>19</sup>). But in the Gospels there is no such distinction of usage. As applied to the human soul, ψυχή and πνεύμα are synonyms throughout the range of their meaning. Thus in the sense of natural life, we have Mk 3<sup>1</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>20</sup> (ψυχή); and Mt 27<sup>20</sup>, cf. Lk 23<sup>20</sup>, Jn 19<sup>20</sup> (πνεύμα). (For the lower sense of πνεύμα, cf. also Mk 8<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>71, 26</sup>, Jn 11<sup>25</sup> 13<sup>21</sup>). ψυχή, as well as πνεύμα, is used quite normally for the soul in its highest religious activities (see, e.g., Lk 1<sup>40</sup>, where the identity of ψυχή and wreina is especially apparent; Mt 11<sup>20</sup> 22<sup>27</sup> ||; cf. 1 l' 2<sup>11.28</sup> 4<sup>18</sup>, 2 l' 2<sup>30</sup> etc.; and even in the Pauline Epp. see 2 Co 1<sup>28</sup>, Eph 6<sup>6</sup>, Ph 1<sup>27</sup>; cf. He 6<sup>30</sup> 13<sup>17</sup>). In one passage (Jn 10<sup>26</sup>) ψυχή seems even to stand for the rational or deliberating faculty (λόγοι, νεθή). There is, however, between ψυχή and πνεθμα, as used in the Gospela, one alight distinction. ψυχή emphasizes more strongly than πνεθμα the idea of individual personality. Hence ψυχαί (not πνεθματα) is used for 'individuals' or 'persons' (Ac 27<sup>27</sup>, 1 l' 3<sup>20</sup>); and it is usual to speak of the salvation or loss of the ψυχή rather than of the πνεθμα (Mt 6<sup>26</sup> 10<sup>26</sup>, Ja 1<sup>26</sup> Mk 8<sup>26</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 17<sup>26</sup> 21<sup>19</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>, He 10<sup>26</sup>, Ja 1<sup>27</sup> 5<sup>28</sup>, 1 l' 1<sup>28</sup>. Yet the salvation of the πνεθμα is alluded to (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>26</sup>). πνεθμα, however, is not by any means a strictly impersonal term (see Mt 5<sup>26</sup>, He 1<sup>26</sup>). It is used like ψυχή to denote a disembodied soul (Lk 24<sup>26,26</sup>, He 12<sup>26</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>26</sup>, Rev 6<sup>26</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>). In Mt 12<sup>26</sup> (a quotation from Is 42<sup>4</sup>) God is said to possess a ψυχή. In Jn 4<sup>26</sup> He is said to be apirit (πνεθμα).

said to possess a  $\psi_{2}\gamma_{1}$ . In Jn 4<sup>24</sup> He is said to be spirit ( $\pi \times \epsilon \psi_{1}\omega_{1}$ ). The following particular statements about the soul ( $\psi_{1}\gamma_{1}$ ) are made in the Gospels. As the principle of physical life it is sustained by food (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>); as the organ of spiritual life it 'magnifies the Lord' (Lk 1<sup>26</sup>). It is capable of physical and sensuous pleasure (12<sup>18</sup>), also of spiritual rest and refreshment (Mt 11<sup>26</sup>). It can suffer acute sorrow (Lk 2<sup>26</sup>) and anxiety (Jn 10<sup>26</sup>). It can grieve (Mt 26<sup>26</sup>) and love (22<sup>26</sup>). It can be lost and saved (10<sup>26</sup> etc.). At death it is yielded up (Jn 10<sup>11,19</sup> 12<sup>26</sup>), but survives as a personal self-conscious being (Mt 10<sup>26</sup> etc.). See, further, Spirit.

(Mt 10° etc.).* See, further, SPIRIT.

2. Christ's teaching about the soul.—According to Jesus, the soul, being a man's inmost self, the sest of his self-conscious personality, and inherently immortal (Mt 10°), is precious beyond all price. Nothing can be accepted in exchange for it, and the gain of the whole world will not compensate for its loss (16°). Jesus drives home this truth in the parable of the Rich Fool, who said to his soul, 'Soul, then hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry'; and whom God rebuked with the awful words, 'Thou fool, this night they (i.s. the ministers of my vengeance) require of thee thy soul' (Lk gain or loss of the soul, generally with a play upon the double meaning of $\psi_{\text{2}\psi}$, ('hife' or 'soul'). Most of these passages take the form of exhortations to martyrdom, as, for instance, Mt 10° 'He that findeth his soul (i.s. he that saves his life by denying me in time of persecution), shall lose it (by eternal punishment in Gehenna); and he that loseth his soul for my sake (i.e. he who confesses me in time of persecution, and suffers a martyr's death), shall find it (in heaven)'; (see also 16° Lk 17°, Jn 12°). All these passages refer primarily to martyrdom, but in their secondary applications teach that even lesser sufferings and trials endured patiently for Christ's sake have as their reward the salvation of the soul (Mt 10°). The same idea is expressed in Lk 14°, where the strange phrase 'to hate the acul' is a rhetorical expression for willingness to suffer martyrdom or any lesser inconvenience for Jesus' sake (cf. also Jn 12°). The gain or salvation of the soul means certainly its eternal happiness in heaven, and the loss or destruction of the soul, as certainly, not its annihilation, but its eternal punishment in Gehenna. The endlessness of the soul's final retribution is not simply an inference from the soul's immortality.

ch. vi.

† The Creationist view of the soul's origin was held by all Jews in our Lord's time. The Traducianist hypothesis first appears in Tertullian (A.A. 200).

&quot;It follows from this, that in the view of Jesus and the Twelve, the Juze and recom of man are not distinct principles or entities, as, according to some, St. Paul affirms in 1 Th 527, of He 412. The language of the Gospels makes decisively for the wasty of the soul, and for a dichotomy of man (body and soul), not for a trichotomy (body, soul, and spirit).

but is exegetically established from Mt 25th etc. According to the conceptions represented in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, retribution does not wait till the Last Day, but begins as soon as the soul leaves the body. At death the disembodied soul passes to a 'middle state' (Hades), where, if righteous, it experiences rest and refreshment in 'Abraham's bosom,' or 'Paradise'; or, if unrighteous, expiatory punishment (symbolized as a tormenting flame) in a limbus or 'prison,' which is separated by an impassable barrier from the abodes of the right to the state of th of the righteous. The disembodied souls are represented as conscious and intelligent, able to converse with one another, and interested in the welfare of their friends upon earth (Lk 1619 2348, 1 P 318, Rev 6°).

The most important question about the intermediate state is whether spiritual change is possible in it. The point has been keenly debated, but the affirmative opinion seems to have the better exegetical support. For (1) the NT represents not death, but the Second Advent, as the time when the soul will render its final account to God. Presumably, therefore, the middle state is included in the period of probation. (2) Christ appears to the present writer to teach that some sins may be forgiven after death (Mt 12<sup>32</sup>); and at least to hint that even grievous sinners may be released from torments, after adequately expiating their crimes (5<sup>30</sup>). (3) The torments of Dives seem to have been remedial in effect, causing him for the first time to interest himself in the spiritual welfare of others (Lk 16<sup>37</sup>). (4) The descent of Christ into Hades, and His preaching to the disobedient spirits there (1 P 3<sup>15</sup>), plainly presuppose the possibility of repentance after death.

At the Last Day, according to Jesus, there will be a bodily resurrection of all men, followed by a final judgment, and a final settlement of the destiny of each soul (Mt 25<sup>21-65</sup>). The resurrection of the wicked is clearly taught in Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Jn 5<sup>29</sup>. See, further, RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY, ABRAHAM (§ "Abraham's bosom"), PARADISE, HELL [DESCENT INTO].

Jesus claimed to stand in the same relation to human souls as God Himself; and as the Lord of souls issued the universal invitation, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls' (Mt 11 25 29). He also declared that His special object in coming into the world was to save souls (Lk 956) by laying down His own soul as a ransom (Jn 10<sup>11. 15</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>).

3. The soul of Jesus.—If Jesus was perfect man, it follows that He must have possessed not only a human body, but also a human soul and a human numan body, but also a numan soul and a numan spirit; and this is, in fact, the doctrine of the Gospels and of the NT generally. Thus He came to give His soul  $(\psi \nu \chi \dot{\eta} \nu)$  a ransom for many (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>|). After the interview with the Greeks (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), His soul  $(\psi \nu \chi \dot{\eta})$  was troubled, and He doubted what to say. In Gethsemane His soul was exceeding sorrowful  $(\pi \epsilon \rho l \lambda \nu \pi \dot{\sigma} \dot{\sigma} \epsilon \dot{\sigma} \tau \iota \nu \dot{\eta} \psi \nu \chi \dot{\eta} \mu \nu \nu$ , Mt 26<sup>28</sup>||). There are similar references to His Mt 20<sup>50</sup>]). There are similar references to His human spirit. He groaned (or was angry) in spirit (ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 11<sup>28</sup>); and was troubled in spirit (ἐταράχθη τῷ πνεύματι, 13<sup>21</sup>). On the cross He commended His spirit to God (παρατίθεμαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), and yielded up His spirit (ἀφήκε τὸ πνεῦμα, Mt 27<sup>50</sup>; παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, Jn 19<sup>20</sup>). After death, His Divine Personality, still in hypography (i.e. personal) union with His still in hypostatic (i.e. personal) union with His disembodied human spirit, descended to Hades, and there preached to the disobedient spirits in prison (1 P 3<sup>18</sup>, cf. Eph 4<sup>9</sup>); visiting also, we infer from Lk 23<sup>28</sup>, that compartment of Hades which is reserved for the spirits of the just. It is obvious from these and other passages, that the view of Apollinaris that Christ did not possess a human soul,\* but that the Divine Logos took its place, is not Scriptural. The soul and spirit of Jesus were subject to human weakness and infirmity, and were therefore human, not Divine.

*Cf. the striking words of Clement of Alexandria: 'The Apostles, following the Lord, preached the gospel to those in Hades. . . [God's] punishments [in Hades] are saving and disciplinary, leading to conversion, and choosing rather the repentance than the death of a sinner. . . Did not the same dispensation obtain in Hades, so that even there, all the souls, on hearing the preaching, might either exhibit repentance, or confess that their punishment was just because they believed not?' (Strom. vi. 6). See also the Shepherd of Hermas, Simil. ix. 16: 'These Apostles and teachers, having fallen asleep, preached also to those who had fallen asleep before them, and themselves gave the seal of their preaching.'

But the rejection of Apollinarism, and the adoption of the view that Christ possessed a perfect human soul, involves a great psychological diffi-culty. A perfect human soul is personal, and therefore, if Christ was perfect God and perfect man, it seems to follow that He must have been two persons, as Nestorius thought, or was supposed to think. This difficulty has never yet received a full solution. The solution of the ancient Church was that the human nature of the incarnate Christ was impersonal. The human  $\psi v \gamma \eta$  of Christ, which, under normal conditions, would have developed independent personality, was prevented, owing to its hypostatic union with the Logos, from doing so. It attained personality, not in itself, but in the Divine Logos with which it was united; and hence, though Christ possessed a true human ψυχή, his personality was single, being seated entirely in the Divine Nature. The Patristic view is open to criticism on several grounds, but it still holds the field as the best attempt to reconcile the two apparently conflicting principles of Scripture, that Christ is perfect God and perfect man, and yet only one Person.

4. The human will of Jesus.—Jesus, as possessing a human soul, possessed also a human will, for volition is one of the most characteristic activities of the soul. The Gospels regard Jesus as endowed with a human will, which, though in the end always conforming itself to the Divine will, yet did so sometimes at the cost of an inward struggle. Thus in the Agony in the Garden, Jesus prays (Lk 22<sup>12</sup>), 'Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless not my will, but thine be done' (πλην μη το θέλημα μου, άλλα το σον γινέσθω). The distinction of wills is evident also in Jn 5<sup>10</sup>. (cf. 628) 'I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.' It is thus the teaching of Scripture that there are two wills in Christ, a Divine and a human, and that these two wills are united in one Person. The reconciliation of the two different points of view (duality of will, and unity of Person) is not easy. According to modern ideas, the faculty of willing is so essentially a function of personality, that it seems necessary to postulate two egos where there are two wills. The ancients, however, did not connect willing with personality so closely as we do; and, more-over, 'will' is too strong a term to translate their General Council (A.D. 680) to be the doctrine of the Church.‡

* Apollinaris admitted that Jesus possessed the lower or animal soul (ψυχὴ ἄλεγες), but denied to Him the distinctively human or rational soul (ψυχὴ λεγική).

SOUTH (voros). -1. The locality indicated.-The nouthern direction was called by the Hebrews Timus (Jer 49°), that is, the country on the right aide to one facing eastwards in Palestine. In the same way their kinsmen and successors, the Moslem Arabs, called the southern part of their empire Yemen, the 'right hand' country, and designated Syria and Palestine to the North as al-Shām, the left region. The queen of Sheba was referred to at the queen of the South (Mt 122). In a more limited and special sense the Hebrews gave the name 'South Country' to the wilderness of Judga and the region lying beyond it (Jos 12°, Ac 8°).

2. Character of south wind. Passing over an area with little or no vegetation, it was both hot (Lk 1200) and lacking in vitalizing power. rarefaction produced by the sun's rays on the bare desert gave rise to whirlwinds, which gathered up the dust in tall swaying columns that moved like evil genu over the land until they suddenly broke and dispersed (Job 37, Zec 93). It was essentially a transition current, being the dry east wind shifting round towards the humid west. It thus partook of the nature of both, and resembled the close steamy air of a pain house. The allu-sion in Job 37.7 is either to the lethargy induced by its enervating influence, or to the cool refreshment of the showers that usually follow it.

G. M. MACKIE. SOWING. -For 'sowing' as a metaphorical ex pression of the activity and influence of Christ and His Apostles, see under St FD. The Gospels further contain, however, three semi proverbial uses of the term which ment notice

1. One is in connexion with the counsel against worldly anxiety (Mt 6° -1.5, 12° birds neither sow nor reap) where sowing denotes one of the ordinary operations and occupations of men in order to secure a livelihood. Jesus is here quoting a familiar proverb of the ancient world, which was current in several forms (e.g. 'aves sine patrimonio vivunt et in diem pascuntur').

2. In Mt 25<sup>24, 26</sup> = Lk 19<sup>21, 22</sup>, a grasping, unserupulous character is defined as one that reaps where it has not sown, i.e. enriches itself at the expense of other people. Several ancient parallels, both from Jewish (cf. Taylor's Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, 1897, p. 143) and from pagan (c.g. Ælian, Var. Hist. iii. 46 and iv. 1; and Plato, Leges, xi 913 C) sources, are quoted for the second clause of the verse, which is probably to be taken as an expansion of the first.

SPEAR. - This word occurs in NT only in Ju 1984 one of the soldiers pierced Jesus' side with a spear (λόγχη). A comparison, however, of Mt 27.0 [the sponge] on a reed (περιθειε εαλάμφ), makes it probable that in Jn 19<sup>20</sup> for browing memberses, put it upon hyssop, brown a should be read. works is the Roman pilam (Polybius, 1-40, 12, etc.). The head of this spear is said to have been buried within the principal church of Antioch, where, under direction of Peter of Amiens, it was discovered by the besieged Crusaders, and proved their salvation from the onslaught of the prince of Mosul in 1098. SPICES (Lat. species). -The word denotes primarily the kind of a thing, a sample or specimen of anything. Then it means a certain touch or taste of something. More definitely, it denote-any aromatic or pungent substance. In general, any aromatic or pungent substance. spices are aromatic condiments used for seasonin, food, or fragrant cintments used as perfumes. In the NT the term is used in both of these senses; and, in a few cases, it has a somewhat wider meaning.

In the Gospels there are several words used to describe various kinds of spices. It is scarrely possible to classify them. See artt. MYERH, PRANKINGENSF, NARD, SPIKENARD, MINT, ANISE, CUMMIN. RUE Spice- (for applicate Lat. aromata) are mentioned Mk 16°, Lk 23° 24°, Ju 19°. We have here probably a general term to denote the mixed spices used in embalming the bodies of the dead.

Job 191° 31′, Sir selv there is abundant evidence of a regular system of e-pionage directed against Jesus from the time when He first actracted the notice of the ruling classes. Emissariewere sent from Jerusalem for the purpose (Mk 7 and Mt 15 RV), and in the latter portion of His public ministry He could hardly speak in any synagogue or other public place without secing some of these spies in H.s and once. Their action is variously described of They watched him (Taparapew, Taparapewoda, 'to watch insidiously is a furtive manner —'ex obliquo et occulto,' Bengell: cf. The putting of the question about the tribute money, which or the question about the tribute money, which immediately follows, was a cunning plot, in which the Pharisees and the Herodians, two mutually hostile parties, joined (cf. for a similar union in Galilee, Mk 36). The Pharisees sent their disciples (Mt 2216), young men apparently, fresh, earnest, zealous, and anxious to do right, hoping thus to consider a supplied of their desires. avoid exciting suspicion of their designs. St. Mark (12<sup>13</sup>) describes their object as 'that they might catch him in talk' (Γνα αὐτὸν ἀγρεύσωσι λόγψ); St. Matthew (22<sup>15</sup>) says they took counsel 'how they might ensnare him in his talk' (παγιδεύσωσιν ἐν λόγψ), the verb used being from παγίς, 'a trap or snare,' into which if He fell He would be held fast snare,' into which if He fell He would be held fast with a view to further proceedings. Compare also Mt 19<sup>8</sup>, Jn 11<sup>46</sup>, and Lk 19<sup>20</sup> where some Pharisees mingled with the rejoicing multitude, no doubt for a similar purpose. The murmuring in favour of Jesus mentioned in Jn 7<sup>22</sup> was possibly reported to the Pharisees by spies. Christ was always conscious of the presence of such men, and on these occasions seemed to court publicity for His sections: of the direction to the man with the actions; cf. the direction to the man with the withered hand, 'Stand forth' (Mk 3°). The futility of the system of espionage as directed against Him was shown at the trial, where all their efforts resulted in inability to bring forward anything as a charge except His words about the Temple.

The use of spies for a different purpose, viz. to facilitate His arrest, is implied in Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, where His enemies sought how they might take Him with subtilty (ἐν δόλψ), and in Jn 11<sup>57</sup> by the command that if any man knew where He was he should give information (μηνύση), that they might take Him. Such a measure was necessary because of His popularity with the multitude. In this sense Judas was the great spy, being in close touch with Jesus, and familiar with all His movements,—a fact which explains the roundabout directions given to the two Apostles as to where they should prepare the Passover meal. It was essential that Judas should not know the place beforehand, in order that the solemn proceedings and Christ's last discourse might not be interrupted by the coming of the band from the priests to effect His arrest.

SPIKENARD (='spiked nard').—The AV and RV rendering of μάρδος πιστική in Mk 14³, Jn 12⁵, or rather of the Vulg. nardi spicati (in Jn. nardi pistici). The word 'spikanard' (sic) appears first in Wyclif's version, the Anglo-Saxon having merely 'deorwyrŏes' (='precious'). Tindale has 'pure.' These various translations indicate the doubt as to the meaning of the Greek which was doubt as to the meaning of the Greek, which was felt from very early times, and is reflected in the Versions generally. The oldest Syriac version and some Old Latin texts simply transliterate, while the Peshitta renders by rishaya (= 'choicest'). Of the various explanations of the word πιστική, the most generally accepted are: (1) 'Genuine,' as though it were connected with mloris (Meyer, Weiss, etc.). The word πιστικός does actually occur in Artemidorus (Oneir. 2. 32) in the sense of 'faithful' (γυνή πιστική και οίκουρόs); and we learn from Pliny (HN xii. 26) that adulterations of nard were frequent.* (2) 'Liquid,' as though it was connected with πίνω. Ovid (Ars. Am. iii. 443) uses the epithet liquida with nardus; and Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. II. viii. 64) distinguishes between μύρα υγρά and μύρα ξηρά. (3) 'Drinkable.' Atheneus tells us that some unguents were drunk (689 C). But the Greek word for drinkable is morbs, not mioτικός.† Some have suspected a 'primitive error' in the text here, and have proposed various emendations. It has been suggested that the true reading is 'Irôuris. All our authorities agree in stating that the genuine nard came from India, in stating that the genuine nara came from mains, while inferior sorts came from other countries. Others would read σπικάτης (= Vulg. spicati), a word found in Galen, vi. 178 C, 182 C, E. Naber (Mnemosyne, 1902, pp. 1-15) conjectures an original form, σπειστικής (= 'liquid'), which, being a ἀπαξ λεγόμενον, might have been corrupted into πιστικής. Prof. E. N. Bennett (Classical Review, 1890, p. 319) suggests that the true form may be πιστάκης, and suggests that the true form may be wiotakns, and points out that the resin of the Pistacia terebinthus was anciently mixed with the oil of nard, and that it was a very valuable scent (Dioscorides, i. 91). All these emendations, however, ingenious and interesting as they are, are rendered improbable by the fact that neither in St. Mark nor in St. John is there any variation in the MSS

It is difficult to say with anything like certainty what the meaning of the word was. It may be a local name, as RVm suggests.* Possibly it is the Greek equivalent of Pistia, one of the Skr. names for Nardostachys jatamansi (Dymock, Pharmaco-graphia Indica, ii. p. 233). But most likely it is a technical term denoting some specially valuable kind of nard. † Modern experience goes to show how easily the exact meaning of similar technical or 'fancy' names can be lost. Such has probably been the case with the word we are discussing. See also artt. NARD, OINTMENT.

LITERATURE.—See the authorities cited at end of art. NARD. The question is discussed by C. F. A. Fritzsche (Com. on St. Mark, Leipzig, 1830) at great length, and very fully by Morison (Com. on Mk., in loc.).

SPINNING.—From very early times in Palestine, spinning of wool and flax by means of hand-spindles was one of the common occupations, especially of women. Jesus referred to spinning  $(\nu \eta \theta \epsilon \nu)$  in women. Jesus referred to spinning  $(\nu\eta\theta\epsilon\iota\nu)$  in teaching God's providential care, even of the lilies of the field, which are richly clothed though they neither toil nor spin (Mt 628, Lk 1227).

E. B. POLLARD. SPIRIT (πνεθμα).—This word occupies a very important place in the writings of the Evangelists, covers a wide area of thought, and is not always clearly defined as to the particular use it is put to in a given context. The prominent place thus assigned to the word may be considered as indi-cative of the position which the principal idea embodied by it fills in the general scheme of constructive Christian psychology. In this respect we have a good example of the almost instinctively creative power of Jewish, and especially of Christian-Jewish, religious thought. In classical writings πνεθμα is found largely employed in a physiological sense (cf. τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, 2 Th 2°; and for a similar use see Jn 3°, He 1°), but in them it never appears as a psychological term, as it does so often in Biblical writings both of the OT and the NT (see Cremer's Bibl.-Theol. Lex. s.v.).

The determining factor in the employment of this word by NT writers is the profound belief, inherited from the prophets and teachers of the OT, that there existed from the very beginning a unique fellowship between God and man (cf. πνοὴν ζωῆς, Gn 27 [LXX]). In spite of much and repeated unfaithfulness on man's part (cf. the difficult, though, for our present purpose, the sufficiently significant passage, 'My spirit shall not remain [καταμείνη] for ever in man,' Gn 6<sup>3</sup>), this fellowship continued to be realized more and more intensely as one generation succeeded another, and warriors and poets, prophets and priests, all found their inspiration in the firm belief that the Spirit of God was the living motive power animating their words and deeds.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Οποτιαϊό (from Opis, near Babylon), Ψεττακικῖό (from Psittake on the Tigris), and Πίστης (from the (?) Persian town Pisteira) have been suggested as possible readings. But none of these is an Indian town.
† This idea is found as early as Theophylact (c. 1077 a.d.), who says that the word may denote είδος νάρδου άντω λεγομινον.

There can be no doubt that the Incarnation formed the culminating point, as well as the final guarantee of the truth, of this historic realization. Henceforth there was established in the human consciousness a relationship between God and man which can be conveyed only in terms expressive of the closest mutual intimacy and communion. Not only can it be asserted that God's Spirit 'dwells in' man, but the counterpart of that truth consists in the resultant abiding of man in the Spirit' (εν πνεύματι, Ro 89). The consequence of the Divine Spirit's activity in this sphere is the co-operative activity of man's spirit attesting the reality of the relationship and working towards 'the righteonsness of God' (Ro 10<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>; cf. Ro 8<sup>10-18</sup>). The Pauline identification of 'the Spirit of Christ' and 'the Spirit of God' is for us ultimately justified in the twofold story of the birth of Jesus, narrated, as we must think, from two distinct points of view.

The Spirit of God was the operative agency by which the Incarnation was accomplished (Mt 1<sup>18.20</sup>; cf. the interchangeable terms πνεῦμα ἀγιον and δύναμις Ύψίστου, Lk 125). The revelation of the Sonship of Jesus followed immediately upon His anointing (Expuser, Ac 1026) with the Holy Spirit, and the twofold connexion established by the Synoptists between this revelation and His Temptation seems to establish beyond doubt that, in their opinion, the consciousness of Jesus became then for the first time fully alive to the wondrous position which He occupied, and to the character of the work He was destined to undertake (cf. the burden of the heavenly message ο vios μου ο άγαπητός, and the implied doubt repeated in the Temptation el viòs et roû êcoû, as well as the part played by the Spirit in each of these incidents, Mt 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>11</sup>. Lk 3<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>, also Jn 1<sup>22</sup>; see Plummer, St. Luke, in ICC, ad loc.).

The realization of the abiding presence of the Spirit continued to be for Jesus the dominating feature in His ministry of power (see Mt 122); cf. the corresponding expression εν δακτύλφ θεοῦ, Lk 1120), and gives terrible force and point to His solemn warning against that continued deliberate opposition to His claims which springs from love of darkness and obedience to the spirit of evil. Here, too, lay the secret of that absolute conviction of the truth of His message to the world, resulting as it did in the astonished recognition of its inherent authority by those who heard it (cf. Jn 6<sup>63</sup> 7<sup>29</sup>. 46, Mt 7<sup>281</sup>. 13<sup>54</sup> 22<sup>33</sup>, Mk 1<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, I.k 4<sup>23</sup>). Nor would Jesus confine this conviction to Himself. The descriptive title 'the Spirit of truth,' three times reiterated in the Johannine discourses, emphasized that side of His teaching which laid particular stress on the identity of the guiding principle of His life and work with that moulding the stress of the side of the stress of the str the activity of His disciples. At the same time it guaranteed the continuity of the context of His message and theirs to the world (Jn 14<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>, cf. the actual bequest in which His promises were, partly at least, fulfilled, Jn 20<sup>22</sup>; see also 7<sup>39</sup>). That they might entertain no doubt as to the authoritative position they were to occupy in carry-ing out the work begun by Him, Jesus spoke of His own permanent return to them as practically identical with the continual abiding of the Holy Spirit in and with them (cf. the phrase έρχομαι πρός υμαs, Jn 1418). 'Christ is in fact from the moment of His Resurrection ever coming to the world and to the Church, and to men as the Risen Lord' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on 143). In fact the work of 'the Spirit of truth' is mainly the glorification of Jesus by gradually making Him known to the world as to His Person and work (ἐκεῖνος ἐμὲ δοξάσει, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήμψεται καὶ ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῶς πάντα ὅσα ἔχει ὁ πατήρ ἐμά ἐστιν, κ.τ.λ., Jn 16<sup>141</sup>.; cf. ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ, Jn 15<sup>28</sup>).

The profound oneness of Jesus and His followers

The profound oneness of Jesus and His followers is nowhere more insistently dwelt on than in these passages, and that not alone in the character of the aims which He and they have in view, but also in the motive power helping and the underlying principle guiding them, which are identified by Him as the forces at work in His own life and Person. By an argument a fortiori He gives them an assurance that He will bestow the Holy Spirit on those who recognize their need of His guidance (Lk 112). To such the gift will always be proportionate to their immediate needs (1212). We must not forget that the peculiar Lukan phrase weequaros dγίου ἐπλήσθη (115.41.67) is used in connexion with the spiritual experiences of three people whose work lay in the preparatory stage of the coming Kingdom of the Incarnation.

Notwithstanding the transcendent relationship in which Jesus stood to the Holy Spirit, we are not left without witness that even in this sphere of His life He was like us in all things (see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on Jn 11<sup>23</sup>). It is this word (τὸ πνεῦμα) that is used to describe the death on the cross by three of the Evangelists (cf. Mt 27<sup>20</sup>, Lk 23<sup>26</sup>, Jn 19<sup>20</sup>), although in other places we find ψυχή employed in a sense very similar (see Jn 10<sup>15, 17</sup>, cf. 15<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>). It is possible, however, to see in the use of the former word a wider range of thought, as if it was intended to include the latter in its scope. It is as if Jesus desired to commend to His Father's keeping not only the spirit, the principle of His highest and Divinest life, but also the soul, the seat of His personal earthly life (cf. Hastings' DB, vol. iv. 612<sup>2</sup>).

That ψυχή is, nevertheless, sometimes found to denote more than this is evident from references by Jesus Himself to its indestructibility and its incomparable value as the goal of all human progress, where we should have expected either τιιῦμες απόψες and ψυχή to convey His full meaning (cf. Mt 10<sup>23.39</sup>, Lk 17<sup>23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>23</sup>, Jn 12<sup>23</sup>). The distinction and confusion, however, in these two words are in accordance with OT usage, where riuh (NT πιῦμε) denotes the Divinely imparted principle of life, and nephesh (NT ψυχή) the result of the impartation (see 1 Co 16<sup>45</sup>; cf. Gn 27, where nephesh hayydh occurs, an expression which is also used of the lower life of the animal creation, Gn 120). The indiscriminate use of these two words to denote the same idea is found, e.g., in Is 269 (LXX), a parallel to which we have in the Song of the Virgin Mary (Lk 14<sup>6f.</sup>). See Soul.

In other places where this word is used in connexion with the Personality of Jesus, we find it employed somewhat vaguely and in loose contrast with the outward or physical senses. He is said to have perceived the gist of the murmured reasonings of His critics 'in his spirit' (ἐπιγνοῦς τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ, κ.τ.λ., Mk 28; cf. Gould, 'St. Mark' in ICC, and loc.). There is here an evident contrast implied between that intuitive knowledge gained by inference and deduction, and that acquired by direct hearing with the ears. Again, He is spoken of as sighing inwardly, as distinct from audibly (ἀναστεπέξας τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ, Mk 8½), and being indignant 'within himself' or 'in his spirit,' without expressing His feelings in words (cf. ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 1188, and ἐν ἐαιτῷ, 1188). An interesting example of a subtle psychological distinction between πνεῦμα and ψιχή is found in the personal experiences of Jesus with two distinct sources of trouble and sorrow. As the cross drew near, His 'soul' (ἡ ψυχή μου τετάρακται, Jn 1227) revolted from the horrors of the vision; while we, as we read the narrative of self-revelation, perceive the origin and cause of His sympathy with 'the feeling of our infirmities' (He 415). On the other hand, and in close connexion with His approaching death, there was the dark treachery of Judas; and when we remember the profound joy and holy satisfaction with which Jesus reviewed the success of His work in keeping near Him those committed to His charge (see Jn 17<sup>12</sup>), we can understand the grief caused by the loss of 'the son of perdition.' With reference to this fact, St. John notices that Jesus 'was troubled in spirit' (Ἰησοῦς ἐταράχθη τῷ πρεύματι, 13<sup>21</sup>), as though he would wish us to infer that He was stirred to the very depths of His being by the sight of a soul hurrying to its doom.

Instances are not wanting in the Gospels of contrasts, simple and definite, in which this word plays a part, though we have no example of the antitheses so familiar to students of the Pauline Christology. Perhaps the nearest to the latter is the reference by Jesus to the contrast between the strength and perseverance of the spirit and the weakness of the flesh ( $r\delta$   $\pi r \epsilon \bar{v}_{\mu\alpha}$   $\pi \rho \delta \theta v_{\mu\alpha} r$ ...  $\hat{\eta}$   $\sigma \delta \rho \hat{\epsilon}$   $\delta \sigma \theta \epsilon r \hat{\eta} s$ , Mk 14<sup>29</sup> = Mt 26<sup>41</sup>). When, in His conversation with Nicodemus, Jesus refers to fleshly ( $\epsilon \kappa$ της σαρκός) birth and spiritual (έκ τοῦ πρεύματος) birth, He is not contrasting the limitations of the one with the inherent independence, as to time, space, etc., with their consequent imperfections, of the other. He has in His mind simply the two spheres of being to which man, qua man, stands related. By his  $\sigma d \rho \xi$  he is in fellowship, spiritual, mental, and physical, with the whole visible creation. By his \*τεθμα he touches and enters the sphere of spiritual life in the entirety of his complete nature. Both orders of existence have their characteristic principles, and it is man's unique privilege to unite the two in his complete life and experience. The perfect synthesis is accomplished only in the Incarnation, and it is only by keeping steadily in view the two great constituent elements steadily in view the two great constituent elements in Jesus' Person that we shall succeed in truly interpreting His language in His discourses at Capernaum, which were so vitally misunderstood. Neither the spirit alone nor the flesh alone can apprehend and appropriate the Christ, the Son of Man. 'The flesh' is of no avail (ἡ σὰρξ οὐκ ἀφελεῖ οὐδέν, Jn 6<sup>53</sup>), 'the spirit' alone has the power of conveying life (τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστω τὸ ζωοποιοῦν). At the same time, in order to a genuine participation, the life-giving message must be clothed in lan-guage which may be heard and, in part at least, understood (τὰ ῥήματα . . . τνεθμά ἐστιν καὶ ζωή). The historic fact of the Incarnation was necessary to meet the needs of man both on his spiritual and fleshly side, and so we understand the force of the words of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (οὐ γὰρ δή που ἀγγέλων ἐπιλαμβάνεται, He 2<sup>16</sup>). And while it would be going beyond the strict limits of certainty to say that Jesus on this occasion is making specific reference to the rite which He afterwards instituted in words of similar import, it will scarcely be disputed that in His Last Supper the will scarcely be disputed that in his Last Supper He embodied the principles referred to above. In it, too, 'the flesh profiteth nothing,' it is the spirit that giveth life; but the invisible, intangible spirit is clothed with a visible, tangible body, while man, working through and by the latter, reaches upwards and partakes of the former (cf. Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

When Jesus, in His conversation with the woman of Savaria identifies Spirit with the Being of God.

of Samaria, identifies Spirit with the Being of God (πνεῦμα ὁ θεός, Jn 424), He at once proceeds to foreshadow the abiding result, as well as the condition of man's approach to Him. The arena, so to speak, upon which the activity of the Divine Spirit displays His manifold and world-wide character, is the human spirit. If we are to offer to God a spiritual (er πνεύματι) worship, and apprehend clearly the methods by which He quickens human life, the first and last requisite is that we shall be in the Spirit (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>; cf. Ro 8<sup>18L</sup>, Eph 2<sup>18</sup> etc.). It is not enough, though it is perfectly true, to say that 'the spirit in man responds to the Spirit of God' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, on 423). The spirit in man becomes the spirit of man (τῶ πνεύματι ἡμῶν, Ro 8<sup>18</sup>), and acting, as it does, in harmony with the Spirit of God, is guided into all the truth (cf. the sequence τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας . . . els τὴν ἀληθείαν πᾶσαν, Jn 16<sup>13</sup>). Henceforth man's spiritual home is within the region of that absolute truth which the Person and the work of Jesus were destined to disclose and make real.

Just as we are led to believe in and hope for this co-operative activity of the Holy Spirit, so the Evangelists are insistent in the belief that the spirits of evil are ever watchful to make their home within us. In words of solemn warning Jesus implies that our need of spiritual guidance is so profound that we stand in constant danger of harbouring these active enemies (note els  $\tau \delta r$  olk $\delta r$   $\mu o \nu$ , Lk 1124), and that the only way of successfully guarding against their presence is to admit the Holy Spirit as the supreme and only Guest (cf. Plummer, 'St. Luke,' in ICC, on 11<sup>20</sup>). So close is the analogy between these conceptions that St. Mark does not hesitate to denote the presence and the relation of the evil spirits to the possessed by using the same preposition (e) which he employs when speaking of the guiding influence of the Holy Ghost (Mk 1<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>; cf. 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 2<sup>27</sup>). The diseases which these spirits were supposed to convey to their victims were often spoken of as belonging to them inherently (Mk 9<sup>17, 26</sup> etc. See art. DEMON).

We shall not be surprised, after these considerations, to learn that when men have the same ends in view, pursue them by similar methods of work, and betray the same general characteristics in their and betray the same general characteristics in their mental and spiritual outlook, they are said to have the same spirit. John the Baptist and Elijah, though separated by centuries of time, were believed to be so far identified that the former lived and acted 'in spirit and in power' (in preimar kal δυσάμει, Lk 117), i.e. under the shadow and guidance of the latter (cf. Jesus' method of interpreting the popular belief in the pre-Messianic return of Elijah, Mt 11<sup>14</sup>). At the same time, the historian is careful to note that the Baptist's childhood was marked by a gradual development and strengthening in spirit side by side with his bodily growth (Lk 180). SPIRITUALIZING OF THE PARABLES.legs of the lame,' says a Hebrew proverb, 'hang loose; so is a parable in the mouth of fools' (Pr 267); but it is possible to err in the opposite direction by pressing a parable too far, and, if the expression may be allowed, riding it to death. Such was the manner of the ancient interpreters, and it has been imitated by not a few in modern times. The error lies in forgetting that a parable is designed to teach one broad lesson, and insisting on discovering some significance in every detail.

A glaring instance is Theophilus of Antioch's exposition, quoted approvingly by St. Jerome,\* of the parable of the Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-12</sup>), which inculcates simply the duty of being as shrewd in spiritual matters as men are wont to be in worldly affairs. The rich man, according to Theophilus, is Almighty God; the steward, St. Paul; the debtor who owed 100 baths of oil, the Gentiles, 'qui magna indigebant misericordia Dei'; the debtor who owed 100 cors of wheat, the Jewish people, which had been nourished by the wheat of God's commandments.' Euthymius Zigabenus, whose interpretation of 'the fatted calf' (Lk 15<sup>22</sup>) as 'the holy body of Christ' is saved from being blasphemous only by the good monk's simple piety, makes out that the rich man is God (ròv φιλάνθρωπον και ἀνενδεῆ θεόν); the steward, every possessor of riches, such being 'not lords but stewards'; the steward's dismissal, death. Some modern interpreters have gone quite as far in extravagance. Schleiermacher makes the rich man represent the Romans, the steward the tax-gatherers, the debtors the Jewish people. According to Olshausen, the rich man is  $d\rho\chi\omega\nu$   $\tau\sigma\bar{\nu}$  ad $\sigma\mu\nu\nu$ , while the steward is the man who applies earthly riches to spiritual Origen's exposition of the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30-37</sup>) is a masterpiece of ill-applied The traveller is Adam; Jerusalem is ingenuity. Paradise; Jericho is the world; the robbers are hostile demons; the Priest is the Law; the Levite is the Prophets; the Samaritan is Christ; the wounds are disobedience; the beast is the Lord's body; the inn is the Church; the two denarii are the Father and the Son (the New and the Old Covenant, says Euthymius Zigabenus); the inn-

Covenant, says Euthymius Ligarenus, , one mikeeper is the Bishop.*

The parable of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>) has furnished another fruitful field to spiritualizing interpreters. According to St. Chrysostom the lamps are the grace of virginity (τὸ τῆς παρθενίας χάρισμα); the oil is philanthropy, alms (τὴν φλαν-θρωπίαν, τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην); the sellers are the poor, who afford the opportunity for alms-giving; the θρωπίαν, την ελεημοσύνην); the seners are the pool, who afford the opportunity for alms-giving; the sleep of the virgins is death; the cry at midnight (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>) shows that the Resurrection will take place by night. The lesson of the parable is that virginity without philanthropy is darkness. According to Crisca and St. Japone the five virgins cording to Origen and St. Jerome, the five virgins are the five senses. According to the latter, the oil is good works; according to the former, it is teaching, the vessels being the souls of the learners. There is much shrewd sense in Calvin's caustic remark: 'Some greatly torment themselves about the lamps, about the vessels, about the oil; but the simple and real gist is that eager zeal for a brief space does not suffice, unless unwearied constancy be added thereto.' See, further, artt. PARABLE and CIRCUMSTANTIALITY IN THE PARABLES.

DAVID SMITH. SPITTING, SPITTLE (πτύω, πτύσμα, έμπτύω).— References to spitting occur in the NT in the Gospels only, and there always in connexion with Christ.

1. Spitting was a common mark of derision and contempt. Christ foretold it among the insults which He as Messiah would endure (Mk 10<sup>34</sup>, Lk 18<sup>22</sup>); and during His Passion He was spit upon both by Jews (Mt 26<sup>67</sup>, Mk 14<sup>55</sup>) and by Gentile soldiers (Mt 27<sup>20</sup>, Mk 15<sup>18</sup>). Allusions to the custom with this injurious meaning are found in the OT (Nu 12<sup>14</sup>, Dt 25<sup>9</sup>, Is 50<sup>9</sup>). Variant forms, still customary among Orientals, are spitting upon the ground before any one, or even at the mention of a despised and hated name.

2. Three occasions are recorded on which Christ made use of His spittle in the work of healing: with a deaf and dumb man in the Decapolis (Mk 733), when He touched the tongue of the afflicted with moisture from His own mouth; with a blind man at Bethsaida (Mk 82), when He 'spat upon his eyes'; and with one born blind, at Jerusalem (Jn 96.7), when He made clay of the spittle and anointed the eyes of the blind. In the two former instances Christ is stated first to have taken the man apart, and Meyer suggests that this secrecy was due to His use of the spittle; but no reason for secrecy suggests itself, and the third act of healing appears to have been performed publicly. Trench (Miracles, on Jn 9) adduces Pliny (HN xxviii. 7), Suetonius (Vespas. 7), Tacitus (Hist. iv. 8), to witness to the prevalence of an ancient belief in the medicinal value of human saliva, especially for eye troubles. STAFF.—Two different words occurring in the Gospels are rendered 'staff' in EV.—(1)  $\dot{\rho}\dot{\alpha}\beta\delta\sigma$ , (2) ξύλον

1. Only once is ράβδος found in the Gospels, viz. in the Synoptic account of the instructions given by Jesus to the Twelve as He sent them on their mission (Mk 6<sup>8</sup>=Mt 10<sup>10</sup>=Lk 9<sup>3</sup>). It denotes, of mission (Ma G-Mat 10 - Last).

course, the ordinary walking-staff of the traveller, which, as used in the East, is somewhat longer than the walking-stick we know, and is simply a long, slightly-tapering rod, serviceable for support and for defence.

The main interest of the reference to the staff in the connexion above mentioned lies in the textual difference exhibited by the parallel passages. The instruction as given in Mk 68 was that the Twelve were to take nothing with them, 'except a staff only' (i μη μάβου μάνου); whereas, according to Mt. (μηδι μάβου) and Lk. (μηδι μάνου); whereas, according to Mt. (μηδι μάβου) and Lk. (μηδι μάνου); whereas, according to Mt. (μηδι μάβου) and Lk. (μηδι μάνου), they were to take nothing at all, not even a staff. Wright cites this in suppport of a suggestion that Mt. and Lk. were 'affected by the tendency to expect exceptional severity in the case of religious teachers' (Synopsis, p. 57). But perhaps it is adequately explained as due at first to a mere copyist's assimilation to the other negative items that occur. In both Mt. and Lk., again, there is a v.l. in some MSS which gives the plural μάμβου, 'neither staves.' This variant is not necessarily to be ascribed to a set purpose to afford a loophole for harmonizing the accounts. The AV, however, reading 'staves' in both cases, lies open to suspicion on this point; for in Mt. 1010 it gives 'nor yet staves,' with the extraordinary ready μάμβου. So the way is left open for the puerile suggestion that the accounts are consistent, inasmuch as Jesus meant that His disciples were not to take more than one staff each! Yet Wyclif's earlier version (following the Vulg.) had rendered 'nether a yerde' in Mt. 1010 (similarly Lk ½), careless of the discrepancy with Mk ½' (but a yerde oneli'). Cf. Tindale in self-evident: there is a touch of perfect naturalness about it.

2. The ξύλου mentioned in Mk 1443 (|| Mt 2647, and

2. The ξύλον mentioned in Mk 1443 (|| Mt 2647, and see Lk 2262), like the sword, is distinctly a weapon. Jn 18<sup>3</sup> uses the general expression ὅπλα. The ξύλα (EV 'staves') were the wooden truncheons or clubs of the Jewish police  $(i\pi\eta\rho\epsilon\tau\alpha)$ . Josephus (BJ II. ix. 4) mentions them as weapons used by Pilate's soldiers in attacking a crowd of Jews at Jerusalem. J. S. CLEMENS.

STALL.—See MANGER.

STAR.—1. Introductory.—Occasional reference is made in the NT to a star or stars, and, in most cases, an extraordinary significance of some kind is associated with the mention of such.

Two Greek words are employed, viz. ἀστέρ and ἄστρω. The latter also bears a collective meaning (=a group of stars, a constellation), but not in the NT. ἀστέρ is often applied metaphorically (see below). ἀστρω occurs in Lk 2123, Ac 743 'the star of the god Rephan' (a quotation from Am 525',), 2720, Ille 11'2. Elsewhere (exc. 2 P 1'19, where compress, 'day-star,' occurs) ἀστάρ is used.

Sometimes these references are without any special significance  $(e.g. \text{ Ac } 27^{20}, \text{ He } 11^{12} \text{ 'as the stars of heaven in multitude'), but more often$ some definite symbolical application is apparent, as, for example, when a period of calamity marking a Divine visitation is described as a time when the light of the sun and the moon is withdrawn and 'the stars fall from heaven' (Mt 24<sup>29</sup> || Rev 6<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>10. 11</sup>; cf. Ezk 32<sup>7</sup>). In Rev 9<sup>1</sup> the image of the 'fallen star' has a personal reference, Satan apparently being denoted by it (cf. Lk 10<sup>18</sup> 'I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven'); on the other hand, by the figure of 'the seven stars' which Christ holds in His right hand (Rev 1162131) which Christ holds in his right hand (kev 122-3) are signified the angels of the seven churches under the direction of Christ; cf. 129 (Grimm-Thayer). In Rev 121 the 'crown of twelve stars' may be intended to symbolize the twelve tribes (or the twelve Apostles 'regarded as the crowning ornament of the Jewish Church'). A mythological allusion is apparent in Rev 124 ('a woman arrayed with the much and the more worder has feet and with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars'). One passage (2216) identifies Christ with 'the bright, the age (22.3) identifies Christ with 'the bright, the morning star' (δ ἀστηρ δ λαμπρός, δ πρωινός), in the morning star') and 2 P 1 ('I will give him the morning star') and 2 P 1 ('until the day-star [φωσφόρος] arise in your hearts') are probably to be interpreted (see, further, below).

2. The star of the Magi (Mt 21-12).—In its main outlines the story of the visit of the Magi to Jerusalem and Bethlehem is probably based upon what the compiler of the First Gospel believed to be facts. It rests upon a historical basis. The wide-spread expectation of the coming of a World-Redeemer, about the time of the beginning of the Christian era, and the interest of Eastern astrologers in His advent in the West are well attested, and may well have led to some such visit as is described in Mt.* (See, further, art. MAGI). It must be remembered, however, that Mt.'s narrative is governed by an apologetic purpose. It was written for the special object of meeting the needs and objections of Jewish readers. One influential motive at work in Mt 2 seems to be a desire on the part of the Evangelist to suggest a likeness between the Divinely guided career of Moses, the instrument of Israel's redemption from Egypt, and the Messianic Redeemer who saves His people from their sins. 'Thus the story of the Magi and the star has a striking parallel in the Midrash Rabbā to Exodus in the section which deals with the of the future redeemer of Israel [i.e. Moses] was with child, and that this redeemer was destined to suffer punishment through water. Not knowing whether the redeemer was to be an Israelite or an Egyptian, and being desirous to prevent the re-demption of Israel, Pharaoh ordered that all children born henceforth should be drowned.'+ But perhaps the leading motive in Mt.'s narrative in this section of it is to suggest the homage of the Gentile world, and the selection of the gifts (gold, frankincense, and myrrh) may have been influenced by passages from OT Messianic prophecy which predict the allegiance of the nations (Is 60<sup>16.5</sup>, Ps 72<sup>11.12.15</sup>).‡ A contrast may also be intended to be suggested between the spiritual Kingship of the Messiah, and the earthly kingship of secular rulers (like Herod) who are instinctively hostile to the new force that has entered the world.

It is noticeable, however, that Mt. here does not cite any proof-passages from the OT (in vv.5.6 the quotation from Micah is placed in the mouth of the Sanhedrin). If the compiler had in mind the passage in Nu 24<sup>17</sup> ('There shall come forth a star out of Jacob,' etc.), as has been sometimes supposed, his failure to cite it would indeed be surprising. But it is to be observed that in Numbers the star is identified with the Messiah, and would hardly be applicable in this story. (See, further, below).

It may be, as Zahn * suggests, that Mt. regards the episode of the visit of the Magi to render homage to the newborn King not so much in the light of a fulfilment of ancient prophecy, as a new prophecy which indicates that the Messiah Jesus, who has been born to save His own people from their sins (1<sup>21</sup>), will be sought out and honoured by heathen, while the leading representatives of the religious thought and worship of Israel ask no questions concerning Him, and leave it to the tyrant, who enslaves them, to concern himself about the true King of the Jews, and then only with the object of compassing His destruction.' On this view the star and the astrologers—the Magi—become significant as proof that God uses even such imperfect means as astrology for bringing the heathen to the knowledge of the truth.

The 'star' of the narrative doubtless refers to

The 'star' of the narrative doubtless refers to some particular star, or to some unique astral phenomenon which the Magi were led to connect with the birth of the World-Redeemer in the West. The detail about the star 'which they saw at its rising' going before them, until it came and stood still above (the place) where the child was,' is, doubtless, not intended to be understood literally. It is merely a poetical description of the illusion which makes it appear that a luminous heavenly body keeps pace and maintains its relative position with the movement of the observer.

Various attempts have been made to identify the 'star' of this narrative with some exceptional heavenly phenomenon, and to fix its occurrence by means of astronomical calculation. The most famous of these is that of Kepler (1806), who thought of a close conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation Pisoes,—a rare combination which takes place only once in 800 years, and which occurred no less than three times in the year 747 a.U.C. (=B.C. 7). See Edersheim, LT I. p. 212 I. But the data are too indefinite to allow of any certain conclusion in the matter. Moreover, the ignorance displayed by Herod and 'all Jerusalem' as to the nature of the star hardly suggests that its appearance would strike any but practised astrologers.

The association of the birth of great men with such phenomena was a common feature in the ancient world where eastrology was held in high esteem. Thus, e.g., 'on the birthnight of Alexander, Magi prophesied from a brilliant constellation that the destroyer of Asia was born '(cf. Cic. de Divinatione, i. 47, cited by Allen, op. cit. p. 12). On Jewish ground we have already seen the same idea at work in connexion with the birth of Moses in the Midrash passage cited above. Edersheim (op. cit. i. p. 211 f.) also cites some late Midrashic passages which connect the coming of Messiah with the appearance of a star. But these are of very uncertain value.

3. The star of the Messiah.— Sometimes the Various attempts have been made to identify the 'star' of

3. The star of the Messiah. - Sometimes the Messiah Himself is metaphorically referred to as a Star,† a description which is based, apparently, on Nu 2417:

'There shall come forth a star out of Jacob, And a sceptre shall rise out of Israel';

In the Targum Onkelos this is rendered:

'When a king shall arise out of Jacob, And the Messiah shall be anointed from Israel';

And in pseudo-Jonathan:

'When the mighty King of Jacob's House shall reign,
And the Messiah, the Power-sceptre of Israel, shall be anointed.'

Here, it will be noticed, the Star is expressly identified with the Messianic King. A similar Messianic application of this passage meets us in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, where (Judah, 24 [Greek text]) the following occurs:

Over you a star shall proceed out of Jacob, And a man shall arise from my seed like the sun of right eousness' (cf. Mal 42). Cf. also Test. Levi 18.

The Apocatypse of Baruch (ch. 53), the seer beholds the Messiah appear like lightning 'on the summit of the cloud'; and this lightning 'shone exceedingly so as to illuminate the whole earth' (cf. Mt 2427' For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west, so shall be the coming of the Son of Man'; Lk 1734 and the other NT passages cited below; cf. Volz, Jud. Eschatologie, p. 221).

It was apparently from Nu 2417, Messianically interpreted, that the false Messiah Sineon derived his designation Bar Cochba (i.e. 'Son of the Star'). When Rabbi Akiba acknowledged him as the Messiah, he expressly cited this Scripture passage (Bab. Sanh. 97b) as applicable to Simeon, though this opinion was not generally shared by the learned among the Jews of the time. Bar Cochba seems to have been invested with a Messianic character by the irresistible force of popular public opinion. After the disastrous issue of his revolt it became necessary to apologize for Akiba's mistake, and one such explanation seems to be reflected in some of the minor Midrashim which make the reference apply to Messiah ben Joseph, who was destined to be killed in battle before Messiah ben David could appear.* There is thus good evidence that in the time of Christ the 'Star' of Nu 24<sup>17</sup> was popularly identified with the Messianic King.†

This idea may have influenced those NT passages where Jesus is represented as the 'Morning Star' (Rev 2216 228), though it must be remembered that the angels are described symbolically in the Bk. of Enoch (lxxxvi. 1, 3) as 'stars'—a metaphor which helps to explain the symbolism by which Jesus is here described as 'the Morning Star.' 'Among the stars of the spiritual firmament,' Jesus is 'the brightest in the whole galaxy '(Swete, Apocalypse, p. 306). A similar conception meets us in 2 P 1<sup>19</sup> ('Take heed unto the lamp of prophecy until the ('Take heed unto the lamp or propnecy until the day dawn, and the day-star [φωσφόροσ] arise in your hearts'), and, in fact, the essential idea is present in all those passages of the NT which speak of the spiritual illumination that accompanies the revelation of the Messiah (cf. the fragment of an old Christian hymn in Eph 5<sup>14</sup> 'Awake, thou that Jn 1º Christ 'the Light which lightens every man coming into the world,' etc.). There is also the remarkable description of the Messiah as the 'Dayspring from on high' (ἀνατολή ἐξ δψους) in the Song of Zacharias (Lk 1<sup>76</sup>), which may possibly have been associated in thought with the Messianic Star.‡

The association of the idea of light with the Messiah and the Messianic age was well established in Jewish Literature. This idea is founded onor, at any rate, finds classical expression in — Is  $60^{lt}$ . ('Arise, shine; for thy light is come'). The Midrash (Yalkut Shim.) on this passage is instructive. It comments thus:

'What is asserted by the words of the Psalm, "In thy light shall we see light" (Ps 3610)? It is the light of the Messiah that is meant. For when it is said, "God saw the light that it was good" (Gn 14), it is thereby taught that the Holy One (Blessed be He) contemplated the generation of the Messiah and his works, before the world had been created, and that He concealed the light for the Messiah and his generation beneath His throne of glory. Then spake Satan before the Holy One (Blessed be He): "Lord of the World, for whom is the light hidden beneath Thy throne of glory destined?" [Answer] "For him who in the time to come will subdue thee and bring thee to shame."

The Midrash then goes on to relate that at his request Satan was allowed to see the Messiah, and at the sight of him trembled and sank to the ground, crying out: 'Truly this is the Messiah, who will deliver me and all heathen kings over to Gehenna.'*

Gressmann (Der Ursprung der isr.-jüd. Eschatologie, p. 307 f.) traces the association of light in connexion with the Servant of Jahweh, who is represented as the Light of the World in Deutero-Essiah (Is 496 514), to the mythical representation of the World-Ruler as a solar hero in the old Saga.

In fact, under the figure of light the salvation and felicity of the Messianic age are constantly depicted (see esp. Volz, Jüd. Eschatologic, pp. 328-331). The heavenly Jerusalem of the Apocalypse is a city filled with celestial light (Rev 21<sup>22, 23</sup> 22°). The long drawn out contrast between light and darkness that pervades the Fourth Gospel is also significant in this connexion. G. H. Box.

steward, stewardship.—

The former word is a tr. of introduction in Mt 205, Lk 83, and of coincrises in Lk 1243 161. 28; the latter, of coincrises in Lk 1243 161. 28; the latter, of coincrises in Lk 125. 24.

In v. 2 the verb cinestan occurs. The distinction between introduction as synonyms; Meyer says the former is a more general term; Schleusner, that the ist is appointed by law or a magistrate, the cise by will; Elliott and Lightfoot agree in thinking that internity in like our 'guardian,' has special reference to 'persons'; cise, like 'steward,' to property (see their notes on Gal 42 and references there cited, and Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant., s.v. introduct). The last view is probably the right one. But the exact duties of each of them doubtless varied in different cases and under different masters, and often the two are used interchangeably (so Meyer on Mt 205). Meyer's view is probably true of the Goepels, although if Chuza as introduct, it might lend further colour to Sanday's theory of Joanna's relation to the authorship of Lk 1. 2. In Mt 2445 coins is used of one whose position is evidently that of the steward, as may be seen by comparison with Lk 125. Usually, indeed, the steward is a slave or freedman, corresponding to Lat. dispensator or villicus (as in Lk 12, Mt 24); occasionally he is a freeman, Lat. procurator (Lk 16). See Plummer in ICC on Lk 1242 161, and Hatch, Bibl. Greek, p. 62.

The primary passages are Mt 201-20 (Labourers in

The primary passages are Mt 201-20 (Labourers in Vineyard), 2445-51, Lk 83 1242-48 161-21 (the Unjust Steward). Some would add the parables of the Prodigal and of Dives as illustrations of wealth wrongly used. The secondary are Mt 21<sup>33-46</sup> (Wicked Husbandmen) 25<sup>14-30</sup> (Talents), Lk 19<sup>12-27</sup>, (Minæ), Mt 10<sup>24f</sup> 18<sup>23-25</sup>, Mk 13<sup>34</sup>, Jn 15<sup>14-30</sup>, Lk 17<sup>10</sup>. Of these Lk 83 yields no teaching.

The facts and teachings of the others may be thus summarized:

- 1. The steward's position.—He was entrusted with the oversight of part or all of his master's estate, including persons and property. He had the management of his affairs, the care of re-ceipts and expenditures, and the duty of dealing out the proper portion to every servant and even to the children' (Grimm-Thayer). The education of the children as well as their maintenance was under his charge. His control was more or less absolute according as the master was absent or present. Christ teaches that we are all God's The trust covers (a) ourselves (for we stewards. are His); (b) others whom we can influence; (c) our time, means, opportunities, etc. For everything we rightfully have is from God (cf. Mt 5.16). What one has wrongfully seized is no part of his trust.
- 2. The steward's duty was to manage everything with most watchful fidelity and utmost efficiency, and to do it in the interest of his master. So with us. We should therefore (a) discipline ourselves-body, soul, and spirit, so as to realize God's ideal for us and be most efficient for service—a duty demanding care of the body, training of the mind, culture of the affections, discipline of the will, etc.; (b) pursue our calling, whatever it may be, in the interest of God's Kingdom, whether our work be that of the labourer, the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, physician, statesman, teacher, preacher, or any other; (c) utilize time, influence, opportunities, money, the wisest way; (d) urge and help others to do the same. One must plan one's probable life as a whole that it may subserve God's purposes in the assume possible.

3. The master's duty was (a) to assign to the steward only just and honourable work, and (b) to provide for his needs. The righteous God can be trusted to do both (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>). This leads to the topic that is commonly uppermost when Christian stewardship is thought of; only it approaches the matter from a rather different, but the true, standpoint.

The arrangements between master and steward varied. Is it so in our relation to God? or is there any definite arrangement or understanding? Some have held that tithing represents it. Yet a regulation like that does not seem fully in harmony with the spirit of the new dispensation (cf. Jer 3123), which deals in principles rather than rules, just because God is more careful to develop character than to get men's gains. Perhaps the best way of stating the case, however, would be this: God wills that His stewards should spend on themselves such a proportion of the income as is necessary to their highest working efficiency. This will vary with different persons according to conditions. Each must determine honestly for himself. 'To his own Master he stands or falls.' In general, it will mean less than is commonly sup-posed. It must be determined not by love of ease or pleasure, not by selfishness or pride, not by custom or fashion (where these are wrong), nor even by what would be reasonable and allowable in a normal world of sinlessness and blessedness, but wholly by the spirit of Divine love in view of the pressing needs of this abnormal world with its appalling sin, ignorance, and wretchedness.

4. Rewards and penalties.—All rewards are of grace (Lk 17<sup>10</sup>). These begin now, but their fulness is hereafter. Through faithful service there comes the perfecting of character, the richer development of the personality, and the final winning of our souls (2119). We are now stewards holding all on trust. We shall then receive as our own the inheritance prepared from the foundation of the world (Lk 161<sup>2</sup>, Mt 25<sup>34</sup>). We shall be welcomed into eternal tabernacles (Lk 16°) and be entrusted with the rule and authority for which we have become fitted (Lk 12<sup>44</sup>, Mt 24<sup>47</sup> 25<sup>20-23</sup>). The unfaithful shall be beaten, or stripped of what they had, cut asunder as hypocrites, and cast into outer darkness with the unbelieving (Lk 1246, Mt 2451 2528-30).

STIGMATA (στίγματα, EV 'marks').—The word occurs only in Gal 6<sup>17</sup> 'From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus' (RV). The subject of the 'stigmata (or marks) of Jesus' comes before us in two ways: we have to consider (1) the meaning of the word stigmata as used by St. Paul; (2) the special sense in which it has come to be employed from the time of St. Francis of Assisi and onwards, esp. in the Roman Catholic Church.

'stigmata of Jesus' Bonaventura and many others have supposed the Apostle to refer to bodily marks resembling the nail prints and other insignia of the Saviour's Passion—thus making him affirm an experience, in his own person, of the phenomena of 'stigmatization' (see 2). But the technical sense in which the word stigmata was used in the time of St. Paul-viz. as denoting marks of ownership (either brands made with hot irons, or cuts which, as they healed, were prevented from closing, and as they healed, were prevented from closing, and so became broad scars), as well as the meaning of the whole verse when considered in the light of the context and its analogies in other parts of the Apostle's writings (esp. 2 Co 11<sup>227</sup>.)—shows that 'Iyoo' must be taken as the gen. of possession, and that the reference is not at all to the wounds on the Lord's body but solely to certain marks on St. the Lord's body, but solely to certain marks on St. Paul's own body that stamped him as belonging to Jesus Christ.

(2) A few commentators, following Augustine (Com. on Gal., in loc.), have transformed St. Paul's stigmata into his manifestation of the fruits of the Spirit, with special reference to his Christian asceticism (cf. 1 Co 927). But the technical signification of stigmata, as well as the expression on my body, seems to put such an interpretation altogether out of the question.

(3) Assuming, then, that the stigmata were marks of ownership, what is the particular figure that St. Paul means to suggest? (a) Soldiers, in honour of an adored commander, sometimes branded on their bodies the initial letter of his But though the idea of the Christian life as a military service is a familiar one in the Pauline writings (1 Co 97, 2 Co 104, 1 Ti 612, 2 Ti 47), it is not in keeping with the present context, which brings Jesus before us as Lord (vv. 14. 17), not as Captain. (b) Slaves attached to the service of a heathen temple (ιερόδουλοι) were branded with the names of the deities to whom they ministered; and Lightfoot (Com. on Gal., in loc.) and others (e.g. Westcott in Expos. vi. [1887] 241) have thought that the metaphor is most appropriately understood in the light of this fact. But, as Meyer pointed out (Com. in loc.), the references to the branding of lepobouhou found in Herod., Plut., Lucian, etc., bear upon the usage of other nations, and we have no evidence for Galatia itself. Even if we had, a reference to the branding of the slaves in heathen temples would be needlessly recondite, in view of the much more familiar practice of branding domestic slaves. And, above all, as the  $le\rho\delta\delta\sigma\nu\lambda\omega$ were very frequently women attached to a temple for immoral purposes, it seems unlikely that the Apostle would have in his mind a term that carried associations so degrading. (r) It is most likely, therefore, that St. Paul is alluding to an ordinary domestic custom. In the East (not in Rome, where branding was the mark of a runaway slave, and so a badge of disgrace) slaves were regularly branded by their owners, and Artemidorus Daldianus bears witness to the practice in Galatia (Oneirocritica, i. 8. The verb he uses is στίζω, from which στίγμα comes. See W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Gal. pp. 84, 472, who tells us that this ancient custom is familiar even yet to the observant traveller in Turkey). St. Paul never calls himself a ιερόδουλος, Turkey). that the thought that he was the 3000s of Jesus Christ was one of his ruling ideas (Ro 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>22</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>5</sup>, Gal 1<sup>10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>). And when he says, 'I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus,' he means certain marks that hore witness to the fact that Jesus was his Master and he was Jesus' slave.

(4) But what were these marks that St. Paul bore branded on his body? Without doubt, he meant the scars he had earned in the service of oman Catholic Church.

1. St. Paul's use of the word.—(1) By the face and whole person of all his toils and trials, but, at all events, the laceration and disfigurement produced by Jewish scourges and lictors rods and the cruel stones of the multitude (Ac 14<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co These marks of his servitude to his Lord the Apostle looked upon not only as a badge of honour, but (and this is his reason for referring to them here) as seals set upon his claim to be the Apostle and minister of Jesus Christ (cf. 2 Co 11<sup>236</sup>.), and so as tokens of his right to speak with authority. (For the idea of authority as springing out of complete subjection to a greater, cf. the centurion's 'I also am a man under authority,' Mt 89, Lk 78). The verse thus falls into line with the whole Epistle as an intensely personal message of remonstrance and appeal. Once more, at the end as at the be-ginning (cf. 1<sup>1</sup>), St. Paul exalts his Apostleship. And what he says here is, 'Let no man trouble me after this, by challenging my right to declare the truth of the gospel; for I bear branded on my body the marks which testify that I am the slave of Jesus -that He is my Master and my Lord.

2. The ecclesiastical use of the word.—According to the earliest biographers of St. Francis of Assisi (Thomas of Celano, the 'Tres Socii,' and Bonaventura, whose 'Vitæ' are all included in the Acta Sanctorum), the saint, while meditating in his cell on the sufferings of Jesus, fell into a trance, and had a vision of the Crucified Himself in the form of a seraph. When he awoke he found that he was marked in hands and feet and side with the wounds of the Lord—wounds which remained till the time of his death, that in the side bleeding occasionally. Numerous witnesses testify to having seen these marks in the body of Francis, both during his life and after he was dead. Bonaventura (op. cit. xiii. 4) addresses the saint in the following words: 'Jam enim propter stigmata Domini Jesu que in corpore tuo portas, nemo debet tibl esse molestus.' This is an appropriation to the case of Francis of the Vulg. version of St. Paul's language in Gal 6<sup>17</sup>: from which the inference is natural that the biographer, by a mistaken interpretation of the text, conceived the stigmata of Francis and those of the Apostle to be of a like kind.

From the first the stigmatization of St. Francis was generally accounted in the content of the content of the stormatic in the content of the standard of the content of the stormatic in the stigmatization of St. Francis was generally accounted in the content of the standard of the content of the stormatic in the stigmatization of St. Francis was generally accounted the stigmatization of St.

the biographer, by a mistaken interpretation of the text, conceived the stigmata of Francis and those of the Apostle to be of a like kind.

From the first the stigmatization of St. Francis was generally accepted in the Catholic Church, not only as a fact, but as a miraculous evidence of the Divine favour; though the Dominicans objected, and attributed the alleged miracle to Franciscan deceit. In the next century, however, similar marks were affirmed to have shown themselves on the person of the well-known Dominican nun, St. Catherine of Siena; and thereafter down to modern times (the last well-authenticated instance was in 1888) the phenomena of stigmatization have repeatedly been vouched for, the subjects, in the great majority of cases, being women. That some of the alleged instances were pure frauds is practically certain, while in other cases the stigmata appear to have been nothing more than wounds self-inflicted by persons in a state of epileptic hysteria. On the other hand, in a number of cases, and notably in that of St. Francis, the positive evidence is too strong to be rejected on either of the above grounds (see esp. the biography of St. Francis by P. Sabatier, mentioned below). And now modern investigations, esp. in the region of psycho-physics, have furnished evidence that goes to support the historical testimony, by assuring us that there is a 'scientific background' to the phenomenon of stigmatization. It is certain that, in sensitive subjects, the influence of the mind in modifying bodily states and producing new conditions is exceedingly great; and stigmatization is now commonly placed by competent students among the peculiar phenomena attributed to hypnotic auto-suggestion. It is accepted as a fact that stigmata have actually appeared on the bodies of persons whose nervous susceptibility was abnormal, when, under the excitement of strong feeling, they have fixed their minds steadily upon the thought of the sufferings of Jesus, and especially on the insignia Passionis (see EBr xxii. 550, xxxii.

STONE .- 1. The Greek terms .- Apart from the

Gr. words tr. 'stone' in the NT which call for notice in the present article. (1)  $\lambda \ell \theta os$  (LXX for ואָכן) is the general term. It occurs very frequently in the Gospels, and is the word with which in this rock lying underneath). Probably, however, the sense is best conveyed by the proper name 'Peter'—the meaning of 'Peter' being, of course, under--the meaning of refer being, of course, understood (cf. Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). (4) λαξευτός, 'hewn in stone' (fr. λᾶς 'stone' and ξέω 'scrape' or 'carve'), applied in Lk 23<sup>88</sup> to the tomb in which Jesus was laid. Mt. (27°°) and Mk. (15°°), however, describe it as hewn out of rock ( $\pi \epsilon \tau \rho \alpha$ ). (5)  $\psi \hat{\eta} \phi \sigma_1$ , 'pebble,' represents 'stone' in the 'white stone' which in the Ep. to the Church in Pergamum Christ promises to him that overcometh (Rev 217).

2. Stones crying out.—The stones of Christ and the Gospels form a suggestive subject. There are sermons in these stones, we might say, for they have lessons to impart to us regarding Christ's history, His teaching, and His Person as the Messiah.

(1) His history.—(a) Whether or not we accept the ancient tradition that Jesus was born in one of the limestone caves of Bethlehem, it is very likely that His manger would be a manger of stonebuilt with stones and mortar if not hollowed out of the solid rock (see Thomson, LB [ed. 1878] p. 413). If so, the first bed on which the Lord was laid, like the last one to which He was carried by Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathæa (Jn 1988), was a bed of stone.

(b) In Christ's spiritual struggles on the very threshold of His public life, He had to do with the stones. It is a curious fact that they play a part in two out of the three acts that make up the drama of the Temptation in the Wilderness. In the one case, Jesus is tempted to use His miraculous powers to turn the stones that lie about Him on the rough mountain-side into loaves of bread wherewith to satisfy His hunger (Mt 42.4, Lk 42.4). In the other, He is tempted to leap from a pinnacle of the Temple by the reminder that it is written (Ps 91.1. 12) that God's child shall be upheld by angels, and so preserved from dashing his foot against a stone (Mt 4<sup>5-7</sup>, Lk 4<sup>9-12</sup>). In the one case, the stones were to nourish His life; but contrary to God's law of sowing and reaping. In the other, they were to refuse to dash Him to death; but contrary to the Divinely fixed law of gravitation. Satan meant the stones to be stones of stumbling to Jesus, on that difficult path of obedience and self-renunciation to which in His baptism He had just consecrated Himself. But Jesus by His faith and patience turned them into stepping-stones to higher things.

(c) At Cana of Galilee Jesus 'manifested his glory'; and there, we might say, He was again beholden to the stones; for the six waterpots by whose aid He wrought His first miracle were waterpots of stone (Jn 26).

(d) But not always were the stones His servants and ministers. Twice in Jn.'s Gospel (8<sup>59</sup> 10<sup>51</sup>, cf. vb. 'to stone' (for wh. see STONING), there are 5 | 118) we read how the enemies of Jesus took up stones to cast them at Him, because He claimed that He was the Son of God.

(e) Against the cave which was Lazarus' tomb there lay a stone (Jn 1128)—rolled there to shut in the dead during the awful process of decay (v.<sup>20</sup>), as well as to shut out the ravening wild beasts. 'Take ye away the stone,' Jesus said (v.<sup>20</sup>); and when they had done so, another word of command turned that gravestone at Bethany into a parable to all the ages of the rolling away from human hearts of the crushing bondage of death (He 2<sup>14</sup>.) by Him who is the Resurrection and the Life (Jn

(f) It was not long after, when the Lord's own body was carried to another tomb 'hewn in stone' (Lk 23<sup>32</sup>), and laid on one of the stone shelves prepared for such a purpose. Against the door of His sepulchre also 'a great stone' was rolled (Mt 2760 ||), and a seal was set upon the guardian stone. And that great stone, which the Jewish rulers would fain have made the incontrovertible proof that the world had seen the last of Jesus of Nazareth (v. ext.), has become the shining and perennial monument of His victory over death—proclaiming, in St. Peter's words, that 'it was not possible that he should be holden of it' (Ac 2<sup>24</sup>). For whenever Christian men think of the Lord's sepulchre, they always see that great stone rolled back from the door, and the angel of the Resurrection sitting upon it (Mt 282 ||).

(2) His teaching.—One of the most self-evident proofs that Jesus ever gave of the Heavenly l'ather's love and the reality of prayer, lay in the question, 'What man is there of you, who, if his son shall ask him for a loaf, will give him a stone?' (Mt 7°). One of the most memorable examples of His heart-searching irony was when He said to the accusers of a sinful woman, 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her' (Jn 8<sup>(7)</sup>). One of the most striking assertions of His claim to Messianic dignity lay in His answer to the Pharisees when they appealed to Him to rebuke the enthusiastic shouts of His disciples: 'I tell you that if these shall hold their peace, the stones will cry out' (Lk 1940). One of His clearest and most emphatic predictions of the coming fate of Jerusalem was when He said of the Temple, adorned with goodly stones, 'There shall not be adorned with goodly stones, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down' (Mk 13<sup>2</sup> ||).

In the Ep. to the Church in Pergamum the author of the Apocalypse represents Jesus Christ as promising a 'white stone' to the victor in the good fight of faith (Rev 2<sup>17</sup>). Numerous explanations of this white stone have been suggested but tions of this white stone have been suggested, but the one that seems best to satisfy all the requirements is that which takes it to be the tessara gladiatoria, bestowed on the victorious young gladiator when he exchanged the name of tiro for that of spectatus (see ExpT i. [1889] p. 2, viii. [1897] p. 291; Hastings' DB iv. 618b).

The 5th of the Oxyrhynchus (1897) 'Sayings of esus' contains the striking words, 'Jesus saith Jesus' contains the striking words, 'Jesus saith . . . Raise the stone and there shalt thou find me;
cleave the wood and there am I.' The words have lent themselves to various ingenious explanations; but the most probable interpretation is the one which also most readily suggests itself—that we have here an affirmation of the immanence of Christ in natural things. The saying may be Christ in natural things. The saying may be understood in a sense that is perfectly in keeping with teaching that is found in the NT (e.g. Jn 1<sup>3</sup>, Col 1st.), but was more probably written with a leaning to a kind of Gnostic Pantheism. It is generally agreed that, in their present form at least, these 'Sayings of Jesus' were not spoken by the Lord Himself, and do not even belong to the earliest age (see Lock and Sanday, Two Lectures on the 'Sayings of Jesus' (1897); cf. ExpT ix.

(3) His Person.—On one occasion (Lk  $20^{17} = \text{Mt}$   $21^{48}$ ) Jesus took a stone ( $\lambda l \theta \sigma s$ ; cf. His symbolic use of 'rock' ( $\pi \epsilon \tau \rho a$ ) in Mt  $7^{246}$ . ||,  $16^{18}$ , and St. Paul's 'spiritual rock,' 'that rock was Christ,' 1 Co 10°) as a symbol of His own Person. He had just spoken the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, and after announcing their doom, He quoted epexegetically Ps 118<sup>22</sup> 'The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.' Thus He identified the rejected 'Son' of the parable with the rejected stone of the Psalm, and the wicked husbandmen with the scribes and Pharisees as the 'builders' of Israel's theocratic edifice; but at the same time intimated to the latter that they must not think that by rejecting Him and putting Him to death they would be done with Him for ever. So far from that, He went on to say, 'Every one that falleth on that stone shall be broken to pieces; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust' (Lk 20<sup>18</sup>=Mt

In Ac 411 we find St. Peter taking up Christ's symbol, and boldly declaring to the Sanhedrin that Jesus Christ of Nazareth was the stone set at naught by them the builders, but made by God the head of the corner. And in his Epistle he returns to this parable of the stone as a symbol of Christ's Person, and dwells upon it with much greater fulness (1 P 2<sup>4-8</sup>). He describes the Lord now, with evident reference to His Resurrection (cf. Ac 410 with v.11), as a 'living stone,' rejected indeed by men, but to God chosen and precious, upon whom His people are built up into a spiritual house. The allusion to the verse in Ps 118 is unmistakable; but in what he proceeds to say the Apostle makes use further of two passages in Isaiah. First he quotes Is 2816 'Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner stone,' etc., and next the words of 814 about the 'stone of stumbling and the rock of offence.' And it seems clear that his reminiscence of the latter passage has been inspired by his recollection of the Lord's own words as to those who fall upon the Stone which is Himself, and those upon whom that Stone shall fall (cf. vv. 7.8 with Lk 20<sup>17.18</sup>=Mt 21<sup>42.44</sup>). See, further, art.

STONING.—There are three Greek verbs in the NT which mean 'to stone'—λιθοβολέω, λιθάζω, and παταλιθάζω. These, again, are the equivalents of the two Heb. synonyms >>> and cm, each of which may denote either the mere throwing of their ill-will (Ex 174, Nu 1410), or the legal execution of a criminal by letting fall one or more large pieces of stone upon his body. Mere stone-throwing is mentioned in the Gospels in the following passages: The priests fear that the people may stone them (Lk 20°); the prophets were so treated (Mt 23°, Lk 13<sup>26</sup>); the husbandmen in the parable beat or stone the messengers (Mt 21<sup>26</sup>, Mk 12<sup>4</sup> AV); and in St. John's Gospel the Jews so threaten Jesus (8<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>31-33</sup> 11<sup>8</sup>).

The Jewish Senate (Bêth Din) recognized four forms of capital punishment,—stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling (Sanh. vii. 1). In the case of stoning, the two witnesses took their stand on an elevation of about twice the height of a man. The convict was laid on his back beneath, and one of the witnesses dropped a stone upon his heart. If this did not prove fatal, the second witness cast one; and if the victim still survived, then all Israel (Dt 177). The bodies of all stoned persons were crucified according to one account; according to another, only those of blasphemers and idolators, a man being hung with his face to the people, a woman with hers to the tree. woman with hers to the tree. According to another account, women were not crucified (ib. vi. 4). A person who had been stoned was not buried in the sepulchre of his fathers (vii. 1)

In the Law and in practice capital punishment was inflicted for offences against any of the first was inflicted for offences against any of the first seven ordinances of the Decalogue—that is, upon persons guilty of apostasy (Dt 13<sup>10</sup>), idolatry (17<sup>5</sup>), blasphemy (Lv 24<sup>18</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>13</sup>), Sabbath-breaking (Nu 15<sup>28</sup>), disobedience to parents (Dt 21<sup>21</sup>), murder (Lv 24<sup>21</sup>), unchastity (Dt 22<sup>21, 26</sup>), as well as for practising sorcery (Lv 20<sup>27</sup>), for kidnapping (Ex 21<sup>18</sup>), and for special offences (Jos 7). An ox which gored a man in the course of a bull-fight was not stoned (Baba kamma, iv. 4; Ex 21<sup>28</sup>). In each of the above cases the penalty takes the form of of the above cases the penalty takes the form of stoning, though this is not explicitly mentioned in the case of murder, of kidnapping, or of unchastity on the part of a married woman (Dt 2222). Stoning was thus the regular means of executing criminals among the Hebrews, as strangling was with the later Jews. Both processes avoided the shedding of blood, and reduced the risk of vengeance on the part of the relatives.

In the narrative Jn 81-11, which is generally regarded as spurious, not being part of the text of the best MSS, the scribes were therefore justified in stating that 'Moses in the law commanded us that such should be stoned,' the reference being to Dt 22<sup>23, 24</sup>. This would imply that the woman was betrothed merely, but not married, the mode of execution in the case of a married woman not being specified (Dt 22<sup>22</sup>), and being, in fact, at the time strangling (Sanh. 51b: 'A daughter of Israel who is married, by strangling, who is betrothed, by stoning').

STORM.—See SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591.

STRANGER.—The AV has only the one rendering—'stranger'—for five different words in the Greek. It is the natural translation of the term Greek. It is the natural translation of the term which has the most general signification — ξένος (Mt 25<sup>35, 43</sup> 27<sup>7</sup> etc.); and there is no other word in English to express the exact force of ἀλλότριος (Mt 17<sup>25, 28</sup>, Jn 10<sup>5</sup>; cf. 10<sup>12</sup>—the ἀλλότριος is the one 'whose own the sheep are not'). For ἀλλογενής the proper equivalent is 'alien,' as in Lk 17<sup>18</sup> (RVm). For πάροικος and παρεπίδημος RV rightly uses 'sojourner' (Ac 7<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 1, He 11<sup>19</sup>). These words indicate a sentiment which He 11<sup>13</sup>). These words indicate a sentiment which is (1) racial or national (Mt 17<sup>25, 26</sup> the kings of the earth take tribute from 'strangers,' not from sons), (2) humanitarian (Mt 25<sup>36</sup> I was a stranger, and ye took me in'), and (3) religious (1 P 2<sup>11</sup> 'I beseech you as sojourners and pilgrims to abstain,' etc.).

Generally, however, it may be said that the connexion in which the words occur in NT is illustrative of the difference between the current Jewish conception of the stranger in the time of Christ, and that which is suggested by the Gospel. Jesus found His countrymen steeped in the idea that all foreigners were 'dogs,' that 'the peoples' was a term almost synonymous with 'the heathen,' and that only under rigid conditions and upon sufferance might a non-Jew obtain any of the privileges considered to be the Divine right of a Jew. He left His followers possessed of the thought, however unconscious they might be of all that it involved, that to Him the Samaritan and the Gentile, the man outside the pale and the man of no caste, were as much the objects of His mission as the favoured son of Abraham. 'Stranger,' to the average Jew, was the name for one with whom he might have commercial dealings and certain social or political relations, but with whom religious affinity or fellowship was practically impossible; to Jesus it meant one who had a special claim upon Him and His (Mt 25<sup>38ff</sup>.). The impression which He created was not merely that Christianity which He created was not merely that Christianity meant a deepening and extending of that sense of the sacred duty of hospitality and kindness which already existed in the Jewish mind, as it does throughout the East (Ex 23° 22° Lk 19° Dt 10<sup>18. 19</sup>, Jer 7° etc.; cf. the practice existing among the Essenes, Jos. BJ II. viii. 4, 5), but that it involved a complete change of the attitude which resumed that a different treatment was to be meted. assumed that a different treatment was to be meted out to the stranger from that which was naturally shown to one's own kith and kin (Mt 543-48 etc.). See, further, artt. Cosmopolitanism, Hospitality, Gentiles, Universalism.

It is further to be noticed that Christianity gave a new signification to the word 'stranger.' The way had been prepared by the use of the Hebrew word 'Ger' (LXX. πάροικος, see artt. 'Ger' in DB and 'Stranger' in Encyc. Bibl.), which designated the sojourner who dwelt within the gates of Israel, and who, while having a certain status there and temporary home, belonged to another country. The fact also that the Jews themselves had from the tact also that the Jews themselves had from the time of Abraham so often been sojourners in a land not their own (Ac 7<sup>6, 29</sup>, He 11<sup>9</sup>), and the lessons taught by the dispersion in post-exilic times, led to that metaphorical use of the term which has entered so largely into religious speech and poetry. The follower of Christ saw in it a description of himself as of one who was absent from his proper country, and whose citizenship was in heaven (Ph 320). When St. Peter writes to the responsible from the Dispersion' (1 P 1), and beseeches them 'as sojourners and pilgrims' to abstain from fleshly lusts (211), he is diverting the term from a geographical to a spiritual sense (cf. 117). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews has the same thought, 'For we have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come' (13<sup>14</sup>, cf. 1113-16).

STREAM.—See RIVER.

STREET.—In place of 'street' in Mk 656 we should read with RV 'market-place,' the open space or square (άγορά) where goods are brought for disposal to the merchants from the bazaars, and where people at leisure gather for conversation.  $\pi\lambda\alpha\tau\epsilon\hat{i}\alpha$  stands for 'street' in the ordinary sense.  $\pi\lambda are \hat{a}$  stands for 'street' in the ordinary sense. In Lk 1421 it is apparently distinguished from  $\dot{\rho}\dot{\nu}\mu\eta$ , as 'street' from 'alley' or 'lane.' But the distinction is ignored elsewhere; and certainly the 'street'  $(\dot{\rho}\dot{\nu}\mu\eta)$  called 'Straight' in Damascus (Ac 911) is no 'alley.' In the East it would be difficult to maintain the distinction. Even the main streets in attes like Lemeslave and Cairon are effect against the street of the in cities like Jerusalem and Cairo are often narrow and crooked, more like 'alleys' than 'streets' in our sense. The footway is made narrow, the upper storeys frequently overhanging the road, for protection against the heat of the sun. Seclusion is a main object aimed at in building Eastern houses: the wall to the street is seldom pierced by windows; the door usually leads through a passage into a court, round which the rooms are arranged. All sorts of filth are cast into the streets (Rev 118). In spite of the scavengering of dogs, their condition is often not only loathsome, but a source of danger to health.

W. EWING.

STRUGGLES OF SOUL.—The Gospels use varied language in describing the conflicting emotions of Jesus. At the grave of Lazarus He groaned in the spirit or in Himself (Jn 1133, 38, Gr. ενεβριμήσατο and έμβριμώμενος, from έμβριμάομαι to snort in, to be very angry, to be moved with indignation, Mk 14°; sternly to charge, Mt 9°, Mk 14°); He was disturbed inwardly by pity for the mourners, by grief at their hopeless view of death, and by disappointment at their lack of trust in Him. His feeling found expression in tears (v. 2°). When restoring hearing and speech by the unusual means of putting His hands in the ears and touching the tongue, prayer, and the word 'Ephphatha,' He sighed (ἐστέναξεν, Mk 7²4). Unbelief either in the sufferer or in the multitude seems to have been felt by Jesus as a hindrance to the cure, to which His pity moved Him (cf. Mt 13°8). Soon after, when asked for a sign, He 'sighed deeply in spirit' (ἀναστενάξας τῷ πνεύματι, Mk 8¹²), distracted by His desire to win the nation and His purpose not to use any illegitimate means (cf. the second temptation, Mt 4°). When the Greeks sought an interview with Him, He confessed, 'Now is my soul troubled' (τετά-μακται, Jn 12°1); the possibility of finding faith among the Gentiles, and the necessity of His sacrifice on account of Jewish unbelief, were probably the thoughts that so distressed Him. The knowledge that Judas would betray Him troubled Him in spirit (ἐταράχθη τῷ πνεύματι, Jn 13°1), love, grief, disappointment, indignation struggling together. His emotions in Gethsemane are described in varied phrases by the Evangelists (see Agony). There, as Bengel comments on Jn 12°1, 'concurrebat horror mortis et ardor obedientiæ.'

Besides these descriptions of the Evangelists, we have other indications of the struggles of soul of Jesus. His prayers on other occasions than Gethsemane were probably strenuous efforts to discover and to submit to the Father's will. He discover and to submit to the Father's will. He withdrew for prayer after the first Sabbath of healing in Capernaum (Mk 128), after the cleansing of the leper (Lk 516), and after dismissing the multitude which He had fed (Mk 646). He was prepared by prayer for the choice of the Twelve (Lk 612), and for His willing acceptance of death (Lk 928). But inward conflict arose also from temptation (see TEMPTATION), for 'he was in all points tempted even as we are' (He 418). This points tempted even as we are' (He 415). This experience was not confined to one occasion, for, experience was not confined to one occasion, for, as Luke (4<sup>18</sup>) states, the tempter 'departed from him for a season,' and it is not improbable even that the narratives of the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>, Mk 1<sup>12-13</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1-13</sup>) bring together a series of trials, separated by intervals of time. The language He used shows that He felt as temptations to turn used shows that He felt as temptations to turn from His Divinely appointed path, His mother's appeal at Cana (Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), and Peter's remonstrance at Cæsarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>); and even the request of the Greeks for an interview (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>). Gethsemane must also be regarded as a time of temptation (Mt 26<sup>3</sup>, Mk 14<sup>28</sup>; cf. Lk 22<sup>40</sup>. <sup>46</sup>). His dread of encouraging curiosity or wrong belief by His miracles (Jn 44) came in conflict with His desire to help and comfort; and when the Evangelists call attention to compassion as the motive of His performing a miracle, we may conclude that there had been such a struggle of soul (Mt 14<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>32</sup> 20<sup>34</sup>, Mk 1<sup>41</sup>, Lk 7<sup>13</sup>). So also this feeling of sympathy came in conflict with His desire for rest and privacy (Mt 9<sup>30</sup>, Mk 1<sup>44</sup> 6<sup>31</sup>). His conflict with the scribes and Pharisees regarding Sabbath observance, fasting, ceremonial washing, and intercourse with sinners must have distressed His spirit; for He too would need to face the issue—would He follow custom or conscience? We have more distinct evidence of the inward strain felt by Him, because His regard for Jewish prejudice and exclusiveness in relation to the Gentiles, in order that He might not estrange His countrymen, compelled Him to assume an attitude of aloofness to the Gentiles (the Roman centurion, Mt  $8^{10}$ ; the Syrophoenician mother, Mt  $15^{28}$ ; the Greeks, Jn  $12^{23}$ ).

SUFFERING.—Suffering was not a mere accident in the career of Christ. Neither is it so in the life of any of His true followers. It came to Him in the fulfilment of His Divine mission. Just so must it come to all those who are co-workers with Him in the Kingdom of God. Therefore in the NT the sombre background of physical and spiritual suffering is never absent from the thought of the writers. St. Peter, perhaps more than any other, dwells upon it in its doctrinal and practical aspect, but all were profoundly impressed by the significance of Christ's sufferings, and endeavoured to interpret the tribulations of His followers in the light of His own varied experiences.

1. Concerning the distressing events in the Master's life, the NT gives us warrant for holding to several conclusions. We misinterpret the meaning of Christ's entrance into humanity, if we limit His tribulations merely to the agony of the Passion. The bitter experiences of His last week were typical of the harsh events of His life as a whole. emptying of Himself (Ph 27) to become the humble partner of humanity in its struggle against sin and for holiness, was itself the acme of suffer-ing. The Agony in the Garden and the terrors of the death on the Cross were but the last scenes in the drama of His humiliation. Nor must the intensity of His physical sufferings blind us to the reality of the woes of His spirit. With His Divine sensitiveness to selfishness and disobedience and hard-heartedness and unresponsiveness and sin, how poignant must have been the riefs which His sinless soul endured! For this 'man of sorrows, acquainted with grief' (Is 53°), every day must have been one of crucifixion. Against Him who came to destroy sin was displayed all the violence of which evil was capable. That He must needs suffer in His effort to accomplish His mission was the inevitable consequence of His Messiahship (Ac 262, Lk 2428). But not by His mere sufferings did He redeem humanity. These, in themselves, were not necessary to His office as the 'anointed One,' but were the certain results of the lifework upon which He had entered. Only as He was willing to endure whatever human experiences might come to Him could He reveal the Father and help to turn men to righteousness, by showing them the enormity of sin (He 13<sup>12</sup>). Against Him were displayed the fearful extremes to which sin would go in its effort to overcome good. But by this high discipline was His own spirit cultured (58); and through His heroic, victorious endurance of sin-imposed suffering did He become our High Priest, able to succour those who are tempted (2<sup>17, 18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). In this noble sense are the sufferings of Christ central to His gospel, so that St. Peter can justly call himself a witness of the sufferings of Christ (1 P 51).

2. Nor are the followers of Christ to escape the experiences that came to Him (Jn 1520). See art. SORROW. CHARLES W. RISHELL.

SUMMER ( $\theta \epsilon \rho o s$ , Mt 24<sup>22</sup>, Mk 13<sup>28</sup>, Lk 21<sup>30</sup>).— This term stands in the Gospels for the time of heat as distinguished from  $\chi \epsilon \iota \mu \omega \sigma$ , the season of cold and rain-storms. These terms indicate the great division of the year in the East. Scripture has no special words for 'spring' and 'autumn'; and while the Arab speaks of er-rabia, 'the time of fresh pasture,' and el-kharif, 'the time of gathering' of grapes and other fruits, they are hardly regarded as distinct seasons. Saif was shitta', 'summer and winter,' sum up the year for him. When, in the less frequent showers of early April, the fig-leaves burst out and cover the immature the fig-leaves burst out and cover the immature fruit on the twigs, the days of cloudless sunshine are 'at hand.' These last from April, through the harvest in the end of May, the threshing and winnowing that follow, and the gathering of the fruits in August and September, until the clouds of October herald the coming of rains and cold.

W. Ewing. SUN.—The rising of the sun marks the morning (Mk 162), and its setting the evening (Mk 182, Lk 440). Its light is one of the gifts which the Creator 4**). Its light is one of the gifts which the Creator bestows on all men without distinction (Mt 5**). By 'signs in the sun' (Lk 21**) we are to understand the phenomena of eclipse, as described more clearly in the parallel passages, Mt 24**, Mk 13**. The statement in Lk 23** as to 'the sun being darkened' (AV) or 'the sun's light failing' (RV) at the time of the Crucifixion, cannot be explained in this way, since an eclipse of the sun can happen only at new moon, whereas the Crucifixion took only at new moon, whereas the Crucifixion took place at a Passover, when the moon was full. sun's scorching heat, so destructive to vegetation, is an emblem of tribulation or persecution (Mt 13<sup>6</sup>· <sup>21</sup>), as a emblem of tribulation or persecution (M1 15..., Mk 46. 17). The appearance of the face of Christ at the Transfiguration (Mt 172) and in the opening vision of the Apocalypse (Rev 116) is compared to the brightness of the sun. The same thing is said of the glory in which the righteous shall appear after the final judgment (Mt 1343).

JAMES PATRICK. SUPERNATURAL.—It is generally recognized that this word is difficult to define, and its defini-tions are difficult to defend. The reason of this is simple. It is not a scientific but a popular term, and is therefore liable to the ambiguity and vagueness besetting words which really involve metaphysical considerations, but which have grown into use without any proper discussion of the netaphysical questions involved. The word means that which is beyond or above nature; but the word 'nature' is ambiguous, and it is therefore uncertain what, if anything, corresponds to the word 'supernatural.' In ordinary speech, 'supernatural, would appear to mean anything outside the ordinary course of the phenomenal world. Everything connected with ghosts, for instance, is described as supernatural, and such things as telepathy are said to border on the supernatural. But even in such cases as this the idea attached to the word is not clear. A ghost, let us say, raps on a table, or makes the sound of a carriage driving up to the door. These are perfectly natural and ordinary sounds: they are called 'supernatural' only in the sense that they are produced in an avtravelinery. extraordinary way. And by this is apparently meant that the spiritual or volitional cause of the sounds is in an unusual relation to the material world. A chairman rapping on the table at a meeting, or a cabman driving up to the door, is a spiritual or volitional cause of the sounds produced, but he is in the ordinary relation to matter. the phenomena of telepathy are said to border on the supernatural, because in them effects are produced in a way which the popular mind regards as peculiarly mysterious.

Those who hold that the world was made and Those who hold that the world was made and is ruled by God, have to imagine to themselves in some shape the mode in which God exercises His sway. For ordinary purposes it suffices to treat the world as an independent organization, carried on by laws which are regarded as invariable, and it is unnecessary to refer continually to the Primary Cause of all. This view of the world is harmless enough, but it has the disadvantage of developing an invatarate tendency or habit of thought. by an inveterate tendency or habit of thought, by which the world is set up over against God, as equivalent to 'nature' or the 'natural order'; while all action on the part of God is treated as having the character of disturbance or interference in an order which possesses independent rights, or as being supernatural, in virtue of the fact that it does interfere or disturb. From this habit of mind come all those phrases by which miracles are described as 'suspensions of the order of nature,' and the like. If a person under the influence of this habit of thought meets with the suggestion that miracles are themselves orderly, and illustrate a higher are themselves orderly, and mustians a manual law than that of ordinary experience, he is disquieted, because he thinks that in losing the character of disturbance, miracles lose 'supernatural' character.

Two things are clear in regard to this difficulty: (1) that the source of it lies in the (unverified) dualism between God and the world; (2) that there is a real point involved in the distress of the plain man at what he thinks is an attenuation of the meaning of miracle. We will consider the second point first. It is manifest that if the law which governs miracle differed from that governing ordinary experience, merely in complexity, the distinction of natural and supernatural would disappear; so far the plain man is right. A conjurer does not profess to use any but the most ordinary laws: yet a savage might look upon the common trick of bringing live pigeons out of a hat as a real, creative 'supernatural' act. Some of the language used by critics of miracles and the term 'supernatural' have a tendency to bring these events down to the level of tricks or deceptions. It is said, for instance, that a fuller knowledge of natural processes would lead us to see in the miracle at the wedding-feast at Cana merely an acceleration of such processes, which would quite surrender itself to ordinary methods of interpretation. If this were true, the miracle would cease to be in any sense 'supernatural'; it would be merely a special, imperfectly analyzed case of an ordinary occurrence. This is a real attenuation of the meaning of the word, and the plain man is right in objecting to it. But he is wrong if he objects to it on the ground, expressed or implied, that Divine action is necessarily explosive or disruptive; for this would mean that Divine action is irrational, and that a miracle must be as great a marvel to God as to man. Whatever the appearance of the supernatural to us, to God it must appear rational and orderly. God is the author of nature and its laws. uniformity represents His normal action and will for the world. But nature and its laws have no independent validity or rights as against God. They are entirely at His disposal and under His control. If, for whatever reason, He diverges from what is normal, it will be for sufficient cause. will act in a new way upon the old material, reminding man of the dependence of all upon Him. And the difference between the normal and the abnormal action does not consist in the nature of the laws employed, as if the usual operation of natural law were broken or suspended by some intrusive and alien force; but in the fact that the action of God upon the order of created being is in one case what we expect, in the other widely different. There is no reason why the word 'supernatural,' which will certainly not be driven out of our vocabulary, should not be used as a label for certain characteristic groups of actions and events. It appears necessary to vindicate the freedom of God to take such action: otherwise we subject Him to the tyranny of His own laws. But there is no reason to associate the word with a variety of half-conscious dualistic assumptions, which cannot be defended in theory. See also art. MIRACLES.

SUPERSCRIPTION.—See TITLE ON CROSS.

SUPPER (δείπνον).—The term applied in the time of Christ to the principal meal usually partaken of in the evening, and also to more elaborate collations for the entertainment of guests (weddings, birthdays, arrival and departure of friends or distinguished persons, sheep-shearing, completion of wine-making, funerals, etc.). Invitations were conveyed by slaves (Mt 222. (Guests were welcomed by the host with a kiss (Lk.) 7<sup>23</sup>); their feet were washed by slaves (7<sup>44</sup>); their hair, beards, and sometimes their clothes and feet were anointed with perfumed oil (Lk 738, Jn 124) and garlands of flowers were sometimes provided for the decoration of their heads (Wis 2<sup>n</sup>; Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1)." On formal occasions the guests were arranged at the table by the master of the feast (άρχιτρίκλινοι), usually a friend of the family, according to his conception of their relative social rank, nearness to the host being the mark of honour. Guests commonly reclined on benches (sometimes elaborate and luxurious), three or five to the bench, the feet of each extending behind, and the back of the head of each reaching to the bosom of his neighbour on the left (Jn 13<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>20</sup>). The tables were usually three in number, arranged to form three sides of a square. The guests reclined upon the outside, and the servants ministered from the inside. The left elbow was used for support, while the right hand and arm were free for conveying food. A somewhat formal giving of thanks preceded each meal (εὐλογία, εὐχαριστία). This practice was carefully observed by Jesus and His disciples (Mt 14<sup>19</sup> 15<sup>26</sup> 26<sup>26</sup>, Lk 9<sup>16</sup>, Jn 6<sup>11</sup>). At suppers of the more formal or festive type the host served the guests with equal portions as far as was practicable, where no special honour was to be done to special guests. In the latter case, a double, triple, or even quintuple, or a particularly choice portion was bestowed upon the guest of honour. At less formal suppers the food was cut into small pieces and put into large dishes, from which the guests took them with their fingers and conveyed them to flat cakes of bread which served as plates, where they pulled them to pieces before conveying them to their mouths. Pieces of the bread were used as spoons for dipping gravy from the common dish. Individual knives, forks, and spoons were not used even by the wealthy until long after NT times. The practice of hand-washing immediately before the meal had thus its special appropriate-When women were admitted to suppers of the more formal kind (which was probably unusual), they seem to have sat rather than reclined. was drunk during the meal and after the eating (Mishna, Berakhoth vi. 5 f., cf. viii. 8). giving and hand-washing closed the meal. Thanks-

The ordinary suppers of the well-to-do classes were far less formal. The suppers of the poor were no doubt partaken of without tables or seats, the family sitting, or squatting on the ground, around a skin or mat, and partaking of the plain food (flesh being rarely used) out of common vessels with the fingers. See also artt. FOOD, MEALS, and LAST SUPPER.

ALBERT HENRY NEWMAN.

SUPREMACY.—Few things are more remarkable in the Gospels than the absolute supremacy over nature and man which Christ is represented as both claiming and exercising. In this respect the Synoptics bear, if anything, a more striking witness than the Fourth Gospel. Christ appears from first to last as exercising lordship over matter and natural forces. He heals incurable diseases, stills the storm by a word, multiplies food, withers the barren fig-tree. And, beyond these things, He appears also as supreme over the world of spirits. He calls back the human soul to the body after they have been separated by death. He is acknowledged as lord by the unwilling and undesired testimony of the demons (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>25-26</sup> etc.). Such a supremacy He appears, in the Gospel narrative, to exert without laying any special claim upon it. He accepts, indeed, with praise the confession of the centurion (Mt 8<sup>2-13</sup>), that such authority belongs naturally to Him; yet He does not represent these wonders as being the chief purpose of His ministry. He appeals at times to their evidence; but His most characteristic claim is something even greater and more fundamental.

Christ plainly claims supremacy over the moral nature of man, over human conscience and human destiny—a supremacy extending through all time, and without limitation. His association with or subordination to the Father is not referred to as limiting, but rather as justifying His own claim (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>, Jn 5<sup>10-27</sup>). On His own sole word He reverses human standards of judgment (Mt 5<sup>3-10</sup> 1930, Lk 620-28). He expands, modifies, or abolishes by His own 'I say unto you,' laws or institutions which were admittedly Divine in their origin (Mt 5. 192-29; cf. 722-22). Yet at the same time He refuses to enter into competition with temporal rulers, or to give decisions, as even a prophet might have done, on human matters of dispute (Jn 6<sup>18</sup>, Lk 12<sup>13-14</sup>). His supremacy is too great and too comprehensive for Him to involve Himself in such controversies, which men will learn to settle when they have learned the greater lesson. His words, He asserts, are more lasting than heaven and earth (Mt 242). He proclaims Himself King and Judge of the Kingdom which He is founding. The memof the Kingdom which He is founding. The members of it are His servants, and responsible to Him alone (Mt 24. 25, Mk 13<sup>34-37</sup>, Lk 12<sup>26-45</sup>). But His supremacy extends beyond the limits of His own Kingdom. He claims to be the final Judge of all the nations, to allot the eternal punishment or re-ward of every individual soul (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31-66</sup>; cf. Mk 13<sup>21, 27</sup>, Lk 21<sup>27, 26</sup>). And this universal dominion over both matter and spirit is expressed finally in the tremendous closing verses of Mt., 'All authority hath been given (3000, the aorist of an eternal fact) unto me in heaven and in earth.' It is indeed in this Gospel that the claim of Christ to be King and Judge of all men is stated in the most detailed and vivid manner. But there is no inconsistency with the other Gospels. A similar claim is implied in all; cf. esp. Lk 19<sup>11-27</sup>.

SURPRISE SURPRISE 684

(Gal 6<sup>17</sup>). The descriptions of the nature and office of Christ in the Epistles of the First Imprisonment state and justify this supremacy in the most startling and comprehensive manner. 'In the name of Jesus' all creation must bow; all creation must confess His Lordship (Ph 2<sup>18, 11</sup>). All things have been created through Him and unto Him: creation been created through Him and unto Him: creation not only starts from Him, but converges in Him (Col 1<sup>16-18</sup>). Christ is the 'head of all principality and power' (2<sup>10</sup>). All things are 'in subjection under his feet' (Eph 1<sup>21, 22</sup>).

This supremacy of Christ is again the most characteristic feature of the teaching of the Episite to the Hebrews. Everywhere the eye of the believer is directed to Him (2° 3¹ 4¹⁴ 8¹ 12² ³ 13² ° °). His figure dominates the whole of man's life; and the writer plainly implies that this supremacy is essential and indefeasible.

The same teaching appears in a more pictorial form in the changing scenery of the Apocalypse. Christ receives the homage of all creation (Rev 5<sup>9-14</sup>), He is associated with God the Father in the possession of 'the kingdom of the world' (11<sup>13</sup>), He Himself is 'King of kings and Lord of lords' (1911-16).

Christian worship, Christian art, Christian sufferings are full of the same testimony. Christ is worshipped personally as Lord and God. He is portrayed as universal ruler, bearing the insignia of empire over all the thoughts and needs and works of men. The martyrs incurred the reproach of disloyalty to temporal rulers, nay, even of being enemies to human society, by their unswerving allegiance to Christ as supreme over all human laws and customs. Polycarp, confronted with death, confesses Him as 'Saviour and King.' The narrative of his martyrdom contrasts the brief authority of Jewish and Roman officials with 'the reign of the eternal King, Jesus Christ' (Letter of the Smyrneaus, 21).

The Christ of the Gospels, the Christ of Christof the Gospels, the Christ of Christoff the Christ of Christoff the Christ of Christoff the Christoff t tian experience, must be supreme or nothing at all. The idea of a limited or temporary supremacy is self-contradictory. The Christian conscience, how-ever laggard the will, cannot but confess the justice of the Master's question: 'Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?' (Lk 6**). SURPRISE.—The word has an objective as well as a subjective reference: it means both the act of taking unawares' and 'the emotion caused by anything sudden.' The emotion is closely akin to wonder, 'the state of mind produced by something new, unexpected, or extraordinary'; but sudden emergence is its distinctive characteristic. It may emergence is its distinctive characteristic. It may enter in as an element in disappointment, when hopes are defeated, purposes miscarry, or efforts are frustrated suddenly. When the nature of an object is inexplicable, unintelligible, when the occurrence of an event is unexpected, uncalculated, surprise is felt. It necessarily implies limitation of knowledge, an incapacity of the subject knowing to completely possess and command in thought. ing to completely possess and command in thought the object known. In the objective reference, some instances of surprise, or at least the attempt to surprise, are found in the Gospels. The enemies of Jesus tried to 'catch Him in talk' (Mk 12<sup>13</sup> Lk 11<sup>24</sup>) by the questions they put to Him. They watched Him whether He would heal on the Sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against him' (Lk 67). He had to be constantly on His guard against their malignity. By the treachery of Judas they were able to surprise Him, unprotected by the multitude, in Gethsemane. Peter's denial was in some measure due to his being taken by surprise, even although Jesus had forewarned him. It is in the subjective reference of the term that we are specially interested in reading the Gospels—the surprise Jesus felt and the surprise He caused. So different was Jesus in character, purpose, spirit, from His environment, that He could not always understand it, still less could it understand Him. During His earthly ministry the secrets of all hearts were not laid bare to Him, although He occasionally displayed an extraordinary insight into the thoughts and wishes of others; nor was the veil of the future altogether withdrawn, even although He did, in regard to His own death and resurrection, and the doom of the city which rejected Him, show an exceptional knowledge. But supernatural as in these respects His knowledge was, it was not a Divine omniscience—for which surprise is impossible, as for it there is neither the inexplicable nor the unexpected. The subject of the limitation of Jesus' knowledge is more fully dealt with in the art. KENOSIS. Jesus was surprised by the anxiety felt and the search made for Him by His parents, when He remained behind in the Temple. 'How is it that ye sought me?' (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>); He 'marvelled because of their unbelief' in Nazareth (Mk 6<sup>5</sup>); He was disappointed at the dulness of understanding of His disciples (Mt 15<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>9</sup> 1<sup>1</sup>), and of His hearers in Jerusalem (Jn 8<sup>48</sup>), and at the unbelief of His generation (Mk 8<sup>12</sup>). But, on the other hand, the faith of the centurion (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>) and of the Syrophoenician woman (Mt 15<sup>28</sup>), brought Him glad surprise. The storm on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8<sup>24</sup>) was a surprise to Him even as to His disciples, although His faith was not disturbed as theirs was; so also He knew not that He was sending His disciples into any danger when He dismissed them after the feeding of the five thousand (Mt them after the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14<sup>22</sup>; see the discussion of these two incidents in Adamson's The Mind in Christ, pp. 2–10). He was disappointed in His desire for rest with His disciples (Mk 6<sup>21, 24</sup>), and for secrecy (Mk 7<sup>24, 25</sup>). He expected to find fruit on the barren fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>). Although the growing estrangement of Judas was, from its beginnings, perceived by Him (Jn 6<sup>54</sup>; see Dods' comment in loco in Expositor's Gr. Test. i. p. 750), yet when He called him He did not anticipate his treachery. His state in Gethsemane was one of amazement (Mk state in Gethsemane was one of amazement (Mk 1433); there was an element in the doom He looked forward to that He could not understand, and had not looked for. His amazement is expressed in the cry of desolation on the Cross (Mt 27%). What He then experienced was worse than He had anticipated. As man's sin had ever been a surprise to Him, so was its worst consequence when it fell

Jesus Himself so transcended the world in which He lived, taught, and wrought, that He was constantly a surprise to men. This He Himself exstantly a surprise to men. This He Himself expected (Jn 3<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>20</sup>, <sup>28</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>). The marvel began with Joseph and Mary in the Temple at Simeon's prophecy, and at Jesus' own words (Lk 2<sup>33</sup>, <sup>50</sup>). The multitudes marvelled at His teaching, His healing, His forgiveness of sins, His wisdom in healing, His forgiveness of sins, His wisdom in answering the questions of His opponents, and His grace in preaching the gospel (Mk 12<sup>2.27</sup>, Mt 7<sup>22.28</sup>, Mk 21<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>20.42</sup>, Mt 9<sup>8.32</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>, Lk 9<sup>43</sup> 7<sup>49</sup>, Mt 22<sup>22</sup>, Lk 20<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>23</sup>). His disciples were astonished at His command over the storm (Mk 6<sup>51</sup>), His teaching regarding the rich (Mt 19<sup>25</sup>), and the curse on the fig-tree (Mt 21<sup>20</sup>). His disregard of the current customs caused surprise (Lk 11<sup>23</sup>, Jn 4<sup>27</sup>), as did the SUSANNA SWEAT 685 freedom from these He allowed to His disciples (Mk  $2^{18}$   $7^9$ ). The world's surprise at Jesus is its tribute to His unique perfection; His surprise at man's sin and unbelief the evidence of its need of the grace and truth of the Son of God. further, AMAZEMENT.

SUSANNA (צויקוה, fem. of שויקן, which denotes a lily or any lily-like flower). -All that is known of her is that she was one of the women who ministered to Jesus (Lk 83). The mention of her name without further particulars implies that she was well known. This may have been due to her special devotion, in which case reference to her on other occasions would have been expected, or to her social rank, which view may derive support from the succession of her name to that of Joanna R. W. Moss. (wh. see).

SWADDLING CLOTHES.—The custom of wrapping the newborn infant in bands of cloth (σπαργανόω) has long prevailed, and still exists in the East. This treatment was supposed to make for the strengthening and proper growth of the back and limbs, as well as being convenient for carrying the child. The infant Jesus was not neglected in this particular, though laid in the manger (Lk 2<sup>7, 12</sup>); the absence of swaddling bands being regarded as a sign of extreme poverty or of neglect (cf. Ezk 164). E. B. POLLARD.

SWEARING.—See OATHS.

SWEAT.—The word 'sweat' occurs only in one passage in the NT, namely Lk 22<sup>44</sup>, in the narrative of our Lord's agony in Gethsemane, where we read: 'His sweat became, as it were, great drops of blood falling down upon the ground.' In approaching the discussion of the passage there are problem, (2) the interpretation of the words became, as it were, and (3) the possibility of the phenomenon known as 'bloody sweat' (hæmadrosis).

1. In turning first to the textual question, we find that vv. 43 44 are omitted in many of the best authorities for the text of the NT (the great uncials N*ABRT). A number of other uncials (ESVΓΔII) mark the passage as doubtful; and in the case of Codex N the hand of one corrector has apparently inserted it, while that of another has deleted it. The Church Fathers, Hilary, Jerome, and others bear witness that there were many MSS known to them which did not contain these two verses; and certain MSS insert them in the parallel passage in Mt.'s Gospel, namely after Mt 26.8. Of the Versions, one MS of the Old Latin omits them, as do also the best of the Egyptian, Armenian, and the oldest Syriac versions. Cyril of Alexandria omits the verses in his Homilies on Lk.'s Gospel, while the silence of such writers as Clement of Alexandria and Origen cannot be without significance. One cursive MS (124) omits them, while No. 13 has them inserted by a corrector. In the Greek Lectionaries the verses are generally omitted from the lesson in which they would naturally appear, but are inserted in the Mt. passage, a custom that seems to have influenced Chrysostom in his reference to the passage, though, as WH admit, 'a mere comparison of the parallel narratives of the Evangelists would suffice to suggest to him the reference.' On the other hand, the MSS that include the verses as they stand in Lk. are the following: uncials %*DFGHKLM QUXA, and nearly all cursives. While A omits

the passage, as we have seen, it has the reference section number in the margin, showing that its presence in other MSS must have been known to the scribe. The verses are contained also in the majority of the MSS of the Old Latin, some few Egyptian, the Syr-Pesh and Syr-Hier. They are known also to Justin Martyr (who quotes them in his Dialogue with Trypho, 103), Iren., Jerome, and Augustine. The verses gave rise to much discussion among early writers, some of whom held that they had been wilfully cut out by some who were afraid of their employment by unorthodox writers; though, on the other hand, they constituted a strong weapon of proof against those who denied the reality of our Lord's humanity.

The conclusion to be drawn from this evidence is that the main witness to the presence of the verses is of a Western order; but this need not mean more than that, as is the habit of the Western text of Lk. in particular, many elements of tradition that would otherwise have been lost are contained in it. This is the conclusion to which WH come. Their words are: 'These verses can only be a fragment from the traditions, written or oral, which were, for a while at least, locally current beside the canonical Gospels, and which doubtless included matter of every degree of authenticity and intrinsic value. These verses and the first sentence of 2334 may be safely called the most precious among the remains of this Evangelic tradition which were rescued from oblivion by the scribes of the 2nd century.' Neither do these editors think that there is any evidence of the omission of the verses for doctrinal reasons. It would appear, therefore, as if they stood very much in the same position as does the Pericope Adulteræ; that is, as an early story of the Evangelic tradition that had not found its way into all the copies of the canonical Gospels.

2. The next point to consider is the interpreta-tion of the words 'as it were great drops of blood.' Here again there is a secondary question of reading, because certain manuscripts and versions (NV) Vulg. Boh.) read the genitive of the word rendered 'falling down,' agreeing with the word for 'blood,' and not the nominative in agreement with the word for 'drops,' as do the majority of the authorities. The Greek word  $\theta\rho\delta\mu\beta\sigma$ , either with or without al $\mu\alpha\tau\sigma$ , can itself bear the meaning 'a drop of blood,' and is so used in classical Greek writers see Æsch. Eum. 184; Plato, Crit. 120 A). Tatian in his Diatessaron renders in an exaggerated form, 'like a stream of blood,' which Bernard supposes would be visible in the moonlight.

When Justin quotes the verse he also omits 'of blood'; but this may be because he regarded the word θρόμβοι as bearing that signification. Even when all is said, however, the expression may not mean more than that there was a resemblance between the falling of the heavy drops of perspiration and the plashing of blood gouts from a wound, so that the verse does not absolutely and necessarily assert that blood flowed from our Lord's body in the moment of His extreme anguish.

In a special discussion of the subject by Harnack, that writer maintains that the stamp of Lk. is clearly manifest on the verses in question, and it is to be remembered that it is a very remarkable thing that the only record of this event should occur in the Gospel attributed to the man whom tradition asserts to have been a physician, and whose own language supports the statement. This remarkable phenomenon is the very thing we should expect a physician to take special pains carefully to record. Harnack in the same discussion draws attention to the passage in Jn 12<sup>27-30</sup>, which he regards as that Evangelist's account of the same incident. It is remarkable that while the passage in Lk. speaks of an angel succouring Jesus, the passage account of the same incident. It is remarkable that while the passage in Lk. speaks of an angel succouring Jesus, the passage in the Fourth Gospel tells of a voice from heaven that answered His prayer, which voice was regarded by some of the people as that of an angel. In Harnack's opinion the Fourth Gospel draws its material for the Passion narrative from the Synoptics, and here he thinks we have another version of the story contained in Luke Harnack also reminds us that there are two Tained in Luke. Harrisch also reminds its that there are two points in the Lukais story that would offend orthodox readers, first, the mention of an angel as strengthening our Lord, which might be a strong support to those who exaggerated the importance of angel ministry, and, second, the fact that the agony was the result of an inward struggle, which night be taken as pointing to too great human weakness in our Lord's Person to be consonant with the full maintenance of His Divine mature

3. There has been much discussion as to whether such a thing as a bloody sweat is a possibility, and here we come into the realm of medical evidence. Much has been written on the matter, both in older tlays and up to the present time; a great deal of it, one must admit, being urrelevant. The less critical medical writers of an earlier time were content to quote Galen as their authority for the state ment that sometimes 'the pores are so vastly dilated by a copious and fervent spirit, that even blood issues through them and constitutes a bloody sweat (see R. Mead, Medical Works, 1762, ch. 13). The most recent medical conclusion on the subject The most recent medical conclusion on the subject beens to be that it is physically possible for blood to exude through the sweat glands, as the contiguity of the blood vessels and these glands is so close and oftentimes the walls that divide them are so extremely thin.* It may thus be granted that such an event as the ordinary text describes was a possibility, though nothing very closely allied to it has ever been observed, and one would naturally manifest great caution in accenting the naturally manifest great caution in accepting the historicity of it, in view of all that has already been aid about the passage.

Some writers have understood the phrase 'drops of blood' as a purely figurative one, being simply expressive of the intense agony undergone by the aufferer, and not in any sense to be taken either literally or as even suggesting that the perspira-tion was itself so heavy as to suggest the dripping

There remains one interesting instance of the the of the verb 'sweat' in a passage of the early Christian writing known as the Diduche, where in ch. I we read, 'Let thine alms sweat into thine hands until thou shalt have learned to whom to give.' The words, indeed, are not actually quoted as Christ's, but there can be little question that the author regarded them as a traditional saying of the Lord.

Of the Lord.

SWORD .- In Lk 250 and in some passages in the Apocalypse the word for 'sword' is paupala; else where in the NT it is µdyaipa. The former denoted a weapon used by barbarous nations, especially the Thracians (Livy, xxxi, 39; 'Thracas quoque rompliere ingentis et iper longitudinis, inter objectos undique ramos impediebant'). It thus appears to have been rather a lance or javelin than a sword, and so may reflect the Hebrew romah. In the Syr, of LA 223 the word used is romby, and the phrase is probably a reminiscence of Ps 3713 (LXX). The word μάχαιρα may denote nothing more than a knife or dagger, as in the LXX of Jos 52.5 of flint knives, but also a sword. The people who came to arrest Jesus were armed with awords and clubs: Jesus' followers also had two awords, which Jesus declared to be enough; and one of them (Peter) drew his sword and wounded a servant of the high priest (Mt 267-33, Mk 142-25, Lk 2220-10, Jn 1810, 11 Lk 2228-22, Jn 1810. 11).

In the case of harmophilic persons it seems not only possible but probable. Again, however, the relevancy is not vary apparent.

Metaphorically the sword stands as a symbol for war (to 'fall by the edge of the sword' means to die in war), or for a divided state of society (Mt 1024 I came not to send peace, but a sword '[in Lk 1261 division']). In Mt 2629 They that take the sword shall perish with the sword, 'the sword probably denotes the use of physical force generally, although we have also the belief that a tyrant is despatched with the very weapon which he employs arainst the victums of his tyranny. The expression against the victure of his tyranny The expression in Lk 2. A sword shall pierce through thy own The expression soul, was sometimes interpreted as a prediction of martyrdom (Epiphanus, Har. 78).

BYCAMINE.—The sycamine-tree (outducet) is mentioned in the Gospels only once, viz. in Lk 17.

The Hele cupy, from which the Gr. name seems to be derived, denotes the aycomore, but the sycamine is by general consent identified with the black mulberry (Morus nigra). In his Hebrew NT, Delitzech renders by ms, which is the name given to the mulberry in the Mishna (cf. Arab.

Thus anexies are common in modern Pales. Two apecies are common in modern Palestine, the black mulberry and the white (M. alba). The latter, however, which is cultivated for purposes of sericulture, and whose fruit, owing to its insipidity, was little eaten, was hardly likely to be known in our Lord's time. The black mulberry, on the other hand, yields a compound fruit which, caten fresh, is of fine flavour, and is a great favourite in the East. This tree, which is deciduous, has a dense foliage, and affords a most welcome shade during the heat of summer.

Thomson (LB pp. 23, 24) would identify the sycamine with the sycomore. In support of this view he appeals to the common Hebrew origin of the two names; but his main argument is that the mulberry is more easily plucked up by the roots than any the militers is more using pineked up by the roots than any other tree of the mane use in the country, and the thing is oftener done. Handreds of them are plicked up every year in this victo to, and brought to the rity for firmsort. It is not to be supposed, be adds, that He who spake as man never spoke with the detect that tree, with its shirt, feeble roots, to illustrate the irrematible power of faith.

The argument is plausible, but not conclusive. On the contrary, what weight it has must be laid in the scale against this theory rather than in its support The rooting up of the mulberry tree was a common practice Granted; but was it not from the commonest doings and happenings that our Lord habitually drew His illustrations? When He would find some fit eniblem of the Kingdoni of God, He appealed not to the unusual but to the familiar, not to the heroic but to the homely. One of the marked charms of His tenching is the gift He had of making the common laces of earth speak the language of heaven. When therefore, He would have forth the irresistible power of faith, it need not surprise us that He selected the mulberry tree, the uprooting of which was quite familiar to His hearirs. True, it was more easily plucked up than any other tree of the size that fact does not impure the force of the figure. The law of gravitation is as clearly manifested in the fall of the leaf as in the majestic order of the planets, and the power of faith is as vividly illustrated in the figure of uprooting a mulberry tree by the word of command, as in that of uprooting a sycomore, or even of moving a mountain HUGH DUNCAS

the journey of Jesus from Judæa to Galilee recorded in Jn 4". We learn from v. 5". that He came 'to a city of Samaria called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph: and Jacob's well (πηγή) was there'; v. 11 adds the information that 'the well (φρέαρ)' was 'deep.' Jacob's fountain, referred to here, is one of the undisputed sites of the Gospels. It lies in the mouth of the valley running up between Mts. Ebal and Gerizim to Shechem, 1½ miles E. of the city and about 1100 yds. from the traditional site of Joseph's Tomb (Jos 243"). The source of its water is still uncertain. Probably rainfall and percolation contributed most to the supply. According to Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 32), 'it is possible that the special sacredness and real excellence of the water (on a hot day it is beautifully soft and refreshing) had something to do with' the presence of the woman from Sychar, though it has been suggested that she was fetching water for workmen employed on the adjacent cornlands and not for her own household. Now Sychar lay 'near' Jacob's ground and well, and the problem is whether it should be (1) identified with Shechem, or (2) located at the little hamlet of 'Askar, near the foot of Ebal, about a mile N. of the well and 1½ miles E.N.E. of Nåblus. The balance of expert opinion seems to be in favour of the latter identification.

In support of (1), several considerations have been adduced. (a) Shechem could certainly be roughly described as 'near' Jacob's ground, and the disciples who went to 'the city' to buy bread were away during the whole of the conversation, that is, for some considerable time. Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4831) considers it unlikely that 'the city' which fills such a prominent place in the narrative of Jn 4 should be any other than Shechem. Then (b) Jerome (Ep. 86 and Quazst. Heb. in Gen. 48. 22) states that Sichem and Sichar are one and the same place, and that  $\Sigma v \chi d \rho$  is a copyist's error for  $\Sigma v \chi \ell \mu$ . Cheyne defends Jerome's hypothesis, holding that modern criticism has not disproved its possibility. It has also been urged (c) that the Jews called Shechem Shikor (='drunken') and Sheker (='false')—hence the transition from Shechem to Sychar. It can be added (d) that, for centuries after Jerome's time, his view was adopted by 'pilgrim' writers, among whom may be mentioned Arculf (A.D. 700), Saewulf (c. 1102), Theoderich (1172), Maundeville (1322), and Tuchem of Nurnberg (1480).

But strong objection has been taken to most of these contentions, in favour of (2). (a) Over against Cheyne's expression of opinion as to the likelihood of identification with Shechem may be set the view of G. A. Smith (HGHL 368), that the Evangelist, who had such a good acquaintance with the OT, could not, in face of Gn 33<sup>19</sup> and Jos 24<sup>33</sup>, have substituted (in error) Sychar for Sychem, and that if he possessed only such knowledge of the locality as the OT gave him, he would have used the name \(\text{\text{Dux}}\ellipsi\)(\text{\text{the}}\) (like Stephen in Ac 7<sup>16</sup>). Then (b) Jerome offers no evidence for his identification, and \(\text{\text{Dux}}\ellipsi\) has now been generally adopted as the correct reading. Also Jerome translates Eusebius' note, which separates Sychar from Neapolis (or Shechem), without comment or correction (in Onom. s.v. 'Sychar'). (c) There is no proof whatever that the nicknames 'Shikor' and 'Sheker' were ever given to Shechem (HGHL 369, and Enegc. Bibl. iv. 4830). And (d) in spite of the pilgrims' belief in Jerome, there is clear evidence for Sychar as a separate town, from the 4th cent. onwards.

The evidence just referred to is briefly as follows. Eusebius (Onom. s.v. Συχάρ) writes to the effect that Sychar lay 'before Neapolis, near the piece of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph, where Christ, according to John, held discourse with the Samaritan woman, by the fountain: it is shown to this day.' Jerome simply translates this, adding in place of the last sentence, 'ubi nunc ecclesia fabricata est.' [But see Eusebius' Onom. s.v. Συχέμ and βάλανος Σωιμών, where Shechem is distinguished from Neapolis]. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (c. 330 A.D.) mentions a Sychar distinct from Shechem, and about a Roman mile away—to which testimony must be added that of the Itinerary of Jerusalem (A.D. 333), and later on of the Abbot Daniel (A.D. 1106), of Fetellus (1130), and of John of Würzburg (c. 1165). In the Samaritan Chronicle (not later than the 14th cent.) a town spelt 'Ischar (with initial Aleph) is referred to, 'apparently near Shechem' and the same as Sychar. Finally, the traveller Berggren found the name 'Askar or 'Asgar (with Ayin) given both to a spring and to the whole plain. This name still attaches to the modern village at the foot of Ebal. G. A. Smith (HGHL 371) and Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4831) agree that 'Askar may well have grown out of Suchar—the intermediary form being 'Ischar. There is a parallel in the case of 'Ashkelon, mod. 'Askalan. To this evidence for separating Shechem and Sychar must be added references in the Talmud (noted by Lightfoot) to a place called Suchar or Sichar, a 'fountain of Suchar' and 'a plain of en-Suchar.' The spring and the plain just mentioned can hardly be other than those referred to by Berggren (Reise, ii. 267).

These references and opinions seem to justify the conclusion that St. John's Sychar is the modern 'Askar, with its ruins and fine spring.

SYCOMORE. — The sycomore tree (συκομορέα, Lk 194 only), of which mention is made in the story of Zacchæus, is the Ficus sycomorus. The Gr. name means literally a 'fig-mulberry,' and was bestowed upon it because it yielded a fruit akin to the fig, while its leaves, which are heart-shaped, bore some resemblance to those of the mulberry. In the OT it is called shikmim (1 K 1027 etc.), from which is probably derived the Gr. συκάμινος, though that denotes a quite different tree (see SYCAMINE). The sycomore, which must not be confounded with the British sycamore (Accr pseudo-Platanus), flourishes best in districts having a warm, equable climate. In Palestine it is found principally along the coast and in the low-lying plains around Jericho, and is often planted by the roadside. In the extreme north of Syria it is not met with, as it is not hardy enough to withstand the occasional frosts (Ps 7847). It attains a great size, and its principal branches being long and wide-spreading, and its foliage plentiful, it yields a most delightful shade. It is deciduous, but the old leaves do not fall off till the new ones come out. Its fruit resembles that of the common fig (Ficus carica), but is much smaller, and very much inferior in flavour. It is eaten only by the poorer classes of the population. The 'figs,' of which there are several crops each year, grow on short, leafless stems which spring from the trunk and from the larger branches. The process of ripening is hastened by cutting off the apex of the fruit or making an incision in it (cf. Am 714 where the prophet describes himself as τρερέ οίνα, a 'nipper of sycomore-figs'). The tree is very easily climbed, and its lower branches are a favourite perch for children.

SYMEON.—See SIMEON, No. 2.

SYMPATHY.—The subject of sympathy, considered in its relation to Jesus Christ, is so large as to be almost co-extensive with His whole life and work. The Incarnation and the Atonement, whatever be the exact theological meaning of the two words, are undoubtedly exhibitions of the intense sympathy which resulted not only in the human ministry of Christ, but in the redemption of the world. It is therefore impossible here to treat fully of the sympathy of Christ in its broader aspect. The scope of the present article will be limited to the consideration how far the sympathy of Christ which made the redemption of the world possible was manifested in His dealings as the Son of Man with His fellow-men.

1. The miracles as expressive of sympathy.—
(a) Miracles of healing.—The miracles of healing are truer expressions of the sympathy of Christ to us to-day than they were in the earlier days when miracles were regarded more as a proof of His Divinity than an incident connected with it. The tendency of Biblical critics of late years has been to modify very considerably the scepticism of a generation ago. Especially in reference to cures of disorders of a nervous character, men of science have no hesitation in admitting the power of such a Personality as that of Jesus Christ in dealing with these complaints. Yet this way of regarding the miracles adds greatly to the significance they possess as expressive of human sympathy. The power to perform such acts of healing presupposes a combination of the tenderest sympathy with commanding authority, and it is interesting to consider that some, at least, of these miracles are instances of sympathy according to its etymological meaning (σύν, παθεῦν), and that Christ Himself shared the suffering in the act of relieving it. This idea is suggested by His remark with regard to the healing of certain demoniacs (Mk 929), that the performance of the miracle must be preceded by prayer, and is illustrated in the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 520), when Christ perceived 'that virtue had gone out of him.' According to this view, the healing ministry is not to be regarded as a proof of His Divinity so much as an outcome of it; and in this context it is especially important to notice that He never appears as a mere worker of marvels, but in a larger and grander way as the friend of sufferers, relieving their physical suffering, no less than their sorrows and their sins, by human sympathy.

(b) Nature miracles.—The sympathy of Christ, as revealed in His miracles, was not confined to the relief of physical sufferings occasioned by disease. The feeding of the 5000 (Mk 6<sup>35</sup> etc.) shows sympathy for the ordinary needs of the body; the raising of Jairus' daughter, of the widow's son at Nain, and of Lazarus at Bethany, illustrates His sympathetic interest in family life with all its joys and sorrows. The stilling of the storm (Mk 4<sup>37</sup>) shows His willingness to allay the fears of His disciples in the time of personal danger. Standing in a class by itself among the miracles is the turning of the water into wine (Jn 2), and yet this is an act of especial interest which must be borne in mind. It reminds us that His sympathy extended to a wider range than the mere relief of distress. He who watched the games of the children in the market-place, as they played at weddings and funerals (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 7<sup>32</sup>), and used their games as illustrations in His discourses, entered no less readily into the social pleasures of their elders. The sympathy of Christ was broad enough to cause Him to desire actively to promote social happiness, and to supply not merely the necessaries of life, but the means of enjoying its luxuries

2. Christ's teaching as expressive of sympathy. What Christ showed by His own deeds and actions to be the rightful attitude in dealing with others, He also enunciated clearly in His teaching, which may be regarded as the ethical counterpart of His sympathy. The central feature of Christ's teaching dealt with the 'Kingdom of God,' and the subjects and members of this Kingdom in their relation to one another no less than in their relation to God. The Sermon on the Mount is full of His teaching on this subject. The 'Reign of God' would witness the transmission of the Divine love and sympathy into the various subjects of the Kingdom. The clearest enunciation of the principle is in His 'Golden Rule,' which bids us place ourselves in the position of others in order that we may be guided as to the effect of our actions upon them (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). Combined with this are His various injunctions to be merciful (Mt 5<sup>7</sup>), Lk 630), forgiving (Mt 614, Lk 173), pitiful (Mt 1832), and to show these qualities to enemies as well as to friends (Mt 534). In all these cases the Divine example is adduced as the chief motive. God makes His rain to fall on the evil and on the good, on the just and on the unjust; and His children must be ready to follow His example, to reconcile an offended brother, and to forgive an enemy. The teaching is further illustrated in several of the parables. The unmerciful servant (Mt 18<sup>23-25</sup>) forfeited his claim on God's mercy. Every act of love and kindliness would be revealed in the final separation on the Judgment Day as done to Himself (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 1030) taught the universal brotherhood of man. apart from the artificial distinctions of creed and country; that of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>) shows the Great Father as bestowing the same mercy and forbearance as He would have us display. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), again, inculcates the duty of mercy, while that of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18<sup>9</sup>) was directed against certain who 'despised others.' Such teaching as this is thoroughly in keeping with the life of One whose chief occupation was to go about doing good, and who on the cross prayed for His murderers.

3. Christ's relation to others as expressive of sympathy.—(a) Christ's relation to sinners.—By His friendly attitude towards 'publicans and sinners' He gave a practical expression of His doctrine of mankind, and of the power of human sympathy to reclaim. The great social gathering of outcasts in Capernaum (Mk 2<sup>15-17</sup>), brought together by Levi or Matthew, was a concrete statement of the great truth that a man at his worst is still a man, and a bearer of the Divine image, however that image may have been de-faced by faults of character and actual sin. It was this attitude towards the individual-an attitude so different from the conventional attitude of the religious world of the day—that gave Him power over such a soul as Mary Magdalene. Two classical instances of this power may be quoted, and both from St. Luke's Gospel. One is the feast in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7366.). contrast is pointed between the self-righteous host and the sinful woman who loved much because she had been forgiven much. Christ had come to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance, and so His work lay with the publican, with the harlot, and the poor. The other instance is that of Zacchæus (Lk 19<sup>1-10</sup>). The reclaiming of Zacchæus is an illustration of the fact that a man will tend to assimilate his character to the opinions which others entertain of him. Zacchæus was an outcast only so long as he was treated as an outcast. Jesus reclaimed him not by condoling with by treating him as a friend and an equal. His simple words, 'I will abide at thy house,' seemed to identify Him with the publican, and to acknowledge a brother.

(b) Christ's relation to various people.—His sympathy was not confined to publicans and sinners. He was sorry for the young man whose riches stood between him and life. He could deal with the unbelief of Thomas and the fall of Peter. His heart went out particularly to those who were in any spiritual need, and the conversation with the woman of Samaria shows how the 'doctrine of mankind' rose superior to the superficial cleavages of race, descent, occupation, or even character, and pronounced them all of small account in comparison with that which is common to all humanity a soul. Indeed, as His whole mission was one of self-sacrifice and compassion for the race, it is fitting that the rare instances recorded of His weeping should be for the sorrows of others—at the grave of Lazarus—and for the sufferings of Jerusalem, rather than in the Garden of Gethsemane or for His own sufferings; and that in His death pangs His thoughts should be on the daughters of Jerusalem, on His mother, on the dying robber, and on His murderers, rather than on Himself. It is left to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (4<sup>lk.</sup>) to state plainly the continuing nature of the Divine compassion of the Son of Man: We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly,' etc.

4. Characteristics of Christ's sympathy.—(a) It was universal.—It was not evoked by any one need, but by every need of which the human nature is capable. He could rejoice with them that did rejoice, and weep with them that wept. His presence at festivities of various kinds caused the Pharisees to bestow on Him the title of 'glutton and wine-bibber.' He appears at other times as the patron of family life, sharing alike in its joys and sorrows. Yet amid all this there stands out conspicuously the claim of the outcast, which He expressed Himself by saying that 'the Son of Man was come to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). The call of pain, whether bodily, mental, or spiritual, was especially strong.

(b) It was individual.—There is a vague way of speaking of the work of Christ in the Atonement which does not realize the tender, affectionate, and personal love by which that constant reconciliation is effected. The sympathy of Christ was not merely love of men in masses. He loved the masses, but He loved them because they were made up of individuals. 'He calleth his own sheep by name' (Jn 10<sup>3</sup>). Christ held the master-level to the heige of each one. In the Gardon He key to the being of each one. In the Garden He uttered the one word 'Mary' (Jn 20<sup>16</sup>). Many had called her by that name before, but none with the same revealing and interpreting inflexion. It is true that 'he had compassion on the multitude,' but He had also discriminating, special tenderness for erring Peter and Thomas. He felt for the for erring Peter and Thomas. He felt for the despised and lonely Zacchæus in the sycomore tree. He had compassion on the discomfort of His disciples. He added His tears to those of others by the grave of Lazarus. He called the abashed children to His side. He detected the individual touch of faith: 'Master, the multitude throngs thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? . . . Someone hath touched me' (Lk 8451.).

(c) It was loving and judicious.—Sympathy is not always welcomed by those on whom it is bestowed. When it savours of superiority, it is resented more than scorn. Yet this was never the case with Christ's sympathy. 'He knew what was in man' (Jn 22), and was capable of sympathizing in the full meaning of the word,—of entering into the state of the individual for the time being, and of identifying Himself with it. An interesting question arises on account of the persistent mention of the need for faith on the part of the recipient of His acts of compassion, and it has been asked whether mutual sympathy was the medium of the miraculous cures. Suffice it to say here that the sympathy of Christ was so tactful and so judicious as to inspire confidence, and with it the faith that was needful on the part of the sufferer to co-operate in the work of relief.

(d) It was practical.—Christ did not openly sympathize with the sinner as such on account of the supposed beauty inherent in the sinner's nature, as has been suggested by a recent writer of the æsthetic school (Oscar Wilde, De Profundis, pp. 113-116). He sympathized only with the sinner in whom the germ, at any rate, of repentance was present. Compassion would have been wasted upon the Pharisees; stern treatment was necessary there. They were in the position of a man who suffers from a hidden disease, and must have it represent to himself before he will see operate have it revealed to himself before he will co-operate in effecting a cure. Divine sympathy is a remedy which can operate only when the wound is open.

(e) It was free from mere sentiment.—The sympathy of Christ has nothing in common with a type of modern humanitarian sentiment, which is but a parody of the Divine compassion. There is a tendency to prize feeling qua feeling, and to praise and admire its possessor. There is a kind of sympathy which exists only to palliate sin,—to excuse it on grounds of environment, antecedents, and other causes. Such sympathy rarely does good, and generally leaves the sinner where it finds him. Christ's sympathy was no such exotic, beautiful to look at, too delicate to use. With Him feeling led to this: 'He went about doing good' (Ac 10<sup>36</sup>). With Him sympathy expressed itself in this: 'grace to help in time of need' (He 4<sup>16</sup>).

(f) It was consistent with sinlessness.—There is an idea that it is necessary to have experienced a state of mind to be able to enter into it with proper sympathy, and that it is necessary for us to obtain experimental proof of the power of sin in order to sympathize with those who are under its sway. This was not so with Christ. He could sympathize with the sinner, because He knew what it was to be tempted. He had all the natural appetites of mind and body. 'He suffered being tempted' (He 218). Yet He exhibited a sinless nature by a (He 2<sup>10</sup>). Yet He exhibited a sinless nature by a perfect subjugation of the desire to sin to the will to do right. And the sympathy of Christ is valuable in disproving the fallacy that only the guilty can sympathize with the guilty. 'We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>). See, further, art. PITY.

SYNAGOGUE.—1. The name.—συναγωγή is the Gr. equivalent for the Heb. πς, derived from the rare verb οιρ, of which the radical meaning is to gather. The term means primarily a gathering together of any objects or persons for any purpose, in Scripture an assembly of the members of a local community either for the purpose of worship or for joint action under professedly religious sanctions (Lk 12<sup>11</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>). Thence the word was applied to the building in which such a meeting was held, and in that sense is of frequent occurrence in the NT. For a time the term was current amongst Christians as the designation of their meetings or places of meeting; cf. Ja 2<sup>3</sup>, He 10<sup>28</sup> (Gr.), and such Patristic notices as Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. 18, συναγωγην δὶ οῦτοι καλοῦσι τὴν ἐαυτῶν ἐκκλησίαν καὶ οὐχὶ ἐκκλησίαν. This usage lingered amongst the Ebionites and longer still amongst the Marcionites, but in other quarters a distinction early appeared. Either because of the growing divergence between the two faiths, or because ἐκκλησία was regarded as a better expression of the genius of Christianity with its preference for other than ethnic or racial ideals, the terms 'church' and 'synagogue' ceased to be interchangeable. The two senses of each were retained, as an assembly and a place of assembly; but a strictly Christian or Jewish association was definitely attached to each.

attached to each. 2. Origin and history.—In NT times the institution of the synagogue was popular and widespread, and was believed to date back 'from generations of old' (Ac 15<sup>21</sup>); but few materials are available for assistance in the attempt to trace its actual history, and its origin can only be conjectured. Later traditions (e.g. Pal. Targ. on Ex 18<sup>20</sup>, a Midrash in Pesikta, ed. Buber, 129b) connect it with the primitive times after the settlement in Canaan. During the exile in Babylon, worship at the Temple necessarily ceased, and the conditions of the Captivity have consequently been regarded as a favour-ite soil for the garms of the institution (Wellhausen, IJG<sup>3</sup> 193). But the purposes served by the syna-gogue make it indispensable that some such insti-tution should have been in existence centuries The synagogue was a school and a court of local government before it became pre-eminently a place of worship. In ancient times the scattered peoples might go up to the Temple at the festivals, and in the intervals avail themselves of the local sanctuaries; but as business connexions multi-plied (cf. § 7), the father could no longer be relied upon for the regular instruction of his sons, whilst a centre would have to be found in every village or group of villages for the administration of justice, and for the transaction of the affairs of the community, in subordination to the recognized authority, whether regal or priestly. Hence the germs of the institution are to be sought far back in the exigencies that arose as civilization became more complex; and the Exile marks not the first stage in the origin of the synagogue, but an im-portant modification of its functions, worship be-coming thenceforward the principal though far from the sole occupation, and the administrative functions falling for a time into abeyance. After the Temple was rebuilt, popular usage may well be conceived as temporarily reverting to the previous practice; hence the silence of the later part of the OT, Ps 74s (though Briggs in loc. substitutes 'festivals' for 'synagogues,' whilst retaining the latter term in his lexicon, cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. The containing the only explicit reference. In the OT Apocr. the silence is even more complete; and the post-Maccabean revival of the strong accentuation upon the religious side of the functions of the synagogue was contemporaneous with the revival of interest in the study of the Law at the close of the bitter struggle for national independence.

3. A feature of normal Jewish life.—In the 1st cent. A.D. synagogues abounded wherever a Jewish population was found. In Jerusalem itself the number is variously given as 394 (Bab. Kethub. 105a) or 480 (Jer. Megilla, 73d). The figures are, of course, exaggerated, but are an indication of the degree to which the institution had extended.

In addition, there was a synagogue within the Temple itself, with others for the communities of foreign Jews settled in the city (Ac 6°, cf. 9°°). Galilee was studded with synagogues, as the thickness of its population would lead one to expect. Mention is made in the Gospels of those at Nazareth (Mt 13°4, Mk 6°. Lk 4°0) and at Capernaum (Mk 1°1, Lk 7°, Jn 6°°). It is not improbable that the last-named should be identified with the ruins recently discovered at Tell Hum—one of eloven groups of ruined synagogues found in Northern Galilee and dating in part from the lst cent. (SWP i. 231 f., 252, 397 ff., 401). Agrippa I. built a synagogue at Dora (Jos. Ant. XIX. vl. 3), in imitation of his grandfather's practice elsewhere. The same state of things obtained outside Palestine. In Asia Minor and Greece, St. Paul found synagogues everywhere. Philo speaks of 'thousands of houses of instruction' opened on the Sabbath day (Mangey, ii. 282). And in our Lord's time the synagogue was as common a feature of Jewish life as places of worship are of conventional life in our own country to-day.

**Elite, architecture, equipment.**—Two rules as to the building of synagogues require that they should stand on an elevated site, and, like the Temple, be entered from the east. The Galilæan ruins show that these rules were not followed in ruins show that these rules were not followed in the 1st cent. in Palestine; for the ruins do not occupy prominent positions, and in every instance except one the entrance is from the south. In different countries the local style of architecture was adopted, and there never was any style peculiar to synagogues. In Palestine, as the ruins indicate, Græco-Roman influences can be traced, with an over-elaboration of ornament that was rather Oriental in its character. The building proper consisted of a quadrilateral, divided into three or five aisles by means of two or four rows of pillars. Admission was gained through three doors, in front of which was sometimes a highly decorated portico. Of the equipment the most important item was the press or ark containing the sacred writings. Above it was a canopy, and in front a curtain; and each of the rolls was wrapped in an embroidered cloth. In small synagogues, near the ark, which stood probably against the wall opposite the entrance, was a raised tribunc, furnished with a lectern for the reader and a chair for the speaker (Lk 4<sup>20</sup>). In larger buildings this or the speaker (Lk 4-3). In larger buildings this platform was brought forward nearly to the centre. The chief seats (Mt 236, Mk 1230, Lk 1142 2046) were in front of the platform and ark, or in larger synagogues at the further end of the building, opposite the doors, and in either case faced the congregation, who generally sat on chairs or mats arranged across the building, sometimes lengthways, with an open space between the first ranks on either side. Lamps were a regular part of the furniture, and were probably in use in our period, since two early traditions refer to the oil that was burnt and to the custom of keeping the lamps lighted through the Day of Atonement (Terumoth, xi. 10; Pesachim, iv. 4). The adoption of a screened gallery or even of separate seats for women was a late arrangement, and not the custom in our period. No such rule occurs in the Talmud or other ancient source, whilst the evidence points to the actual participation of women in the synagogal service (cf. JBL, 1898, 111 ff.; and Abrahams, Jew. Life in Mid. Ages, 25 f.), and their qualification to serve in the Diaspora even as dρχισυνάγωγος (REJ vii. 161 ff.), which should not be resolved into a mere title of honour without two officers. The duty of the ruler of the synagogue was not to conduct the service himself, but to choose and invite competent persons for the purpose (cf. Ac 13<sup>15</sup>), and to check any indecorum or disorder (Lk 13<sup>14</sup>). In all probability he was responsible also for the maintenance of the synagogue in good repair, and for the safe keeping of its property. He might or might not be, but probably generally was, one of the elders, who occupied with him the chief seats, and formed together the governing body of the community. The other governing body of the community. The other indispensable official was the attendant (hazzan or υπηρέτης, Lk 420), whose duties were varied and, whenever possible, distributed. He had to prepare the building for the public services, and to announce with a thrice repeated trumpet-blast from the roof the advent of the Sabbaths and other festivals. the course of the services he presented the sacred roll to the reader, and in due course replaced it ceremoniously in the ark. In small congregations he had to read the lesson himself (Bab. Meg. 25b gives an instance at the beginning of the 2nd cent.), and to lead the prayers (Jer. Berakh. 12d). Besides all this, he had to teach the children, and to scourge such culprits as the synagogue, when acting as a court of law, condemned to that punishment. For the faithful discharge of these manifold duties he was treated with special respect (ib. 6a), and classed in rank with one of the grades of scribes. Other officials, where the synagogue was large enough to need them, comprised the administrators and collectors of alms, and the translators of the Scripture lessons from Hebrew into the vernacular of the congregation. In our Saviour's time these offices, where they existed, were honorary, as was probably always the case with the controllers of the charities.

6. The synagogue as a place of worship.— Before the destruction of the Temple the ordinary services were simpler than they afterwards became; but the order followed generally the rule prescribed at a later date in the Mishna (Meg. iv. 3). Of the four principal parts (a) the first was the Shema' (so called from the opening word of Dt 64, which should read 'Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God, the Lord is one,' as cited in Mk 1229), with introductory and closing benedictions. It is true that this verse is cited in the NT without any mention of its liturgical use; but other evidences point to a contrary conclusion. The Shema' comprised altogether Dt 6<sup>4-9</sup> 11<sup>13-21</sup> and Nu 15<sup>37-41</sup>, in which the wearing of frontlets and fringes is prescribed as a symbolic reminder of legal obligations. That these injunctions were interpreted literally by the zealous legalists of our Saviour's time is shown by His references to the wearing of phylacteries (Mt 23°). This practice is difficult to explain except on the assumption that the passages quoted in justification were supposed to be invested with special sanctity. Both customs may be confidently referred to the period of the ascendency of the Hasidim, a century and more before the birth of Chairty and the control of the contro Christ; and the recitation of the Shema with its accompanying ritual was a confession, both of faith in the unity of God and of the imperative obliga-tion to keep His Law. (b) What prayers originally followed the recitation of the Shema', it is impos-sible at present to say. Those adopted at a later time would be inappropriate before the destruction of the Temple, the memory of which colours several of the phrases. From the example of the Baptist in teaching his disciples to pray, and from the request for similar instruction addressed to Jesus (Lk 111), it may be inferred that forms of prayer were not yet familiar to the Jews, and possibly that a disposition towards the adoption of such forms was now arising. Psalms or selections may have been used; but the time had apparently not yet come for anything more. (c) The reading of extracts from the Law and the Prophets was the central part of the synagogal worship on the Sabbath day. That this was customary in NT times appears from many passages (e.g. Lk 4<sup>17</sup>, cf. Ac 13<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>21</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>15</sup>). The sections of the Law were apportioned among several members of the congregation, any male who was acquainted with Hebrew being eligible. Next a passage was read from the Prophets by any one upon whom the choice of the ruler of the synagogue fell. Eventually an efficiel lettimes are secured. ally an official lectionary was adopted, so arranged that the reading of the Pentateuch was completed in a year, the section from the Prophets being selected as far as possible with a view to enforce the lesson of that from the Law; but in the time of Christ the reader of the Prophetic section seems to have been at liberty to select whatever part he liked (Lk 4<sup>17</sup>). (d) With the reading of the Scripture the service proper terminated. Gradually, as Hebrew ceased to be a spoken language, it was found necessary to translate the lessons into Aramaic or Greek or whatever might be the vernacular of the congregation. For this purpose an interpreter (methurgeman) was employed, or the schoolmaster or any competent man amongst the audience acted in his stead. The lesson from the Law was paraphrased verse by verse, that from the Prophets by three verses at a time (Meg. iv. 4). These paraphrases were not literal translations, but rather condensed interpretations, of a passage, and mark an important stage in the history of preaching. The next development was an extended exposition, which was the usage in NT times (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Mk 1<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Lk 6<sup>3</sup>, Jn 18<sup>20</sup>). The instruction was 4<sup>25</sup>, Mk 1<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Lk 6<sup>5</sup>, Jn 18<sup>20</sup>). The instruction was didactic rather than rhetorical, as may be inferred from the sitting posture (Lk 4<sup>20</sup>, cf. Mt 5<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>25</sup>, Jn 8<sup>2</sup>); and though naturally the Rabbis were looked to for such service, they had not yet become a class of professional preachers, but any distinguished stranger (cf. Ac 13<sup>15</sup>), or even any ordinary number of the community wight be invited to dispense. member of the community, might be invited to give an address.

7. The synagogue school.—The OT ideal makes parents responsible for the education of their children, and draws an idyllic picture of the father and the son turning every opportunity to profit for instruction in religion and in duty (Dt 67). Such an arrangement was suitable only to primitive times (cf. § 2); and as trade extended, and the father's absence from home became necessary and frequent, the need of public elementary schools made itself felt. The main idea of the synagogue service was originally instruction rather than worship, for which in its associated forms the Temple was provided, and in its intimate forms privacy could be secured. Not only does the NT make teaching the chief function, but Philo in one place (Mangey, ii. 168) almost protests against synagogues being regarded as other than schools. The adults in their regular services educated themselves in the Law, and strengthened the social as well as the private sense of obligation. The children were gathered regularly for instruction of a similar kind in the synagogue itself or an adjoining room, under the care of the hazzan, or, in larger centres of population, of a professional teacher. For advanced studies and for technical Jewish training, provision was made in some of the towns or near the residence of some distinguished Rabbi; but everywhere the elementary school was an inseparable adjunct of the synagogue. See artt. BOYHOOD (JEWISH), and EDUCATION.

8. The synagogue as a court.—Under the strict conception of a theocracy there can be no distinction between things ecclesiastical and things civil. Hence, in places where the population was preponderantly Jewish, local administration was in the hands of a court, which took cognizance of all the Jewish interests of the neighbourhood, and of which the Roman over-rule was apt to avail itself for both executive and minor judicial business. Where the Jews were outclassed in numbers or influence, the synagogal authority was proportionately reduced, synagogal attributes was proportionately reduced, though without any loss of respect within the Jewish community. If there were several syna gogues in a Jewish town, all were knit together into some kind of organization, under a controlling council which regulated also all the civil affairs of the community. The case of a town with but a single synagogue was simpler, but not radically distinct. Here the council, or local Sanhedrin (Mt 5" 10", Mk 13"), met in the synagogue, where their plans were matured, their decisions taken, and often their penalties exacted. The court proper consisted of twenty-three members where the popu-Intion was considerable, elsewhere of seven; and this college of elders (Lk 7) or rulers (Mt 9 th st.) Lk 8") exercised a wide jurisdiction. For minor offences (Makkoth ni. 1) the penalty was scourging (Mt 10<sup>17</sup> 23<sup>24</sup>, cf. Ac 22<sup>18</sup>, not to be confused with the Roman penalty of scourging of Mt 20<sup>28</sup> and Jn 19<sup>1</sup>), limited to forty stripes save one (cf. 2 Co 11<sup>24</sup>), and administered in the synagogue by the hazzas. Excommunication was the punishment of offences that were thought to imperil the stability of the Jewish community (Lk 6", Jn 9" 12" 16"). See art. EXCOMMUNICATION in vol. i. p. 559".

8. Other uses of the synagogue. — There are indications in early Jewish literature, belonging some of them to the 1st cent., that the synagogue served also the purposes of a public hall or general meeting place, and regulations for its reverent treatment were gradually adopted. Notices re-specting the interests of the community at large, or even of private members, were given there (Baba mesic, 286). It was the place for funeral orations over the death of men of distinction, and at a later period could be used for some of the ceremonies of private mourning (ib.) Josephus says (Vita, 54) that political meetings were held in the synagogues at the time of the war against Rome. They became increasingly a common meeting ground for the Jews of the neighbourhood, where their affairs might be discussed informally or in a summoned assembly, and a variety of matters might be conveniently settled. Thus a socularizing—or, from a Jewish point of view, a communal tendency developed, such as had already shown itself in the case of the courts of the Temple (Mt 211), Mk 1115, Jn 2127, and arrangements had eventually to be made in the interest of decorum. People were forbidden to discuss trifles on the premises of a synagogue, or to walk aimlessly about, to shelter there from the heat or rain, to come in with soiled shoes or garments, or to make a thoroughfare of the courts. Some of these regulations are of a later date than the Gospels, but their necessity arose from habits that were already becoming fixed. The synagogue was not only a place of authoritative instruction in the Law, but the centre of the Jewish life of a district, and, as such, its purposes were determined by both social and racial needs.

10. Financial administration. - Most of the officials of the synagogue were honorary; but the schoolmaster and the attendant would require at least partial support, whilst the cost of erection, with that of repairs and maintenance, must have been considerable, to say nothing of the fees paid at a later period to 'ten unemployed men' as the minimum of a congregation. It is a problem, for the settlement of which sufficient materials are not at present available, how these expenses were met. In some cases a wealthy man, Jew or Centile, wishing to ingratiate himself with the people or out of pure kindness, may have provided a synsgogue (cf. Lk 76; Jos. Ant. x1x, vi. 3). In other cases, though the authorities are not explicit, the synagogue must have been erected by means of a general levy upon the community, and the revenue for its maintenance provided in the same way. The Mishna invests the whole property, including buildings and equipment, in the civic community (Meg. in. 1; Nedarim, v. 5), and classes it thus with the baths and roads of the neighbourhood. But as to the principle on which the necessary moneys were raised, and the means by which payment was enforced, very little is at present known. A set of synagogue accounts from the early part of the 1st cent. would be a discovery of much value.

cent. Would be a discovery of fitted value.

SYNOPTICS, SYNOPTISTS. - The term 'Synoptice' in, according to the universal practice of modern NT scholars, applied to the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, as distinguished from the Gospel of St. John; and these three Evangelists are known as the 'Synoptists,' It is so used because these Gospels are so constructed that, together, they present a synopeus or conspectus of the leading features of the work and teaching of our Lord. From Tatian, in the 2nd cent., to our own day, frequent attempts have been made to exhibit the Canonical Gospels in the form of a Harmony. Such a Harmony usually took the form of a compilation of these accounts of the life of Jesus, arranged in parallel columns, so as to present a complete Gospel, constructed out of the materials aupplied by each Evangelist. The title of Tatian's lost work, the Distensorus (to dia recodous, 'the one by means of four'), illustrates the principle adopted in such Harmonies. In the early Church, and in-deed until the time when the modern view of the mutual relations of the Gospels was first stated by Griesbach in 1774, the example of Tatian was fol lowed, and the Synopsis was made to embrace all four Gospels; some, like Irenous, being led by various reasons, more or less functiul, to lay stress upon the fourfold nature of the Gospel. Modern scholars, however, observed that the Fourth Gospel differed from the others in so many important points as to call for separate treatment. It has been noted, for instance, that while St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, except in their accounts of the closing scenes, relate almost exclusively the Galilwan ministry of Jesus, St. John confines lumselt mainly to His work in Judea — It may be observed, in par-ticular, that the first three Gospels proceed in the main upon a common outline . . . variently filled up and variously interrupted, but which to an be easily traced as running through the middle and largest section of each of their Gospels. These Gospels form, in fact, a group altogether income, in which, while each member has its own distinctive peculiarities, all three are of a common type. See, further, art. Gospels, and the artt. on each of the HEGH II CLEEK.

Her name is mentioned in the Clementine Homilus. (ii. 19, iii. 73) as Justa, and that of her daughter as Bernice.

1. The woman's approach to Christ on her claughter's behalf is remarkable, for (1) Jesus belonged to a race which hated or despised her countrymen, and were hated and despised by them.
(2) He had healed none of her people, and had come into her district not for ministry, but for retirement and rest. (3) She had evidently received no encouragement from the disciples. Yet she comes to Him and addresses Him not as a general philanthropist, but as 8on of David. She had heard about Christ, probably, from some of 'those about Tyre and Sidon' who had waited early on His ministry before the appointment of the Twelve (Mk 3). Her national prejudice against Jesus and a Jewish Messiah had been broken down, her faith in His healing and exercizing power was complete. The incentive to her faith and appeal is maternal love along with sore need. She is in great trouble, and one who has helped others in trial is at hand. She loves her stricken daughter, and warm affection surmounts all barriers.

2. Still more remarkable is our Lord's triple apparent repulss. (1) His allence at first and seeming indifference: "He answered her never a word' (Mt 15<sup>27</sup>) (2) His apparent refusal on account of lack of authority: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (3) His seemingly scornful reproach. "It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to the dogs' (Mt 15", Mk 7"). For this repeated repulse, however, there was a triple reason. (1) Considerahowever, there was a triple reason. (1) Considera-tion for Jews. It was part of God's providential plan to use the Jews for the education and conversion of the world; therefore they must not be needlessly and prematurely alienated from a Christ who was to be a Messiah equally for Jews and for Gentiles. The alienation was destined to come eventually for the nation as a whole, but it must not be hastened and intensified through any sudden process; the extension of the Kingdom must be shown to be natural and inevitable - the proper recompense of a faith in Jehovah which constituted Gentiles genuine sons and daughters of Abraham.
(2) Education of disciples who shared more or less in the national prejudice and exclusiveness. Twelve were to become Apostles to the world, and Christ wished their eventual mission not to be merely imposed by authority, but to be the out-come of inward prompting Accordingly He ex-cites (a) their pity, so as to cause them to become, even if selfishly, intercessors for the woman; t and (b) their admiration, by the manifestation in her of a faith which exceeded that of their own country-(3) Development of the woman's faith and He who 'knew what was in man' saw the strength of the Syrophænician's faith, and He dewired to perfect it (Ja 1) through such trials as, to His discerning insight, she appeared able to bear. He sought to deepen within her that humility which is the condition of exaltation, and to render which is the condition of exaltation, and to render yet warmer that motherly love which had opened her eyes to love Divine. Doubtless, had her faith been less strong, her humility less deep, her love less self-forgetful, He would have dealt more ten-derly with her, so as not to 'break the bruised reed'; but these qualities being already well developed, He braced her character with the cold yet wholesome wind of seeming discouragement.

In the reign of Hadrian, Syria was subdivided into (1) Syria proper, (2) Syro-Phenicia, (3) Syria-Palestinia (Lucian, de 'On 1900' 4). The political division, then officially made, probably followed an already existing popular nomenciature, so that a Syrophoenician may mean simply a Syrian resident in Phonoicia proper (Hastings' DB iv. 602). There is no distinct authority for the possible interpretation, half-Syrian, half-Phonician, although Jus. (vii) 150) is regarded by some as such, and there is an analogy in the use of Libypharsix to denote a mongrel person (Law, xxi. 22).

I Mil 132: 34 where Christ's reply indicates that He understood the disciples to mean, 'Send her away with her entreaty granted.'

3. The comm's triumph and researd.—(iver Christ's silent apathy, as it appeared (Mt 152), she triumphs with renewed supplication; over His seemingly narrow refusal of ministry to an alien she triumphs with lowly worship of Rim as Son of David,—such worship as was withheld by His own countrymen, as a whole; His outwardly harsh description of her as a heathen dog, to whom it was not mest to give the children's bread, she overcomes with the ant rejoinder that the little dogs (surface) under the table eat of the children's crumbs. Her victory is signal. Her faith, like that of the centurion in Mt 8, is attested as great (Mt 1526), and turion in Mt 8, is attested as great (Mt 15°), and the more than willing surrender of Christ is graciously ascribed by Him to herself. 'For this saying go thy way' (Mk 7°). The reward is complete and immediate. 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt'; 'her daughter was made whole from that very hour' (Mt 15°).

The main lemons of this incident are obvious. (1) What the Christian preacher or teacher is tempted to regard as the least promising soil individuals or communities outside the Church's pale—is sometimes that from which the richest harvest is reaped. (2) What men most fear in their life's experience—suffering, adversity, trouble often serves as a straight path to God, often reveals itself as a husk of evil enclosing and concealing a kernel of spiritual bleasing. While sorrow does not always sanctify, but sometimes breeds moroseness or scepticism, still it is Divinely fitted to move us to go to Him who can sympathize and relieve. (3) Warm love towards those near and dear to us, although sometimes leading the heart away from the Creator to idolatry of the creature, is intended and fitted to open the eyes of the soul to the Fatherly mercy of God, to the brotherly sympathy and saving grace of Christ. Love within us discerns, believes in, realizes love outside of us in God, in Christ, and in fellow-men. (4) What men dislike most in a request is among the things that please God best -importunity. This lesson taught us by the record of the miracle is also impressed on us by two of Christ's parables—those of the Midnight Guest (Lk 11<sup>5</sup>) and of the Importunate Widow (18<sup>3</sup>). It is the same leason that was inculcated long before by the suggestive story of Jacob's wrestling, when the patriarch cried, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me' (Gn 32m).

TARERNACLES, FEAST OF.—The Feast of Tabernacles is mentioned in Jn 72. 27. It was the third and the most important of the Jewish festivals, requiring the presence of all males at Jerusalem. It began on the 15th of the seventh month, the month Tishri, and in the time of Christ continued for eight days.

In early times it was called the Feast of Ingathering (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> 34<sup>22</sup>), a name that testifies to its agricultural origin and character. In the time of the Judges it appears as a Canaanitish festival at Shechem (Jg 9<sup>27</sup>), and as an Israelitish festival at Shiloh (21<sup>19</sup>, 1 S 1). It was the occasion that Solomon chose on which to dedicate his Temple (1 K 2). The date given in this chapter, viz. the seventh month, does not correspond with the date of the completion of the Temple as given in 1 K 6<sup>28</sup>, and may be a later insertion giving the date of the Feast as fixed later. From the original character of the Festival, it is obvious that no precise date could be fixed at first. The early legislation in Exodus requires its observance, but does not give its date or duration.

The Deuteronomic Code calls it the Feast of Tabernacles. and date or duration.

The Deuteronomic Code calls it the Feast of Tabernacles, and requires it to be kept seven days, but does not fix a date. It describes it as a day of joy for all, including servant, stranger, and widow (Dt 16135.). In accordance with the sweeping centralization of worship of Deuteronomy, it must be kept at Jerusalem, and we may be sure that this change involved very radical alterations in its character.

The Book of Ezekiel significantly assigns it an exact date

The Book of Ezekiel significantly assigns it an exact case (4523).

The Priests' Code requires (Lv 2333-43) the people celebrating it to dwell in booths to commemorate the fact that their fathers did likewise of necessity as they came out of Egypt. Sacrifices are prescribed (Nu 2912-29), and an eighth day is added. At the time of the promulgation of the Code as the law of the land in post-exilic times, the Feast was kept with the greatest enthusiasm (Neh Si<sup>4ff.</sup>), and as an examination of the Law showed that the dwelling in booths was required, this was done, as an innovation. The early practice had doubtless died out as incongruous with the centralized observance from the time of Deut., but was now restored with a special significance attached to it.

Later Jewish laws added to the regulations, and the Feast was kept at Jerusalem until the destruction of the Temple.
Since then it has remained one of the great feasts of the Jews, although the mode of its observance has suffered changes to accord with modified conditions.

One rite which was observed in NT times was the drawing of water from Siloam, and the pouring of it out as a libation in the presence of the people. This Feast was regarded as the appropriate time for special prayer for abundant rain to ensure a plentiful harvest for the ensuing year. Many hold that this rite and custom furnished our Lord the occasion for using the figure of water for the thirsty, in His invitation on the great day of the Feast (Jn 7<sup>37, 38</sup>). This may have been the case, even though that particular rite was regularly omitted on the eighth day; but the teaching of Jesus seems to be very different, at least from the original thought of the rite on this Feast of Ingathering. It may be only a natural coincidence that an important part of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple on the occasion of this Feast was for answer to prayers for rain, as they should be made statedly thereafter.

TABLE, TABLET (Lk 163 πινακίδιον, 2 Co 35 and He 94 πλάξ).—The word πινακίδιον, not wholly unknown in classical Greek, although it is not commonly used, occurs but once in the NT and not at all in the Septuagint. When it is used in Lk 163 it denotes, in all probability, a wax-covered wooden writing tablet. The ordinary LXX word for 'tablet' or 'table' is the word \*\delta\delta\text{t}, which is found also, as mentioned above, in the NT in two passages. In Is  $30^8$  we find  $\pi \nu \xi lo\nu$  ( $\xi \pi l \pi \nu \xi lo\nu$ ), which is a writing-tablet of box-wood, and in Jer  $17^1$ we have στήθος (ἐπὶ τοῦ στήθους τῆς καρδίας), 'breast,' we have στηθος (επί του στηθους της καρδίας), 'breast,' 'surface.' Both πυξίον and στηθος, however, stand for the Heb. τι', which is the ordinary word for 'tablet' or 'table,' and is used, e.g. in Ex 3118, in reference to the tables of the Law. [1.2] (Is 81), rendered in the AV 'roll,' is in the RV more suitably rendered 'tablet.' Tablets were in almost universal use in the ancient world alike for purposes of correspondence and for literary purposes in general, and were formed of various materials, such as stone, clay, and wood, the wood being sometimes whitewashed, sometimes covered with wax. Bronze also was employed for tablets, at least in some of the countries about the Mediterranean, but seemingly only for such tablets as contained inscriptions of an official nature.

TABOR, MOUNT.—A notable landmark, of rare beauty and symmetry, six miles east of Nazareth, on the north-east arm of the plain of Esdraelon. In the works of Josephus and the Septuagint its designation is Itabyrion; in Polybius, Atabyrion; elsewhere, Thabor. The modern Arabic name identical with the name of the Mount of Olives-is Jebel et Tur. Mount Tabor stands apart, clear and distinct, from the rugged elevations grouped around it, except on its western side, where a low narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Galilee. Its apparent isolation, and its noble domelike contour, rising directly from the level of the Plain, make it the most conspicuous mountain in Lower Its outline varies somewhat when viewed from different positions. As seen from the south and south-west, it resembles the segment of a sphere; from the north-west a truncated cone. Its true figure, according to W. M. Thomson, is an 'elongated oval, the longitudinal diameter running nearly east and west.' Its flattened summit, not easily distinguishable from the levels near its base, is 1400 feet above the average elevation of the plain, and almost 1900 above sea level. Like the hills south and west of it, Tabor is a mass of cretaceous limestone, and the soil on its summit and sides is deep and rich. It is conspicuous among the mountains of this section for its wooded slopes and leafy glades, as well as for its regular form and graceful outline, and yet it is not 'densely wooded,' as some have described it. There are dense clumps of undergrowth in places, but the trees, which for the most part are scrub and evergreen oaks, resemble the growth of an orchard or park rather than of a forest. The summit of the mountain is a flattened platform, oval in outline, and thickly strewn along its outer edges with ruined walls and massive substructions of different periods and styles of architecture.

A tradition as old as the 4th cent. locates the scene of the Transfiguration on Mount Tabor, and until the middle of the 19th cent. this was the generally accepted place of pilgrimage and devotion in commemoration of this event. The earliest references in this connexion are by Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, and others (Cat. xii. 16: Epp. 44 and 86). In the 6th cent., three churches, corresponding to the three tabernacles of Peter (Mk 9<sup>5</sup>), were built on its summit. Saewulf speaks of three monasteries (c. A.D. 1103), which, with later reconstructions by the Crusaders, were destroyed in the 13th century. There is no mention of Mount Tabor in the NT, and no intimation which in any way connects it with the scene of the great Expenses. It is an unquestioned fact, based when Epiphany. It is an unquestioned fact, based upon the statement given above, that Tabor at the date of this occurrence was not a suitable place for a quiet retreat, such as is implied in the narrative of the Evangelists. Apart from this objection, not in itself decisive, all the events immediately associated with it unquestionably took place on or about the southern slope of Mount Hermon (Mt 16<sup>17-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27-28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>19-27</sup>). Of the six days which followed the prophetic declaration of Jesus concerning His approaching sufferings and death, there is no record, but it is in keeping with the entire narrative to assume that they were spent in retirement and prayer. There is no intimation that He passed the momentous hours of this transition period in travel, or that He sought another place in the most densely populated part of Galilee for this crowning manifestation of His Divinity and Messiahship. On the contrary, it is asserted in Mk 930 that Jesus 'passed through Galilee' after He had healed the spirit-possessed child at the foot of the mountain. While, for the reasons given, the time-honoured tradition which connects this 'strange and beautiful mountain' with the Transfiguration has been almost universally abandoned, it is nevertheless true that it was one of the most prominent objects of vision from the outskirts of the early home of Jesus, and its graceful outlines were often before Him, as He journeyed to and fro during the greater part of His public ministry.

THE ENTE. See MONEY.

TALENT.—See MONEY.

TALENTS (PARABLE OF). -In Mt 2514-30 we have the story of a man who went away on a journey into a far country, and entrusted to one of his slaves five talents, to another two, and to another one. The story resembles so closely the parable of the Pounds in Lk 19<sup>11-77</sup> that many scholars have considered them to be different versions of the same parable.

1. It is therefore necessary to begin with an investigation of the relations between the two parables. (a) In the parable of the Talents we have three slaves mentioned, who seem from the expression chosen—'his own slaves'—to stand in a relation of peculiar intimacy to their master. He is, therefore, already familiar with their capacity, and allots the talents he distributes to them in harmony with his knowledge. To the most capable he gives five talents, to one not so capable he entrusts two, and to a third with less ability than either he entrusts one. He does not give them any instruc-tions, since they ought to understand that such large sums of money are not intended to lie idle, but should be used in increasing their master's possessions. As soon as his master has departed, the first servant goes at once and trades with his lord's money. The master is absent for a long lord's money. The master is absent for a long time, so that by legitimate trading the servant doubles the capital he has received. The second exhibits an servant, although of less capacity, exhibits an equal devotion to his lord's interests, and while his capital is smaller, he also succeeds in doubling it. The third servant, however, while he does not squander the money entrusted to him, buries it in the earth, and keeps it safe for his master's return. After a long period has elapsed, the master comes back and reckons with his servants. The first two slaves bring the capital they have originally received and that which they have made by trading. In each case they use the same formula; each receives precisely the same commendation and reward. The third servant is conscious that he must find some excuse for his failure, and he throws the responsibility for it on the character of his master. He is a driving, avaricious man, determined to enrich himself even at the cost of dishonest reaping where others have sown. He was therefore afraid to trade with the money lest misfortune should overtake him, and he lose some or all of the capital entrusted to him. The master, without deigning to justify himself from the harsh character thus given to him, points out that were the slave right in his estimate, he ought at least to have taken the trouble to see that the money was entrusted to the bankers. Lazy as he was, he ought not to have grudged the trouble involved in taking the talent and flinging it down at the banker's, so that the capital might at least have accumulated interest. He is accordingly deprived of his talent, and it is given to him who has ten. And, of course, he cannot enter into the joy of his lord, but from the brilliantly lit banqueting-hall where the feast is held is thrust into the homeless darkness outside the mansion. He has proved himself a useless servant, and the penalty of use-lessness is that his master has no further use for him.

(b) The parable of the Pounds (see art. Pound) has many significant points of contrast with that of the Talents, and the contrasts harmonize with the difference of the situation presupposed. It is in this case not a merchant, but a nobleman, and his object in going to a far country is to receive a kingdom. It is, in fact, held by many that in the parable of the Pounds we have two parables blended together, one of which described how a nobleman was opposed in his efforts to obtain a kingdom by his fellow-citizens, and how, having received the kingdom, he executed vengeance upon them. The other parable went on similar lines to the parable of the Talents, the differences being due either to a difference in the lesson Jesus intended to teach, or to variations of the story that grew up as it was told and retold in the Christian Church. It is, however, important in this connexion to observe that the whole parable is dominated by the idea that it is of a prince that the story speaks. In other words, the situation from which the story of the nobleman starts out is reflected in the details of the story of the servants, some of which, indeed, become intelligible only in the light of it. It is probable that the parable rests on a historical incident, and the view of most interpreters is that it is the journey of Archelaus to Rome to secure his kingdom and the embassy of the Jews to thwart him to which Jesus here alludes. The internal harmony of the story speaks strongly for its unity. In this case the nobleman calls his ten servants and gives each of them a pound. It would, of course, be possible to suppose that, while nobly born, he is in indigent circumstances, and has little money to spare; but this is pro-bably not the real reason why the sum entrusted is so small. In the parable of the Talents we have apparently to do with a merchant whose object is to make money. He therefore entrusts his servants with a large capital in order that they may have ample opportunity for gaining large sums of money. Moreover, he has already tested their capacity in precisely this kind of work. That accounts for the difference in distribution, and for the absence of any command that they should trade with the money. They know their master and his objects too well to doubt what he means them to do. But naturally a nobleman is not a merchant, hence his servants are quite unpractised in commercial enterprise. If, however, he is to receive a kingdom, it will be necessary for him to have men who are skilled in financial administration. He therefore employs the interval of his absence in testing the business capacity of his slaves, in order that he may know whom to appoint to the various offices of State when he comes his kingdom. Accordingly he assigns to each an equal sum of money, that all may have equal advantages and be differentiated according to their zeal and capacity. And inasmuch as his object is not to make money, for he will have ample opportunities of doing that when he receives his kingdom, he does not entrust them with a large but with a siender capital. Fidelity and ability can be tested by the use of slender as well as of large resources. When the servants come back, three of them are specially singled out for men-tion. There is no need to suppose that this is an incongruity in the parable. Ten slaves are, it is true, selected, because there are several offices in the State to be filled, whereas in the case of the merchant only three are chosen, because the capital is more profitably distributed into few than into many hands if the purpose is to make money. It would have been tedious, however, to mention each slave individually in the parable of the Pounds, hence three only are introduced as specimens of the rest. Besides, the parable is subordinated to the aim of teaching its lesson, and attention would have been distracted by the multiplicity of detail, even if ten different lessons could have been drawn from the different conduct of the ten slaves. The vital thing was to bring out the main lessons, and not confuse the broad issues by minute differentia-tions. The first slave tells the prince that his pound had won ten pounds. His zeal and enter-prise win the prince's warm approval, and, since he has been faithful in a very little, he receives authority over ten cities. The second has been authority over ten cities. The second has been less successful, his pound has made only five. He receives a reward proportionate to that of the other; that is, he is set over five cities; but apparently the prince suspects that his relative but to his feebler devotion to his master's interests. Accordingly he meets with a chill reception, and there is no word of approval, but simply the curt indication of the office he is to fill in the govern-When we compare the treatment of the two servants in the sparable of the Talents, the difference becomes significant. In that parable the two slaves have unequal capacity, but they have exhibited the same zeal for their master, and achieved a similar result; that is, each has doubled his capital accordingly they receive the same reward with the same warmth of praise. In the parable of the Pounds the slaves start from an equal position, but achieve an unequal result. They therefore receive an unequal reward, and the commendation given in the one case is withheld in the other. The case of the third servant is substantially the same in both, though with verbal and other differences. It is, of course, obvious that the slave who has received a pound will treat it otherwise than the slave who has received a talent : the large sum is naturally buried in the earth, the *maller one is carefully put by in a napkin. He, too, is deprived of his pound, and it is given, in spite of the protests of the bystanders, to the one who has ten. The parable concludes with the genuinely Oriental trait of the execution of the malcontents who sought to keep the prince out of his kingdom.

It will be clear, then, from this comparison, that the two parables presuppose different situations, each of which is harmoniously worked out in detail, and that each has different lessons to teach. There is, therefore, no substantial reason for assuming that the same original parable has developed into these two very different stories. It is difficult to believe that, had this been the case, the internal consistency of each should have been what it is.

consistency of each should have been what it is.

The above conclusion is due to no harmonistic prejudices, for it may be freely granted that different versions of the mane myings were current in the Church and have been incorporated in our Gospels. But it is a more prejudice, on the other side, to imagine that similarities are always to be accounted for an variants of the similarities are always to be accounted for an variants of the similarities are always to be accounted for an eliberately developed a similar story along these two different lines, just because life thus brought out significantly different lines, just because life thus brought out significantly different lines, just because life thus brought out significantly different lines, just because the troughts out significantly different lines, just because the frequency of the two stories exercised a nutual influence on each other Possibly the words, 'I will set thee over many things,' are an intrusion in the story of the Talents. Apparently the mala portion of the master's capital has already been entirusted to his slaves (v 14), so that there is an incongruity when the five talents are called few things, and that one which he has as to be set is called 'many things. And the incongruity is even greater when the same promise is repeated to the second slave. The total amount is in each case merely a doubting of the original capital, and the contrast between the new point of the burnes has influenced the report. There the contrast between the one pound and the ten cities might well be described in the terms employed in the parable of the Talents. It is, however, possible that here the application determined the form of the story, and that Jesus, or possibly His rejector, is thinking of the contrast between the nearly and the story, and that Jesus, or possibly His rejector, is thinking of the contrast between the nearly and the story and that here the application determined the heaventy reward. In that case the contrast between the neary and the story o

The significance attached to the parts relating to the first two servants has already been pointed out in the course of the comparison. In the parable of the Talents the lesson is, that difference in endowment or opportunity involves no differences in the reward. It is assumed that such differences exist; all that is demanded as that the opportunities afforded should be faithfully employed. Where like faithfulness has been shown, like reward will be given, in spite of the disparity of opportunity and of result. The significance in the parable of the Pounds is different, each starts from the same level, but they reach a very different result. To what the difference is due is not stated, but to a certain extent, at any rate, it seems to be to the comparative slackness of the second servant. The lesson again is that devotion to the master's interests is what counts in the final reward. Another lesson, common to both parables, is that reward for work is more work, but work on a larger scale with ampler opportunities. In the case of the third servant, some of the lessons are quite clear. Slothfulness in the service of the king is the unpardonable sin. The failure to use opportunity is punished by the withdrawal of opportunity and dismissal from the nusster's ser-What further lessons can be drawn out depends on the view we take of the servants excuse. If it really represented his belief, it suggests that unjust thoughts of tool may paralyze a man's action. The servant had constructed a carreature of his master, and teared that his grasp ing avarice might be disappointed if he lost part of the capital in trade; and therefore he felt that his duty was done if he returned it to his master as he received it. But the words of the master. 'Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee,' suggest rather that the fault did not lie with the wrong estimate that he had formed of his master's character, but with the laziness of his disposition. If he was unwilling to trade with it himself, he might at least have taken it to those who would have traded with it and returned it with interest. And, in any case, the slave had his orders, tacitly, it is true, in the parable of the Talents, but explicitly in the parable of the Pounds. The responsibility for misfortune was therefore removed from his shoulders; his duty was to obey orders.

2. The question remains as to the relation between these two parables and the Second Coming. Lk. introduces the parable of the Pounds with the statement that it was occasioned by the approach of Jesus to Jerusalem, and the expectation entertained by His followers that the Messianic Kingdom was immediately to be established. The parable of the Pounds lits that situation in so far as it indicates that the master is going on a distant journey and will be away for a long time, and that the kingdom is to be established only upon his return. The opposition of the Jews to the Messianic claims of Jesus, and the vengeance that is to come upon them at the Parousia, are also suggested. The eschatological colour is not so deep in the parable of the Talents, still it is present. It is, however, noteworthy that the main point of both parables is not the explanation of the delay in the Second Coming. This comes out more clearly in Mt 2448-51. There the unfaithful servant abuses his trust precisely because his lord delays his coming, and there are other closely related say-ings and parables which bear on the need for watchfulness and on the suddenness of the Second Coming. There is no need to suppose that the parables of the Pounds and the Talents are a development of Mk 13<sup>34-37</sup>, or to think that the experience of delay in the early Church created the parables. Even if it be true that Jesus expected to return within a generation, the evidence that He warned His disciples that His absence might be protracted is very strong. Lk. may have accurately stated the occasion of the parable of the Pounds, though there are other parables that would suit better the particular situation.

TARES (ξιζάνια, Mt 1322.; only in this passage in NT and only in Gr. and Lat. authors influenced by the NT; Arab. zaroan ['nausea']; Syr. zizna; Lat. and scientific name, Lolium temulentum ['drunken']).—The bearded darnel, a weed much resembling wheat in its earlier stages, and growing mostly in grain fields. Its area of distribution is wide, embracing Europe, Western Asia, North Africa, India, and Japan. The kernel is black, bitter, and smaller than wheat. As a matter of fact it is poisonous, producing dizziness, sleepiness, nausea, diarrhœa, convulsions, gangrene, and sometimes death; this is due, however, not to the darnel itself, but to the ergot which usually infests it. nel itseif, but to the ergot which usuary micros to it does not harm poultry, for which it is raised and sold in Oriental markets. Though very closely resembling wheat till the grain is headed out, afterwards 'even a child knows the difference'. (Thomson). See Tristram (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 486), and Thomson (LB, vol. ii. pp. 395-397) esp. for an explanation of the common Oriental but unscientific idea that darnel is degenerate

The parable of the Tares and its explanation are found only in Mt 13<sup>24-30, 36-45</sup>. Our interpretation of it is affected by a few exegetical details. In v.<sup>34</sup> the aorist ωμωωθη is significant (as also the aorists in 1823 and 222, and the future in 251) if the use of this tense means that the Kingdom of heaven has been made like, etc., by the course of events, that in the progress of the history it has become like. This ties the parable to the historical situation in which it was spoken, forbidding an exclusive reference to the future; while the fact that it is the Son of Man (=Messiah) who has sown the good seed (cf. v. 37) excludes all reference to the origin of evil in the world. The time of the parable is the time of the question of the servants  $(v.^{27})$ , when the tares had been already recognized as such  $(\ell\phi d\nu\eta, v.^{28})$ . As to  $v.^{28}$ , it is not at all necessary to think that this was a common method of revenge in Jesus' day and country. Thomson did not find a person in Palestine who had ever heard of sowing darnel maliciously. If new to Jesus' hearers, it would emphasize this quite possible malice as extraordinary, unheard-of, and outrageous. In v. \*\* xôpro: means the grassy crop, including all that grew in the field, and was chosen just in order to embrace both tares and wheat. 'Made fruit' does not mean 'produced fruit,' but refers to the period of the formation of the kernel. 'Then,' and not till then, appeared also the tares as tares. V. T and the following verse show that the idea of wheat degenerating into darnel is foreign to the parable; the servants think of mixed seed, the master of an independent sowing of darnel. Still may become wheat (B. Weiss). Weeding wheat (vv. 28.29) is common to-day in Palestine as in America, and has been observed there by Stanley, Thomson, and Robertson Smith; but it must be done either before the milk stage of the wheat, i.e. before it is headed out (impossible in this case on account of the similarity between wheat and darnel in the earlier growth), or later when the kernel has hardened. The reason for this is that any disturbance of the wheat when 'in the milk' is especially harmful to it. So the master will not allow the weeding then, lest the servants pull out and so disturb the roots of the wheat, interlaced as they are with the roots of the darnel. There is no question here of pulling up wheat for darnel by mistake. The darnel has already appeared as darnel, and just on that account comes the servants' question (v. 27). The question of the servants is then, from the point of view of the Galilean agriculturists addressed, an intrinsically foolish one. No one who knew anything about farming would think of removing the darnel at that juncture. The master's reply does not seem strange to the crowd. It is reinforced by their knowledge and common sense. So Jesus gains the approval of the common man to back His teaching. The harvesters of v. (cf. v. ) are different from the servants, although this is merely implied here, and is first inade perfectly clear only in the explanation. It is absolutely necessary to avoid the mingling of the kernels of the darnel and the wheat, lest the bread be poisoned. This may be effected (a) by weeding, (b) by carefully picking out the stalks of darnel one by one from the cut grain, probably the former here (cf. vv. \*\*\* villagrain, probably the former here (cf. vv. \*\*\* villagrain, oulletweep), or (c) by sifting (after threshing) with a sieve so constructed as to allow the smaller darnel seeds to fall through, while retaining the larger wheat. All three methods are used in Palestine to-day. The weeding would trample down the grain, to be sure; but, as to-day in America, it would rise again emough to be cut by the sickle, always used in Palestine; cf. Dt 169 23°, Mk 4°, Rev 14'4-19. It is probable that rd ordrodals in v. 4' is to be taken personally as in 16°. The wdrra, not repeated before robs wacorras, seems to include both under one vinculum; up to this time all, both tares and wheat, have been interpreted as persons (v. \*\*); and, finally, only persons are subject to the final judgment (v. \*\*).

(v. **); and, many, only persons are subject to sinal judgment (v. **a).

The correct interpretation of this parable flows directly from its historical setting. It is a stage in the development of the Kingdom which allows itself to be described (ἀμωιώθη, v. **a) by the story of the Tares. The men addressed, whether the Twelve or the multitudes, were Jews, with the common Jewish ideas of the Messianic Kingdom, and these ideas Jesus was engaged in modifying and spiritualizing. The Sower had been a parable of disillusionment, disclosing that the success of the Messianic Kingdom would not be so universal or immediate as they had fondly imagined, that its method was to be preaching and not cataclysm, that it depended for its spread on its reception in human hearts. The Tares is equally a parable of disillusionment. John the Baptist had at least, publicly and prevailingly, described the Messiah as publicly and prevailingly, described the Messiah as coming for judgment (Mt 3<sup>10-13</sup>), and this was in coming for judgment (Mt 3<sup>10-11</sup>), and this was in perfect accord with the popular anticipation that the Messianic reign would begin with a judgment (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 163-168, 181). But Jesus had not shown any indication of being such a judge, nay He had taken quite another course (Mt 12<sup>15-21</sup>), so that doubt came into the mind even of John the Baptist (11<sup>25</sup>). For the inauguration of the Messianic reign with a judgment the disciples the Messianic reign with a judgment the disciples were eagerly looking. 'On that day' (131) of the parables, or at least a short time before it, the Pharisees had shown their true colours by charging that Jesus cast out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons (12<sup>22-23</sup>). Jesus had indeed given them a solemn warning (v.<sup>23</sup>), but no lightning stroke had destroyed them, and the disciples were disappointed. Their spirit, described in the question of v. 26, was later expressed by James and John (Lk 964.), 'Lord, wilt thou that we bid fire to come down from heaven and consume them?' In this parable Jesus teaches them that the judgment which they momentarily expected, the separation of the sons of the Kingdom and the sons of the Evil One, shall surely come, not now, but at the end of the age, and that meantime the wicked shall continually spring up among the rightcous. This is to be expected, and is to be borne with patience. The parable therefore discloses the fact that, instead of being victorious at one stroke, the progress of the Kingdom is to be continually hindered and hampered (cf. τὰ σκάνδαλα, v.41), till the consummation of the age.

This interpretation leaves unanswered those questions about Church discipline which have made the parable an ecclesiastical battle-ground for centuries, because the parable has nothing to do with such controversies. (1) The field is not the Church, but the world of men (v. 28), the Messiah's world which He is sowing, just as it is in the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Leaven. (2) The Kingdom is not the Church, but the Messianic Kingdom of Jewish expectation. It is extremely doubtful if the Kingdom ever = the Church, certainly never the visible, organized Church. (3) There was no background for the idea of 'Church,' much less of Church discipline, in the disciples' minds at this time. It is only at Csearea Philippi (16<sup>18</sup>) and afterwards (only 18<sup>17</sup>), that Jesus begins to introduce that idea in a very rudimentary way, by what Aramaic word we know not. (4) If the parable refers to Church discipline, it forbids it in toto, while the parable of the Net on a similar interpretation makes it impossible. It is idle to say that it prohibits only the exclusion of masses, and permits that of the very bad, or inculcates a general attitude of mind towards Church discipline. (5) All men are to appear at the Judgment, not merely professing Christians (25<sup>21,23</sup>). (6) The Apostles did not so understand the parable, for they insisted on Church discipline (1 Co 5<sup>2,13</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>2,13</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>2,13</sup>, Rev 2<sup>12,12,23,23</sup>; cf. Mt 18<sup>12,23</sup>). The history of the interpretation of the parable shows that such a use of it was first made by Cyprian during his bishopric (248-258), in support of his theories of the Church. Tertullian, a half century earlier, may have held it. Origen (b. 182, d. 250) knew of this interpretation, but rejected it. Irenœus knew nothing of it. (7) Last and most important, such an interpretation ignores the historical situation, would have been a riddle to the disciples (cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, p. 43), a prophecy with no root in the present; it takes no account of the emphasis in Christ's interpretation, and the master's answer therein (cf. vv. 250-250 with vv. 37-49).

Two objections to the interpretation of the parable proposed in this article deserve attention. (1) In v.<sup>3</sup>, Jesus says that the angels shall gather out of His Kingdom all offences and them that do iniquity, whence it is inferred that the tares were in the Kingdom and not in the world. It is admitted that the word 'Kingdom' is used in this parable in a very loose sense. But this is the universal fact throughout the Synoptics, in proof of which the long controversies in the theological world about its meaning are conclusive (cf. Sanday in Hastings' DB ii. 619 f.). The Kingdom of v.<sup>24</sup>, which the course of events has already made like the field of the following narrative, is a most intangible and indefinable entity, a congeries of truths and principles characteristic of the coming age, which take shape in the world as they embody themselves in the lives of men. In the process of taking shape, the parable tells us, opposition has risen in the world of men which these truths and principles claim as their rightful sphere, and which men expect them to occupy. The sons of the Kingdom (v.<sup>28</sup>) are those who receive these truths and embody them in their lives and conduct. These are sown in the wide field of the world of men, which the Messiah claims as rightfully His—His Kingdom (v.<sup>41</sup>), or, if preferred, which He calls His Kingdom at His coming to claim it as such (cf. Mt 16<sup>28</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, Rev 11<sup>15</sup>; cf. Mt 13<sup>26</sup>). Finally, the Kingdom of their Father (v.<sup>26</sup>, cf. Mt 26<sup>29</sup> 25<sup>24, 46</sup>) is the consummated Kingdom of glory. (2) The related parable of the Net (13<sup>47,50</sup>) is supposed to refer to the discipline of the Church. This is, however, a mistake. (a) The Kingdom is not like the Net; but its principles and history, here especially its consummation, are illustrated by the following story (cf. Mk 4<sup>25</sup>). (b) The explanation of vv.<sup>40</sup> ollays not the slightest emphasis on anything except the consummation.

(c) Those who draw the net and those who separate (c) Those who draw the net and those who separate the good and the bad are the very same persons  $(v.^{48})$ , i.e. the angels  $(v.^{49})$ . (d) The parable, if it relates to Church discipline, makes that absolutely impossible. (e) Its position at the end of the sermon of Mt 13, whether due to Jesus or Mt. or an editor, is an additional proof that its teaching is the same as that of the Tares: i.e. at the end of the target and the good and the of the age, and only then, shall the good and the bad be separated.

The historical criticism of the Gospels gives no assured results here. Holtzmann and Pfleiderer think that the Evangelist has worked over and added new traits to Mk 4<sup>2007</sup>. B. Weiss says that Mt. and Mk. have worked over the same original parable, Mt., however, adding only vv.<sup>25, 27, 28a</sup>. The explanation, as also that of the Sower, is from the Evangelist's hand. Jülicher acknowledges an unrecognizable parable-kernel here, which lies at the bottom of both Mt. and Mk. The parable, as it stands in Mt., is, however, the result of a working over of Mk.'s parable and the original parable, the companion of the Net, while the explanation is from the same editor's hand. Hilgenfeld and Holsten look on Mk.'s parable as a weakened form of the Tares, or a substitute for it. J. Weiss thinks that the idea of gradual development is not in this or its sister parables.

ΤΑΧ (ἀπογράφω, RV 'enrol'), ΤΑΧΙΝΟ (ἀπογραφή, RV 'enrolment'), occur in the Gospels only in Lk 21-5. The words refer to the registration of the 21-5. The words refer to the registration of the inhabitants of Palestine, with a view to levying taxation upon them for Imperial purposes. In the present instance this appears to have been done, not by the usual Roman method of enrolling persons under their place of residence, but by the Jewish method of enumerating them according to the cities and towns with which their families were originally connected. For the enrolment is mentioned in order to explain why Joseph and Mary came from Nazareth to Bethlehem at the time when Jesus was born. The passage would need no further comment, were it not for the historical difficulty that her bear priced in corporation with difficulty that has been raised in connexion with the statement of v.<sup>2</sup> about Quirinius. There was a well-known enrolment (Ac 537) which took place in Judæa under his supervision, after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6 (Jos. Ant. XVII. xiii. 5, XVIII. i. 1); but it has been seriously questioned whether he held an earlier governorship of Syria before the death of Herod the Great, and whether such an enrolment as St. Luke describes really took place at that time. With regard to the first point, it is at that time. With regard to the first point, it is now admitted that Quirinius probably held a post of responsibility in Syria before the governorship which began in A.D. 6 (see Schürer, HJP I. i. 353 ff., and art. QUIRINIUS). With regard to the second point, it has been shown by Sir Wm. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) that, in Egypt at least, enrolments took place every fourteen years, that traces of the same arrangement have been found in other parts of the Empire, and that it may have extended to Palestine. The dates, when traced backwards, would include A.D. 20, A.D. 6, and B.C. 8. If an enrolment were actually due in Palestine in the last-named year, its completion may have been somewhat delayed by the disturbed state of Herod's kingdom, and may have fallen as late as B.C. 6, which is the probable date of the birth of Jesus.

TEACHER.—διδάσκαλος, though strictly meaning 'teacher,' is tr. 'master' by AV throughout the Cospels except in Jn 3<sup>2</sup>. In two other passages besides this, viz. Mt 23<sup>6</sup> and Jn 3<sup>10</sup>, RV gives the correct translation; and in every case where both AV and RV translate 'master,' RVm gives 'teacher' as an alternative reading. In Lk 2.6 διδάσκαλος is rendered 'doctor,' and in Jn 1.36 it is stated to be equivalent in meaning to 'Rabbi' (see artt. RABBI and MASTER).

This was the word by which our Lord was always addressed. Even His enemies admitted His claim to be a teacher. And not only was He recognized as a teacher, but the supremacy of His teaching was, and is, universally acknowledged. His ing was, and is, universally acknowledged. His contemporaries felt His superiority and could not withstand the influence of His teaching, 'for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes' (Mt 7<sup>29</sup>), and 'never man so spake' (Jn 7<sup>46</sup>). In modern times, too, even those who cannot assent to some of the cardinal doctrines of His religion bow before the majesty of His speech, and proclaim Him the greatest moral and religious teacher the world has ever seen. See SUPREMACY.

Christ's great bequest to the world as a teacher is His revelation of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. This twofold message is peculiar to His gospel, and forms the keynote of His teaching. Christ the Teacher is indeed Christ the Revealer. He reveals the truths concerning man's true nature and destiny, and his relation-ship to God; and sheds an ineffable light upon all the dark and perplexing problems of life, death,

But Christ was more than a mere teacher. His teaching is not only instructive: it is also creative. His words do not come with power to the intellect alone: they also appeal to the heart and influence the will. 'They are spirit and they are life' (Jn 6°3). They pass into the soul of man and there quicken and create new life. The discourse with Nicodemus (Jn 3) was intended to emphasize this very fact, that Jesus was not only a Teacher but a Saviour, and that the passport into the Kingdom of God was not mere knowledge, but a new life which demands new birth. Christ is not merely the truth: He is also the life. His truth liberates and saves; and those who receive it into their hearts and minds are thereby raised to a higher and a nobler life of righteousness and holiness, and are endued with power to become 'sons of God' (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). His teaching still exercises this cleansing and life-giving power; and everywhere men in quest of God and salvation re-echo the assertion of St. Peter, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (Jn 668). DUGALD CLARK.

TEACHING OF JESUS .- The place and meaning of knowledge in the Christian religion constitute a question of supreme importance. It has been answered in differing ways in different times and places, and with far-reaching effects, often of the saddest character. Yet the answers have usually been of the nature of instinctive assump-tions rather than results of deliberate investigation into the grave problem involved; indeed, it has seldom been realized that a problem existed. our own day, however, the spread of the mode of thought known as Agnosticism—a term coined in protest against a too confident attitude of gnosis or full knowledge—has helped to bring home the fact and something of the nature of the problem underlying the various bodies of 'doctrine' claiming the authority of Christ. In so stating the case, our thoughts travel back to the final form of the ques-tion," which must control all others, viz., What sort of 'knowledge' did Jesus Himself offer to men, and how is it related to human knowledge in general and to man's religious consciousness as such? Some suggestions towards a true answer may be gained from a study of the terms found in our Gospels as used in this connexion, such as 'know,' 'knowledge,' 'teach,' 'teaching,' 'teacher,' 'mystery,' in the light of their originals, Aramaic and Greek. Here, on the whole, it seems needless to distinguish between Christ's own usage and that of the Evangelists themselves, for these coincide generally. The few exceptions in the Synoptics can be noted incidentally, while the special Johannine usage is treated by itself generally. The few exceptions in the synoptics can be noted incidentally, while the special Johannine usage is treated by itself.

The characteristic Greek term γνῶσις occurs in our Gospels only in Lk 1<sup>π</sup> 'knowledge of salvation,' and 11<sup>m</sup> 'the key of knowledge' (see below); and the intellectual interest connoted by it, as also by 'wisdom' (σοφία) and 'the Wise man,' among the Greeks, is here quite absent (ἐπιστήμη does not occur at all). All this points to the concrete, personal, or experimental nature of the knowledge implied in the religion of the Gospels, as of the OT,—a fact which comes out also in the contexts in which 'know' occurs.

'The OT everywhere assumes that there is such a thing as the knowledge of God, but it is never speculative, and it is never achieved by man. God is known because He makes Himself known, and He makes Himself known in His character. Hence the knowledge of God is in the OT = true religion; and as it is of God's grace that He appears from the beginning speaking, commanding, active, so as to be known for what He is, so the reception of the knowledge of God is ethically conditioned.

It is in this sense of an experimental acquaintance with God's character, and a life determined by it, that a universal knowledge of God is made the chief blessing of the Messianic age.

Side by side with this practical knowledge of God, the OT makes room for any degree of speculative agnosticism. This is especially brought out in the Book of Job (Hastings' DB ii. 8f.).

The distinction between gradual experimental recognition (γινώσκειν, ἐπιγινώσκειν) and the actual possession of knowledge (εἰδέσω) is well preserved; c.g. in Jn 147 'If ye had come to recognize me (in my true character), ye would have had knowledge of my Father also.' Corresponding to the ethical quality of the knowledge acquired by growing personal receptivity is the nature of the 'teaching' 'κ' (διδαχή), as defined by the contexts in which this term and its verb stand; c.g. Mt 728 'The crowds were exceedingly astonished at his teaching; for he was teaching them as having authority, and not as their scribes' (after Sermon on the Mount). Finally, the fact that Jesus was habitually addressed as 'Rabbi,' and so treated, suggests that He dealt with the same subject-matter as the official 'teachers' of the Jewish Law (Tôrah), viz. the sort of conduct pleasing to the God of Israel (cf. Mt 517-20), though He differed in going behind the act to the motive, and in setting this in the light of the Father's character. There was, we may be sure, a certain fitness in the plausible compliment, as coming even from Pharisaic lips, 'Rabbi, . . . of a truth thou teachest the way of God' (Mk 1214 ||, cf. 1228). We do well, then, to approach the meaning of 'knowledge' and 'teaching' in the Gospels through the senses which these terms hore in contemporary Judaism. Philo describes Jews as 'taught . . ., even long before the sacred laws and also the unwritten usages, to recognize as one God the Father and Creator of the world' (Legatio ad Gaium, 16). Here we have a starting-point for consideration of the knowledge Jesus offered to impart, as regards its substance.

i. The Synoptic Gospels.—Jesus' own knowledge was rooted in the essential teaching of the OT, interpreted by a unique religious experience, which even in childhood enabled Him to make marvellous use of its contents (Lk 2461,), and which developed as a 'wisdom' that matured with His years (v. 22). The determinative element in it was a consciousness of the God of Israel as His Father in a peculiarly intimate personal sense. Through this the OT revelation, as written and as currently taught, was gradually filtered, until only those elements and interpretations remained effective in His mind and speech which were valid in the light of the idea of the Holy Father and His practical relations with men. Thus the 'sacred laws' of Mosaism were transmuted into 'the teaching' of Jesus, the Messiah, with its new spirit and fresh emphasis. But the lines of the new were continuous with the old as regards the primarily practical reference of the new teaching, which superseded that of the scribes of the Pharisaic school, then dominant (Mk 1<sup>22, 27</sup> 2<sup>16, 18</sup>). Thus the 'knowledge' which Jesus aimed at imparting in His 'teaching' was analogous in scope to that recognized as such in current Palestinian Judaism, and bore essentially on true piety conceived as doing the will of God' (Mk 335). But the form of its presentation, and much of its resulting spirit, were largely determined by two features peculiar to Jesus as a teacher: (a) a note of fresh, personal authority, in contrast to the derivative authority claimed by the scribes (Mk 1<sup>22</sup>); (b) constant reference to 'the kingdom of heaven,' the true Theocracy for which Israel had long been waiting and watching, in connexion with Messiah, its Divinely commissioned Inaugurator. John the Baptist had spoken of such a Theocracy as imminent. Yet so little had he realized the spiritual experience proper to it in its fulness, that Jesus, even in the act of recognizing John's supremacy in the order of prophets, can declare that 'He that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt  $11^{11}$ , Lk  $7^{28}$ ). The Messianic Kingdom, then, is bound up in a unique manner with Jesus Himself as its Announcer ( $\kappa \eta \rho \nu \sigma \sigma \omega r$ ) and Legislator (διδάσκων)—the two aspects in which He conveys 'knowledge' of it, and so of religion as it is known to the Gospels.

'knowledge' of it, and so of religion as it is known to the Gospels.

Wellhausen, indeed, roundly denies this (*Binleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, 1.06, 106 ff.): 'From the Kingdom as present, Jesus as already constituted (*agewesener*) and present Messiah is inseparable; accordingly He cannot Himself have spoken of it. . . . In Mark He speaks only of the future Kingdom; but He does not say that He is to bring it. . . . It is thought that the declaration of this fu' re Kingdom was actually the proper content of His preaching. Far from this, it recedes completely into the background in Mark. In the Galilean period He does not as a rule preach at all, but He teaches: and indeed not about the Kingdom of God (which doe not occur at all, save in the addition 490-39), but, in unconstrained succession, touching this and that matter which comes in His way: obvious truths, with reference to the needs of a general public, which is misled by its spiritual leaders' (p. 106). As regards the Kingdom of God, the idea of which He could assume as present to His hearers' minds, 'He emphasized in any case warning more than promise. . . He began not with allusions to blessings (Giukewiuschen und Seligpreisungen), but with the preaching of penitence: The Kingdom of God is at hand, repent! Like Amos before Him, and like John the Baptist, He thereby protested against the illusion of the Jews, as though to them the Judgment were bound to bring the fulfilment of their wishes' (107 f.). Wellhausen goes on to question whether the phrase 'the gospel' was ever found on Jesus' own lips, since even in Mark 'the gospel is tantamount to Christianity,' i.e. what the Church came to understand as the purport of its Master's life and death. Here Wellh, seems to take 'gospel' in too rigid and uniform a sense, rather than as 'good tidings' which may vary in connotation. In any case, it is one thing to argue that the Evangelists have made Jesus use a phrase proper to their age, not His (vet Is 611, in view of Mt 11s, Lk 72s. C. 418, makes His which by no means took from the force of the summons to repentance for sins, now seen more clearly in the purer light. So we read in Mk 6<sup>12</sup>, even after much of the Galilman teaching was already given, that the Apostles 'went out and preached that men should repent' (Wellh. l.c. p. 112, questions even whether there were any 'apostles' during Jesus' lifetime). The spirit of the above distinction is finely given by Longfellow's lines (cited in Sir A. F. Hort's Com. on Mk 1<sup>15</sup>):

'A voice by Jordan's shore, A summons stern and clear: Repent! be just, and sin no more! God's judgment draweth near!

A voice by Galilee, A holier voice I hear: Love God, thy neighbour love! for see God's mercy draweth near.

The idea of the Kingdom necessarily determines the sense and emphasis given to 'repentance' in relation to it; and as 'righteouness' meant to Jesus something very different from what it did on John's lips, so with their respective teaching as what it did on John ships, so with the large country so to 'the Kingdom.'

As to the 'future' and 'present' Kingdom, surely on Jesus' idea of the essentially spiritual nature of the Kingdom this distinction loses its full force; where the righteousness of the Kingdom is, there is the Kingdom already in a real sense.

As 'preaching' the Kingdom, He declares the fact of its near advent, so 'giving knowledge of salvation' as yet nearer than John's preaching was able to announce (Lk 17). Reception of such knowledge meant repentance for sins as unfitting the sinner for membership in the Kingdom soon to 'appear,' and confidence in the forgiveness which was part of the expected Messianic blessings. Then as 'teaching,' He gave knowledge of the laws and principles of the coming era of the Father's realized sovereignty. Relying on this teaching and obeying its precepts, the man who accepted the 'preaching' of the Kingdom as at hand was assured of participation therein when it arrived. Of such 'teaching' the Sermon on the Mount is the summarized expression (Mt 725). It represents 'the key of knowledge' touching God's will, as it should be done in the true Theocracy or Kingdom, which the official guardians of the Law had removed out of men's reach by their traditions (Lk 112). But the same knowledge was also given less fully and formally, in occasional and piecemeal fashion, in the 'teaching' Jesus was wont in His earlier ministry to give at the Sabbath services in synagogues of Galilee, in close connexion with the reading of the Law and its regular exposition (Mk 126, Lk 415; cf. v. 43 for 'preaching' also), as well as on other and less formal occasions. Its main subject 'would seem to have been the nature of the Kingdom and the character required in its members '(Sanday), treated in the light of the Fatherhood of God

At first, moreover, His own Person formed no part of His explicit teaching. Apparently the practical recognition of His plenary authority as Revealer of the Kingdom and the truths constitutive of it, enforced by the object-lesson of His deeds (Lk 10<sup>28, 24</sup>) of beneficent authority in the healing of the body and soul (see Mk 2<sup>6-12</sup>), was what Jesus had most at heart in the earlier stage of His ministry at least. What went beyond this was allusive and suggestive rather than dogmatic, being contained in the title by which, in preference to all others, He chose from first to last to refer to Himself and His ways—'the Son of 'Man.' The sense which He gave to it, as distinct from the associations currently attaching to it in various circles of Judaism, seems to be chiefly 'brotherhood with toiling and struggling humanity, which He who most thoroughly accepted its conditions was fittest also to save' (Sanday). It was only as criticism and challenge forced Him to fall back upon His ultimate and inner credentials, that He referred explicitly to His mysteriously unique experience of Sonship to the Father as the ground of the revelation He imparted in His teaching—particularly as to the Divine Fatherhood which lay

In this we get some insight into one of the most significant features of Christ's teaching, viz. His pedagogic method, which implied that religious knowledge is not to be thought of or taught as if it were all on one level, or as if it were of little moment how it is imparted and acquired. In other words, nothing is more characteristic of 'truth as it is in Jesus' than the psychological conditions under which it should be learned, by progressive assimilation, as the learner is able to bear it. His was the experimental method of religious knowledge, to a degree surpassing all other teachers. This fact comes out in several connexions,* of which His use of parables deserves special notice.

As regards Jesus' use of the parable proper, as distinct from mere figurative maxims or illustrations, it is often strangely overlooked that the Gospels do not represent it as a form of communicating religious knowledge employed by Jesus from the first. In fact it emerges relatively late in His ministry, when already He had proved the general unreceptiveness of His hearers and the positive hostility of their official teachers. This appears not only from the first occasion on which, in the relatively historical order preserved in Mk., Jesus is said to have 'taught in parables' (Mk 42, Mt 138; Mk 323, Lk 536 630 do not prove the contrary), but also from the fact that His disciples ask Him as to the meaning of the first recorded parable, plain as its meaning is to us (Mk 410.18). Further, that meaning is one which implies a disappointing experience of various types of hearer,—the good being the first. In fact it emerges relatively late in His perience of various types of hearer,—the good being in the minority,—such as suits a comparatively prolonged period of experiment, during which Jesus had proved how unprepared the majority of His countrymen were to embrace the Kingdom as He countrymen were to embrace the Kingdom as He meant it. In fact the psychological moment at which He began His full parabolic method on principle, was just that depicted in Mark's narrative (cf. Latham, op. cit. p. 324). Already the Scribes, both local (26.16) and from the religious centre in Jerusalem (322), the Pharisees generally (218.24 36), and even the disciples of John,—presumably a specially prepared class,—had indicated pretty clearly that their attitude was likely to be unreceptive. Thus we read in Mk 37 of His withdrawing from before Pharisaic hostility—which already felt that He must be got rid of at any cost (v.*) felt that He must be got rid of at any cost (v.6)with His circle of disciples, from the synagogue and the city, where friction was likely, to the seashore, there to continue His effort to win the unsophisticated hearts of the common people. Then follows the selection of the Twelve from the larger body of disciples habitually about Him, with a view to their acting as 'apostles' or missionaries, to assist in what was opening out before Him as a longer and more arduous ministry than had, per-haps, at first seemed needful. That in itself is significant; and its significance is enhanced by the scene which precedes the first parables, when He dwells on the spiritual ties binding Him to the disciples, in contrast even to His own blood rela-tions. All this implies that Jesus fell back, as it were, upon the parabolic teaching which we regard as so beautifully characteristic of Him, largely under the necessity of adjusting the form of His teaching, for deep spiritual reasons, to the disappointing unreceptivity of His hearers generally. Nor was the state of His disciples much better in point of intelligence, though their practical self-committal to Him as their trusted authority and teacher implied a moral affinity of great latent possibility for future insight and knowledge. This comes out most clearly in Mark's narrative, which, throughout the chapter on the beginnings of parabolic teaching, preserves the original historic atmosphere to a degree far surpassing what the other Evangelists, owing to their later perspective, particularly as regards the intelligence at that time of Christ's personal disciples (see Mk 4<sup>13</sup>, omitted by Mt. and Lk.), have been able to achieve.

Mt. and Lk.), have been able to achieve.

Observe the following, compared with the parallel passages in Mt. and Lk.: 'He proceeded to teach them in parables monthings, and to say to them in his teaching, Listen (Mk 43).

He who has ears to listen, let him listen (v. 9). . . . And he went on to say to them 's (that the light of the lamp is meant to be seen, and so), there is nothing hidden except with a view to its being ultimately made manifest. . . . If any one hath cars to listen, let him listen (v. 31-23). And he went on to say to them, See to it what ye hear (= understand, cf. Lk 818 'how ye hear'). According to the capacity of the measure ye use, it shall be meted out to you, and with interest (*poperstificitati vipin, cf. Mt 1312 2529 mai **superstificitati vipin, cf. Mt 1312 2529 mai **superstificitati vipin, and he who hath not (by unreceptiveness), even that which he hath (through his ears merely, cf. Lk 818 'what he supposes he hath') shall be taken from him' (Mk 424-29). Then, after two more parables, the read: 'And with such parables, and many of them, he used to speak to them the word just as they were able to listen; but without parable used he not to speak to them, whilst privately to his own disciples he used to resolve (the meaning of) all things' (v. 335).

Running throughout the whole account in Mk.

Running throughout the whole account in Mk. is a single coherent conception of the function of parable as a vehicle of religious knowledge, viz. that it is a sort of veil spread over the face of truth, in order that only those who are morally ready to act aright in regard to it shall perceive its Divine lineaments. This implies (a) that it is bad for a man to see the truth in the wrong, i.e. unsympathetic, mood, and (b) that it is the special nature of spiritual or religious knowledge to be morally conditioned in its communication. Accordingly it can be received, in the sense alone valued by Jesus, only gradually, by successive acts of use or vital obedience. But the teacher's ulterior object in parable, as in plainer modes of speech (as the context of the simile of casting pearls before swine helps to make clear, Mt 7<sup>6n</sup>.), was that as many, not as few, as possible of the average hearers addressed might, by secking and its discipline, come to find aright, instead of resting in imaginary possession of a knowledge that was really error. The treasure of knowledge real spiritual quest; it was a 'secret,' to be shared in only by awakened curiosity and desire. What is received too easily is held loosely; or rather, in the case of spiritual truth, it is not received at all, when taken passively and not by the activity that is also self-committal; or, again, it is received in so crude a sense-what comes from without being overlaid or distorted by what already exists within—that it had better not be received at all in this The remedy is that the reception should be gradual, through a process of piecemeal and even painful adjustment of the mind and will of the hearer to the essential form of the truth en-shrined in the message or teaching. Then, what is so won becomes the basis of fresh discoveries of the same kind. In this beneficent yet deeply serious sense Jesus 'was wont to speak the word' to men 'just as they were able to listen to it.

Such seems the philosophy of Christ's parabolic teaching, when we regard the trend of this fundamental section and the general effect of His teaching in the Gospels. But what are we to make of the motive assigned to it in Mk 412 'That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn again and it should be forgiven them?? Can we believe that in these words—if read in the sense of a 'judicial blinding'—we have a quotation from Jesus' lips uncoloured by the tradition lying between Him and the Gospel records? Hardly. The saying is an isolated one in the Synoptics. But a like use of the passage in Isaiah (6<sup>92</sup>) here drawn upon, occurs in Ac 28<sup>25-27</sup>, in an address to leading Roman Jews, and in Jn 12<sup>33, 40</sup>, which contains the reflexions of the Evangelist himself. Here we seem to have the clue to the 'paradox' as some would call it, 'incompatibility' as it will seem to others. That is, Jesus' own use of Isaiah's language underwent development in the Church's tradition, being first reapplied to specific Jewish unbelief (as in Acts), and then hardened in its spirit \* (as in Jn.). The conclusive thing appears to be this. Not only are the words virtually quoted from Is 6<sup>9t</sup>, but they are not given uniformly in the other Synoptics. Then it is only in the anti-Judaic reflexions in Jn. that the sense of judicial blindness is given to them at all, by a deliberate change of form, which attri-butes the blinding and dulling of hearing to direct Divine action. It seems natural, then, to assume that Jesus simply made an allusive use of the phraseology of Is 6°, so far as it lent itself to His purpose; and that in the Church's tradition this reference was taken up, fully applied, and even, as in Jn 1240, emphasized in an anti-Jewish direction. Here Mk. shows us the first stage in the tradition, at which the regret with which Jesus contemplates the inevitable effect of the law that unreceptiveness tends to become a fixed habit, is apparent in the quick transition to 'lest haply they should turn back and forgiveness should be theirs'  $(d\phi\epsilon\theta\hat{\eta})$ αὐτοῖs, an adaptation of Isaiah's ἰάσομαι αὐτούs on Jahweh's behalf). Against this the telic 'with a view to' ([va]) cannot weigh decisively, since its exact degree of purposiveness is not always the same. Here it may well be no more than a recognition of the providential nature of the law of moral continuity, as well as of those inevitable effects which Jesus knew to be involved in His deliberate resort to parabolic teaching, t in place of plainer proclamation, touching the Kingdom—its inner and gradual operation, and its fortunes, especially in the near future. Further, the less severe reading seems required by what follows in Mk 421-23, viz. that the object of the light's coming is to be seen; and any temporary 'covering' or 'hiding' is all meant to be subservient to this. All is simply adjusted to existing ability to hear (Mk 433).

Why then, it may be asked, resort to this obscurer form of instruction? Because He was now passing on to a new side or aspect of His teaching. Henceforth the more unambiguous form of declaration would have met immediately with a summary rejection ‡ so decisive as to jeopardize the very completion of His own ministry and cut short the training of His disciples, the actual nucleus of the coming Kingdom, on whom its future realization depended. The popular receptivity towards such a Kingdom as Jesus had in mind, one radically spiritual,—as distinct from national and hedonistic,—had already been tested by clear enunciation of its ethical nature and requirements; and but few had definitely responded. That was the daunting experience which had been His for some months at least, months of such ethical intensity for all within range of His influence as to mean more than as many years of the ordinary testing of life. Already He saw that His lot was to be akin to that of the prophets of old, who achieved their mission only after and through a period of general rejection, during which disciples learned their message vitally, and then helped in the conversion of Israel. But while this was the case on the whole, there were still individuals to be gained over one by one to the 'little flock' of His disciples, if only they had time to ponder the new ideal of the Kingdom as coming only gradually, from a very small nucleus (Mk 4<sup>25-23</sup>). Elect souls could do so nost profitably under the very stimulus of curiosity aroused by the parabolic or suggestive method, regarded on its positive side; while for the impatient mass it had only its negative function, veiling the full truth from the profane gaze of those insensible as swine to the real charm of pearls—and apt, when disappointed, to turn like swine and rend the bearer of jewels. Hence Jesus spoke His parables publicly, to call such prepared or preparing souls, as well as to instruct His own inner circle in the deeper or more trying aspects of the Kingdom they had already in principle and at heart received. For this seems the point of Mark's 'To you the secret " (mystery) hath been given, touching the kingdom of God' (v. 11). Disciples as such had the qualifying 'secret' in their souls, the key to further understanding in the detailed knowledge of the Kingdom. It is rather this latter that Mt. and Lk. have in mind in writing (according to the form of the saying most familiar to them), 'to you it hath been given to recognize the secrets (mysteries) of the kingdom.' This probably represents a later turn given to the original thought as found in Mk., the truth of which is borne out by what follows at once in Mt 1312 he that hath, to him shall be given,' etc. Here the possession that is the basis for further additions, must be primarily the recognition of the Kingdom in principle. When this fundamental issue, as conditioned by the original historic situation, faded more and more into the background, and various detailed aspects of the Kingdom came practically to the front in the Church's experience, it was natural that the saying should be coloured thereby and its shade of meaning changed. Further, we can see how the later form would lend itself to the growing reflective tendency which showed itself in Gnosticism, a mode of thought alike unbiblical and un-Jewish in spirit, but akin to Greek intellectualism or one-sided reliance on 'knowledge' (gnosis) as such. Yet rightly understood, i.e. in relation to the whole genius of Christ's 'teaching' in the Symposis Correlated text that the growth of the structure of the growth of the structure of the growth of the structure of the growth of in the Synoptic Gospels at least, + not even the later form warrants the idea that 'Gnostic' or metaphysical doctrines are here meant in any degree. The 'secrets' in question are just those detailed aspects of the Kingdom and its develop-ment, as parts of the Divine counsels, which form the essence of the parables which follow in this connexion and elsewhere. They are of the nature of moral principles such as verify themselves in the experience of the loyal life, rather than remain 'mysteries of faith' in the later sense of these words.

This is not the place for full discussion of the limits of knowledge, even religious knowledge in a sense, attaching to the gospel in the mind of Jesus Himself. Buch limits clearly exist as regards 'the times and seasons' of the Kingdom's temporal development. This is manifest in the saying in Mk 1332 | But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father' (alone). It is also implied in the parable of the Seed Growing Unobserved (Mk 43-29), if the Sower who 'himself knows not how' the seed grows, be none other than Christ, as seems to be the case,—a fact which at once explains the omission of the parable by Mt. and Luke. Such ignorance only confirms our general view as to the strictly spiritual character of the 'knowledge' conveyed by Jesus in His 'teaching,'—a statement which applies even to the knowledge referred to in the high utterance in Mt 1123-27. Lk 10211, touching Jesus' unique knowledge of the Father and His corresponding 'revelation' of Him to receptive souls. See, further, art. Kenosis.

ii. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—So far we have had ii. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—So far we have had in view 'knowledge' and the 'teaching' of it in the Synoptic Gospels only. But like results hold good in essence of the Fourth Gospel also, though with characteristic differences as to form. There, while the special word for 'knowledge' (γνῶσις) does not occur, the corresponding verb, with its suggestions of progressive insight gained by moral affinity, is very frequent (e.g. 10. 'recognize and go on recognizing,' 137' 'thou dost not know now, but thou shalt come to recognize hereafter,' cf. 147). The knowledge in view is still such as can be The knowledge in view is still such as can be verified by spiritual experience, and not such as must necessarily remain mere objective theory or

A typical passage is 31-21, where, however, it is impossible to say exactly how much is due, in form at least, to the Evangelist, and how much to Him of whom he writes. At v. 16 even the form ceases to be historic, and passes into reflexion on the principles involved in what precedes. But what underlies the whole is the idea of religious experience as conditioning insight into such knowledge as the new Rabbi had to convey (3<sup>2π</sup>). Its subject-matter is the 'Kingdom of God,' the nature of which dawns on a man's inner eye like the light of a fresh world of experience, into which he comes as by a new birth. This correlation of 'light' and 'life' implies that the knowledge in question is not abstract or impersonal, but vital and personal, such as can best be learned from and through a person, as it animates and gives him his specific character and attitude to life. Thus the 'life' in Jesus Himself was the 'light' He bore about in His personal walk among men. This is why belief in Jesus as a person and recognition of the 'light' of His message are so closely related, indeed practically identified, in the Fourth Gospel in particular. Both attitudes of soul are conditioned by a man's will, and this again by his underlying character—so far as developed—and the sympathetic affinities proper thereto. 'For everyone that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, lest his works should be reproved. But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they have been wrought in God' (3<sup>201</sup>.). Here we get the Lord through the Twelve Apostles' as it was understood in the circle represented by the Didache,—a fact the more striking if, as seems probable, this compilation of traditional matter represents in the main Syrian Christianity (c. 75-100 A.D.), the source also of our Synoptic tradition.

Johannine terms in their most essential meaning, as defined by the context. Christ's manifestation of the knowledge of God (on which the Kingdom depends) as His essential life, is the 'truth' about (fod and man in their mutual relations,about God and man in their mutual relations,—a truth, therefore, practical in its scope,—and so the 'light' of men as regards their special concern, the art of life. 'He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life' (8<sup>12</sup>). 'My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself' (7<sup>16</sup>).

This agrees essentially with the Synoptic teaching as to 'righteousness' and its conditions;* it even coincides in form as regards the metaphor of 'light' for man's footsteps in the journey of life (Mt 6<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>33t</sup>., Jn 8<sup>12</sup>), and the vision or blindness of men as determined by their prior moral affinities (Mt  $15^{14}$   $23^{16-26}$ , Lk  $4^{18}$   $6^{29}$ ). What is peculiar to the Johannine presentation is the use of 'truth' where the Synoptic word is 'righteousness.' But where the synoptic word is 'righteousness.' But OT usage † helps us to see their equivalence in idea, and that 'truth' is here at bottom no more speculative or dogmatic than 'righteousness.' It means 'the way of God in truth' (Mt 22<sup>16</sup>, Lk 20<sup>21</sup>, cf. 16<sup>11</sup>); and the Fourth Evangelist's choice of the more intellectual symonym is probably due to a habit which he had adopted in bringing the message home to men of Greek rather than Jewish training. But the practical and vital sense in which the term is used appears, for instance, in the central saying: 'I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh to the Father but by me' (Jn 146). When, too, Jesus goes on with, 'If you had come to recognize me (for what I am), of my Father also you would have had knowledge' (εἰ ἐγνώκειτε . . . ἀν ηδειτε), He does not pass into another sphere than that of spiritual quality and power, experimentally perceived: 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' The very fact that this is said in surprised reply to Philip's request, 'Show us the Father,' proves that distinct and explicit teaching as to the Father in Himself had formed no part of 'the teaching'; it had all been implicit in the authoritative yet dependent or filial mien with which the Son had spoken and acted for God. # How far any sayings recorded in the great discourse and prayer which follow, go beyond such manifested spiritual unity, into the realm of metaphysics, is still an open question among scholars. Yet it should be remembered that the thought moves ever on the devotional rather than the dogmatic level of thought, especially in the prayer in ch. 17; and that to all believers is open a like oneness to that between Jesus and His Father (Γνα ὧσιν εν καθώς ἡμεῖς εν, 1722), though this comes to others through relation to Himself (εγω εν αυτοῖς και σὺ εν εμοί, ν. <sup>23</sup>). In any case the unity is that of Love made perfect (νν. <sup>23, 26</sup>), and rests on recognition of the Father's name, gained by recognition of Jesus as sent of the Father (v.<sup>25f.</sup>).

In confirmation of this view, namely, that Jesus' teaching, even in the Johannine Gospel, moved essentially in the region of knowledge accessible to spiritual perception acting on kindred facts of to spiritual perception acting on kindred facts of *Cf. Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, i. 250 ff., as well as his general conception of the relation between the Synoptic and the Johannine representations of Jesus teaching.

† Cf. Hastings' DB iii, p. 98: 'The conception of true religion as the knowledge of God is probably the true antecedent and parent of some NT expressions for which affinities have been sought in the phenomena of Gnosticism. John (845) quotes 18 5413' (All thy children shall be taught of the Lord').

† Latham, op. cit. p. 17, observes that Jesus 'trusts to men's believing that the Father is in Him, not because He has declared it in set dogmas, but because He has been "so long with them." This is part of His chosen method of teaching, to the most religious effect, in view of the nature of man as a being whose spiritual faculties are to be evoked and trained freely and ethically.

experience, analogously to ordinary sense perception, we have the idea of Jesus as 'the true and faithful witness' (Rev 1 314). Jesus 'witnesses' to His message in various aspects (Jn 311 531 77 8136. 1837). in such words and deeds as make failure to recognize its truth a self-judgment passed by each man upon the state of his own conscience or spiritual faculty, as determined by past conduct and motive  $(Jn 3^{17-21} 15^{22-24}, cf. Mk 4^{21-25})$ . Thus 'the witness' of Jesus constituted a 'manifestation'  $(2^{11} 7^4 17^5)$ within the reach of men independently of intelwithin the reach of men independently of intellectual capacity, on the sole basis of moral perceptivity and receptivity (see 7<sup>161</sup>, quoted above, cf. 5<sup>20</sup>), in which the common folk excelled the learned (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>). The real object of such perception by nascent moral affinity, the specific revelation in Christ, was the total effect of Jesus' teaching, what we should style its 'spirit.' To resist this impression by practically independ the city. resist this impression by practically judging it evil in nature and origin, was sin against the Holy Spirit' at work in the conscience—the most fatal, because the most radical of all sins (Mk 328-30, Mt 12<sup>SI</sup>). The ultimate source, then, of insight into the message witnessed and the character of the Messenger as sent of God, especially in the full and perfect sense constituting Him the Messiah (Mk 8<sup>27-80</sup> ||), was the revealing action of the Father Himself (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, Jn 5<sup>32</sup> 6<sup>44</sup> 8<sup>18</sup>, cf. Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), as distinct from all mere human conditions of knowing (cf. Lathan, op. cit. 337 f.). The Father Himself was the ultimate witness. Not only were Jesus' works manifestly God's works (Jn 5<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>10</sup>); His 'voice' gave the final silent confirmation within the conscience; His 'immanent word' answered to the word uttered without by His witness; the vaguely dim outline of His character or Name was but fulfilled in clearer form in the Name given by and in His witness (Jn 5<sup>37t.</sup>). And so the 'light' from within met and recognized the light from without, and rose to the triumphant faith that the Light promised to Israel had indeed risen upon it.

iii. GENERAL RESULTS.—In all this there seems essential harmony between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, though in the latter the emphasis on the inner conditions of insight, and upon the Person of Jesus as summing up the spirit of His own teaching by word and deed, is more marked. In both types of Gospel the educative method of Jesus appears, even if, from its different scope, the Fourth Gospel does not bring this out concretely and progressively, as does the Synoptic narrative by its very nature as a narrative largely con-cerned with the gradual 'training of the Twelve' through actual intercourse with their Master. Perhaps we may say that the immediate influence of the Personality of Jesus, through eye and ear, is more apparent in the Synoptic account; while in the Johannine, the universal significance of His 'Person' as Messianic and Divine is set in relief -as it would be in later Christian experience. But in neither does the knowledge go beyond the scope of the Kingdom of God, the true Sovereignty of the Righteous Father—first its principles, and then its future developments-in close connexion with the destiny of its Founder and Lord, the Messiah, seen in His true character as unique Son of God. It is continuous with the Covenant idea of personal relations between God and His chosen people, and with the Divine name or character revealed in concreto through those relations. +

† Cf. Ps 2514 RV, 'The secret (counsel) of the Lord is with them that fear him; and his covenant, to make them know it' (reῦ δηλέσεια κὐτοῖ). Here the LXX inserts reference to 'the name of the Lord' between the parallel clauses, as a third support.

'secret' or mystery revealed is the more spiritual and less national nature of the Kingdom; and its essential contents form the New Covenant, which, towards the end of His private teaching to the inner circle of disciples, Jesus declared was destined to be consecrated or sealed in His own life-blood. The emphasis on the connexion between the message and the Messenger, the Messianic Kingdom and His own Person as Messianic Son of God, increased with the growing opposition encountered; so that confidence in Himself became the very sheet-anchor of the cause to which He was from the first consecrated. Thus the perspective of the 'teaching' changes somewhat. The side at first implicit, becomes more and more explicit, especi-ally in the intimate intercourse of Jesus and His inner circle. But there is essential continuity of spirit throughout. Nor is there any esoteric knowledge, in the strict sense, different in kind from the public teaching. The inner side was simply the darker side of difficulty and rejection, that most apt to repel the hearer until his confidence in the Master was well grounded. These were 'the mysteries' of the Kingdom, if Jesus ever used such an expression (Mt 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>, where Mk. has 'the mystery,' and above, p. 702). There was no new 'theology in the abstract and Greek sense, as distinct from that of personal relations with man. Accordingly there is in the teaching of Christ no real warrant for the Gnostic developments which began once the Gospel passed from Jewish to Greek soil. It is significant that religious knowledge was not taken in a Gnostic sense among Palestinian Christians (as distinct from the mixed Samaritan type). This implies that Christ's teaching was felt to move within the circle of general Hebrew metaphysics, and not to have any direct beauty here.

Such a judgment is confirmed, positively, by the so-called 'Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,' which in its present form is probably of Palestinian or Syrian origin, and understands 'the teaching (διδαχή) of the Lord' to have differed from Judaism only ethically, in the deeper knowledge of God's will, fuller spiritual life, and firmer grasp on immortality (γνῶσις καὶ πίστις, ζωή, άθανασία, ix. 3, x. 2), which it bestowed. Its negative confirmation lies in the very fact that Gnosticizing versions of Christ's teaching early arose in the centres where the Hellenic spirit was strongest. Such 'apocryphal' Gospels, professing, as a rule, to supply from a secret line of tradition the words of 'deeper wisdom' which it was assumed must have fallen from the lips of the great Revealer of the spiritual world (here regarded cosmically rather than ethically), only show what the speculative spirit missed in our Gospels, with their concrete, practical teaching, often in terms of an individual case. Most probably Christian Gnostics felt some encouragement and justification afforded them by the less Hebraic tone of the Fourth Gospel, even though it is mystical rather than metaphysical in its dis-tinctive elements, and is tinged with Christian experience rather than cosmical philosophy. Probably also their first efforts at Gospel-writing were more ethical than metaphysical in scope and in-terest. This was certainly the case in some circles, notably that represented by the Gospel to which belong the Oxyrhynchus 'Sayings of Jesus' (pub-lished in 1898, 1904), in which the non-original element is largely inspired by the 'Wisdom' litera-ture of Hellenistic Judaism, and takes the form mainly of glessing certain actual savings of Jesus mainly of glossing certain actual sayings of Jesus with developments and expansions in terms of the deeper moral philosophy of the day, e.g. of the maxim, 'Know thyself,' and the Platonic doctrine of Wonder as the mother of Wisdom. Once this process of free development was started, however, and sanctioned among Christians imbued with Hellenic and Oriental notions, both philosophical and mythological,—for the age was one of syncretism or the blending and fusion of ideas of very diverse origin,—it was bound to go ever further and further away from the attitude and horizon of historic Gospels. If the remains of 2nd cent. Gospels known to us were not so scanty, we should be able to see the stages by which the later types, in which the historic element of Jesus' teaching in word and deed is at a minimum, evolved gradually, rather than sprang full-blown to life. Thus the uncanonical Gospel drawn on by the preacher whose homily is known traditionally as '2 Clement,' whether it be the Gospel according to the Egyptians or not, represented the next stage of idealization to that marked by the Oxyrhynchus Gospel; but it still contained much matter found in (and probably borrowed from) our Synoptic Gospels.* Quite the opposite kind of development, though one which also carries us away from the historic teaching of Jesus, is seen in the Judaizing Gospel according to the Hebrews, in its two forms or stages, in which the reactionary reading of Jesus' message, the tendency to make it Judaic in letter and spirit, becomes more and more manifest.

Midway between these two opposed tendencies— the Judaic or legal, and the Gnostic or esoteric, mysterious, metaphysical—lie our historic Gospels. They are full of the spirit of Hebraic teaching as to knowledge of Divine things; but raise it to a new power and universality by contact with the Personality and spirit of Jesus, Himself the heart of the Gospel within the Gospels, the prime source of their perennial vitality and authority. Nor must we overlook the fact that the very form of these Gospels fits them, in a wonderful way, to be the vehicles of religious teaching after the mind of Jesus Himself, through 'being narrative instead of didactic, and coming from the Evangelists instead of from Christ' Himself direct. 'If our Lord, says Latham (p. 13), 'had left writings of His own, every letter of them would have been invested with such sanctity that there could have been no independent investigation of truth. Its place would have been taken by commentatorial works on the delivered word,' on the lines of the scribes and Rabbis. The letter of Jesus' teaching would have been so revered, that its 'spirit and life' would have been so revered that its 'spirit and life'. would have had less chance of reproducing itself through personal effort freely to find its meaning by inner moral quest. So would the very end of that teaching have been frustrated. For 'in all His sayings and doings, our Lord was most careful to leave the individual room to grow.' 'He cherishes and respects personality.' And so 'He gave seed thoughts which should lie in men's 'He gave seed thoughts which should he in men's hearts, and germinate when fit occasion came' (ib. pp. 5, 10, 12). All this is permanently secured by the simple narrative form of the Gospels, especially the Synoptics. Herein the outer form of the NT—its Epistles hardly less than its Gospels—is as characteristic of the religion it enshrines as the Koran is of Islam. It is a notable fact that the Koran is of Islam. It is a notable fact that the Apocryphal Gospels steadily moved away from the narrative to the didactic manner, many of them transposing their key from the third to the first person, by the device of making their teaching ostensibly post-resurrectional (even the Oxyrhynchus Gospel does this), with a view to make it more dogmatically impressive. In so doing they came nearer the Koran and most other sacred LITERATURE.—As bearing on the form of Jesus' teaching and its leading terms, so far as determined by their original Aramaic character, Dalman's Die Worte Jesus is invaluable [Eng. tr. of first part=The Words of Jesus, Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1902]. Equally fundamental for the meaning of Jesus' teaching in the Synoptics, compared also with that in the Fourth Gospel, is Wendt, Die Lehre Jesu [Eng. tr. The Teaching of Jesus, 2 vols., Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1892]; cf. A. B. Bruce, The Kingdom of God, Edinburgh, 1890, The Parabolic Teaching of Christ, London, 1889. Perhaps the best book in English on the whole subject is Latham's Pastor Pastorum (Cambridge, 1890), which gives special attention to 'the way in which our Lord taught this disciples, both in what He did and in what He retrained from doing' and saying. Incidental help is also afforded by the larger Lives of Christ; while the articles on 'Knowledge' and 'Teaching' in Bible Dictionaries and Encyclopsedias often contain a section on our special subject.

TEARS.—The only two passages in EV of the

TEARS.—The only two passages in EV of the Gospels where tears are mentioned are Mk 924, where the father of the epileptic lad is said in AV to have cried out with tears, 'Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief' [RV, however, following decidedly the best MSS, omits the words 'with tears']; and Lk 738-44, where, in Simon the Pharisee's house, the penitent harlot washed with her tears the Saviour's feet. If, however, we enlarge our article by references to weeping, we have several instances of sorrow calling forth those tears which are its frequent, but by no means invariable, expression. Mary of Magdala wept when on the third day after the crucitixion she found that the body of her beloved Lord was no longer in Joseph's sepulchre (Jn 2011-16). Peter wept tears of bitter shame when the sound of the cock-crowing brought home to him his sin in denying the Master on the night of betrayal (Mk 1472 and parallels). In each of these cases it may be useful to notice that tears were turned into joy; for to the penitent woman Christ said, 'Go in peace'; Mary's grief was changed to adoring rapture when the risen Saviour pronounced her name; and to Peter, by a special revelation of grace, He granted the blessedness of the man whose transgression is forgiven and whose sin is covered. In no case was the lamentation vain remorse, like that of Esau, who found no place of repentance, though he sought the blessing of his father diligently with tears (He

Most important of all are the passages where esus Himself is reported to have wept. They are Jesus Himself is reported to have wept. three. (1) On the day when He rode into Jerusalem on the ass's colt, while the multitudes were rejoicing with shouts of Hosanna, His heart was not in tune with their mirth. Lk 19<sup>41</sup> says that when He was come nigh, He saw the city, and wept over it. There was good reason for His wails. [The word Exhauser does not actually express tears so much as loud cries]. The sins which that city had committed in killing the prophets and stoning them that were sent unto her—sins which were to culminate in a few days when He Himself was to be the victim of their malice-lay sore on the heart of Him who would gladly have gathered her children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and who saw His salvation rejected. The dishonour done to His Father and the degradation of His Father's house filled Him with a grief which not only made rivers of waters run down His eyes, but drew words of indignation from His lips. The sorrows which were about to swamp Jerusalem in a flood of woe wrung from His heart the agonizing cry, 'If thou hadst known in this day, even thou, the things which belong unto peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes' (Lk 19<sup>42</sup>). It was not for Himself that He lamented, nor for Himself that He would allow tears to be shed by others. Even while He was ready to faint under the load of the cross that was to be His anguish and shame, He said, 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me.' If they had tears, let them prepare to shed them now for themselves and for their children, because of the fearful tragedies that were to be enacted in their city ere a few years had passed (Lk 23<sup>27-31</sup>). The Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief (Is 53<sup>3</sup>) was in His characteristic attitude of agonizing for others when the load of their sins lay heavily upon Him that day, and He was like the prophet (Jer 9<sup>1</sup>) who wished that his head were waters and his eyes a fountain of tears, that he might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of his people.

(2) Jn 11<sup>35</sup> 'Jesus wept.' The word here is εδάκρυσεν, 'shed tears.' This was at the grave of Lazarus when He was about to raise him from the dead. There is something here to surprise us, though much that was very natural in the tears of the Saviour. To the widow of Nain who was following the bier of her only son He said, 'Weep not' (Lk 7<sup>13</sup>), as He had said to those who lamented the daughter of Jairus, 'Why make ye this ado, and weep?' (Mk 5<sup>38</sup>. <sup>39</sup>). He was about to dry their tears and silence their wails by restoring their dead to life. Yet here (Jn 11<sup>25</sup>-25) it is recorded that He Himself groaned in spirit, and wept as He joined the company of those who were weeping with the bereaved sisters. The tears of Jesus on this occasion have been a source of much consolation to those who mourn their dead. One is reminded of the lines of Erasmus Darwin—

No radiant pearl which crested Fortune wears, No gem that, twinkling, hangs from Beauty's ears, Not the bright stars which Night's blue arch adorn, Nor rising stars that gild the vernal morn, Shine with such lustre as the tear that flows Down Virtue's manly cheek for others' woes.'

They prove to us the perfect humanity of the Redeemer. He who with Divine authority was about to call the dead to life yet had the human weakness to shed tears. 'The possession of a body enabled Him to weary; the possession of a soul enabled Him to weep' (F. W. Robertson). They also show His thorough sympathy with those who have to endure grief, especially bereavement, how in all their afflictions He is afflicted. Perhaps they may also be evidence of the anguish He felt at the woe which was caused in the world by that sin in the train of which misery and death came into the world. Further, the tears may have been drawn forth as He thought of the anguish that would be caused to His mother and His friends when He Himself should be laid within such a sepulchre as that before His eyes. And no doubt while on this occasion in Bethany He was about to turn sorrow to joy and heaviness to mirth, yet He was aware that there were multitudes who would have to sorrow without hope, and bewailed that he who had the power of death must claim so many victims ere he was himself destroyed.

(3) He 5<sup>7,8</sup>. In this interesting passage, which, while it does not occur in the Gospels, refers to Christ, we are reminded how, in the days of His flesh, He offered up prayers with strong crying and tears unto Him who was able to save Him from death. The allusion is chiefly to the agony of Gethsemane, though possibly to other occasions of Christ praying to the Father. It is hardly within the scope of this article to discuss the question of what it was for which our Lord then prayed. It can hardly have been merely such a prayer as that of Hezekiah when he turned his face to the wall and wept sore on being told that his sickness was mortal (2 K 201-3), or that of the Psalmist who, as Hot tal (22 %), of that of the Familia way, as he mingled his drink with weeping, said: 'O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days' (Ps 102<sup>n. 24</sup>). For a discussion of the subject see Westcott, Hebrews; Schauffler in Sunday School Times, of America, 1895; Expository Times, vi. 1894-95, pp. 433, 522. It is evident that the writer's thought is to a large extent linked with the mediatorial office of Christ in the perfect obedience of His humanity which was learned through suffering. Death to Him, as well as to all Christians, had an awful meaning; and however willing the spirit of Christ might be to meet it, yet the flesh was weak, and tears might well gush forth in prospect of its bitterness. Here, again, from the tears of the Saviour, we learn the thorough sympathy of Christ with men, even the identification of the Son of Man with those for whom He was to die.

TEMPERANCE.—In the Sermon on the Mount Christ dwells on the restraint under which not only our actions and our words must be held, but also our thoughts. He sees in the angry thought the germ of murder, in the impure thought the germ of adultery, and so He goes to the root of the matter. It is of no use to try to cleanse the stream at a certain point in its course, if the fountain from which it flows is impure; if the stream is to be kept pure the fountain must be kept pure; and if the words and actions are to be under control, the thoughts of the heart must be under control. It is from within, out of the theart, that all kinds of irregularities proceed, therefore 'keep thy heart with all diligence,' or, as in the marginal note, 'above all that thou guardest, for out of it are the issues of life' (Pr

In the parable of the Prodigal Son we see the depth of degradation into which a man is brought when he breaks away from his God. In the case of the prodigal, the initial step was taken when the undisciplined thought was harboured in the heart. His mind fretted and rebelled against the heart. His mind fretted and rebelled against the restraints of his father's house, he wished to go out into the world and to see life, he wanted to be free from all control. The next step was the undisciplined word, 'Give me the portion of thy substance that falleth to me.' And the final step was the undisciplined act, 'He took his journey into a far country, and there he wasted his substance with riotous living.' Here the thought first ran riot, and the rest followed.

Christianity, therefore, is a religion not merely for a part of our being, but for the whole man; it touches him in every relationship of life and in every aspect of that relationship. It teaches him to 'live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world' (Tit 2<sup>12</sup>). While righteousness represents his attitude towards his fellow-men and godliness his attitude towards God, soberness represents his attitude towards himself. Soberness (wedger(in) is a right belong in all things; it ness (σωφροσύνη) is a right balance in all things; it is the bringing of the lower part of the nature into subjection to the higher, the flesh into subjection to the spirit; it means the spirit of man, guided by the Holy Spirit of God, governing the soul or intellect; then the soul or intellect, thus sanctified, governing the flesh; and the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, kept under control, held in hand, just as a spirited horse is held in hand by an experienced rider; moving on, not torn asunder by conflicting interests, but advancing steadily in one direction upwards and heavenwards.

A temperate man is one who rules himself, who lets every act that he performs have its own proper place, who gives everything its own due proportion, who does not eat too much, drink too much, sleep too much, talk too much, or do anything in excess. We live in days when there is an inordinate craving for amusement: amusements have their place, and, within limits, are not only necessary but good for us; but when they absorb so large a portion of our life that its more serious duties have to give place to them, then they become extremely hurtful. They should be regarded as sidings off the main line of our life, opportunities for recruiting our tired and weary energies, so that we may return to our work with renewed vigour; and when thus used they are very helpful. A temperate man will exercise self-control with regard to these as well as in all other matters.

But while temperance is an all-round virtue, the term has come to be used very largely with reference to self-control in a particular direction, viz. in the matter of strong drink. When we speak of 'the Temperance cause' or 'Temperance work,' we generally mean the efforts that are being made to suppress intemperance in the use of alcohol. Our Temperance Societies are directed towards this object, and so the word 'temperance' has come to be used almost exclusively in this connexion; and it cannot be denied that there is some justification for it, because the effects of the abuse of strong drink are so patent and so terrible that they attract attention in a way that few other sins Temperance is not necessarily total abstinence; it is the use, as distinct from the abuse, of strong drink. Total abstinence may be necessary; for the inveterate drunkard it is necessary; for him the only remedy, under God, is to abstain altogether from that which he cannot use in strict moderation (cf. Jesus' words in Mt 5<sup>28, 30</sup>). Again moderation (cf. Jesus' words in Mt 5<sup>m. m</sup>). Again it may be necessary for others besides drunkards, viz., for those who are to rescue the victims of strong drink, for we all know that example is far more powerful than precept; we are far more likely to be able to help those who have fallen into this abyss by saying to them, 'Do as we do,' than by saying, 'Do as we tell you.'

But while total abstinence may be necessary for some especially for those of us who are working some, especially for those of us who are working in the slums of our large towns, it is not enjoined upon all; the strictly moderate use of alcohol cannot be said to be a sin; and to speak of it as though it were a sin, as has sometimes been done, is only to weaken the cause that we have at heart; it is the abuse of it that is a sin, and therefore, while abstinence is not enjoined upon all, temperance is enjoined upon every Christian man and

Our Lord tells us what is the end and aim of our fallen but redeemed and regenerate humanity, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5<sup>68</sup>). This is the goal set before us; and to reach this goal our attitude must be that of the spiritual athlete, straining every nerve and exerting every muscle, keeping under the body and bringing it into subjection, running the race set before us, 'looking unto Jesus' (He 122), looking unto Him as our example, looking unto Him for strength, pressing onward from stage to stage, from strength to strength, from one degree of perfection unto another, 'unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (Eph 413).

And here our Lord stands before us as our Ideal. The Jesus of the Gospels presents to us a life which is the very embodiment of temperance, a life of perfect self-restraint, of complete self-mastery; a life free from excess on the one hand and defect on the other, well-balanced, well-pro-portioned, without flaw, without spot, perfect in all its parts; a life which had for its object the glory of God, from the time when He came into the world, saying, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O my God' (He 107), to the time when, having finished all, He exclaimed with the voice of a conqueror, 'I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do' (Jn 174). To copy this perfect Ideal and to reach this goal we, by a life lived in union with Him and by the power of the Holy union with Him and by the power of the Holy Ghost, must strive to be temperate in all things. See, further, art. SELF-CONTROL.

ROWLAND ELLIS. TEMPEST.—See SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591.

TEMPLE.—i. USE OF TERMS.—1. The word which is most frequently used in the Gospels for the temple is to lepto (***) it occurs nearly 50 times. Under this term is included, generally speaking, the whole of the temple area, i.e. the Court of the Gentiles, the Court of the Women, the Court of the Israelites, the Priests' Court, and the Holy Place, together with the Holy of Holies. In this wide sense it is used in Mt 12<sup>6</sup> 24<sup>1.2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>1.3</sup> 14<sup>49</sup>, Lk 19<sup>47</sup> 21<sup>37.38</sup> 22<sup>48</sup> 24<sup>48</sup>; but in a number of passages it is used in a more restricted sense, of passages it is used in a more restricted sense, viz.: in reference to the Court of the Gentiles, Mt 2112-16.23, Mk 1115-18.27, Lk 1945 2258 Jn 214-15 514 889; in reference to the Court of the Women, Mk 1241, Lk 227.37 211; in reference to the Court of the Israelites, Mt 2628, Mk 1235, Lk 246 1810 201, Jn 714.28 1156 1820. The particular part of the temple referred to cannot always be accertained with corresponding to cannot always be acceptained with corresponding to cannot always be acceptained with corresponding to the cannot be carried to the cannot be cannot be cannot be carried to the cannot be cannot be cannot be carried to the cannot be c referred to cannot always be ascertained with certainty, especially in the case of the Men's Court (Court of the Israelites), but presumably the mention of 'teaching in the temple' would usually refer to Christ teaching the Jews (in view of such passages as 'I am not sent save unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' Mt 15<sup>24</sup>), in which case the women, according to Jewish custom, would not be present. In a few instances lepor is used of some particular part of the temple, viz. of the actual sanctuary, Lk 215, Jn 8<sup>20</sup>; in this passage the treasury is spoken of loosely, as being in the temple (lepós), strictly speaking it was in the Sanctuary (raós). The same applies to the mention of Solomon's Porch in Jn 10<sup>22</sup>. In reference to the wing or pinnacle of the temple (Mt 45, Lk 49) πτερύγιον τοῦ lepoῦ is used; as to where this spot was precisely scholars differ. See PINNACLE. Once the phrase το lepor του θεου is used (Mt 2112), but the addition of roo θeod is not well attested.

2. The word roos* (מִיכְל) denotes the Sanctuary, i.e. that part of the temple which was holy, and to which, therefore, none but the priests had access; it included the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (see Lk 121.22). The rass was built of white marble, (see Lk 121.22). The ναός was built of white marble, overlaid in part with gold sheeting; this costliness is referred to in Mt 23<sup>16.17</sup>. Other references to the Sanctuary are: 23<sup>18.19.25</sup>, which speak of the altar; 27<sup>5.6</sup>, the treasury (but see below); Lk 1<sup>9</sup>, the altar of incense (here the phrase δ ναός τοῦ κυρίου occurs for the only time); Mt 27<sup>51</sup>, the heavy veil between the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place (see also Mk 15<sup>28</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>). Finally, Christ speaks of His body as symbolizing the Sanctuary in Jn 2<sup>19-21</sup>, cf. Mt 26<sup>61</sup> (where the only occurrence of the phrase δ ναός τοῦ θεοῦ is found) occurrence of the phrase δ ναδι τοῦ θεοῦ is found) 2740, Mk 1488 1529. In Jn 220 ὁ ναδι is inaccurately used in the words 'Forty and six years was this temple in building' (i.e. has this temple been in building up till now), for it was the whole temple area with all included in it that had so far been

*It was that part in which God 'dwelt' (rais), and corresponded to what was originally also the most sacred part, i.e. beth-Fil (cf. the Hebrew name for the temple as a whole, n; bouse'), the 'house of God'; the early conception of a temple was that of being essentially a 'dwelling-place' for God (cf. 2 8 75-7).

8. A few other expressions used for the temple may be briefly referred to: δ δικός μου,\* Mt 21<sup>13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 19<sup>46</sup>, Jn 2<sup>17</sup>; δικος προσευχής, Mt 21<sup>13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 19<sup>46</sup>; δ δικος τοῦ πατρός μου, Jn 2<sup>16</sup>. All these expressions are used in the larger sense of  $\tau\delta$  lepov. The 'Holy Place' is specifically referred to in Mt 2385 'between the sanctuary (rads) and the altar, i.e. the space between the outer veil (see below) and the altar for burnt-offerings; in 2415 έστὸς ἐν τόπφ ἀγίφ, but in the parallel passage (Mk 1314) the reading is ἐστηκότα ὅπου οὐ δεῖ.† Lastly, the expression o other victor, Mt 23 to (Your house is left unto you desolate'), apparently also refers to the temple, for it is in the temple that these words were spoken, and it is to the temple that the disciples point when admiring the beauty of the building, in reply to which Christ says: 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, which shall not be thrown down'; thus 'your house' evidently means the temple building in its external form, in contradistinction to the 'house of God,' the spiritual building not made with hands.

ii. HEROD'S TEMPLE. — There are several admirable descriptions of Herod's temple published and easily available; § all are based on the main sources, viz. Jos. Ant. xv. xi., BJ v. v., c. Ap. i. 22, and the Mishnic tractate Middoth. It will, therefore, not be necessary to give a detailed account here, but a general outline to illustrate the Gospel references is necessary. Herod the Great commenced rebuilding the temple \(\mathbb{I}\) in the year B.C. 20 (the eighteenth year of his reign), on the site of the second temple; but the available space was insufficient for the much larger building which he intended to erect. He therefore con-structed immense vaulted chambers ** on the south side of the hill on which the earlier temple stood; by this means the area at his disposal was doubled.
A general idea of the whole will be best gained by indicating its main divisions:

1. The Outer Court.—This large space (two stadia + in length, one in breadth, the perimeter being six stadia), which surrounded the temple proper, was enclosed by a battlemented wall. The main entrances to this enclosure were on the west, leading from the city; here there were four gates, the remains of one of which have been discovered.

The best, however, is that in Hastings' DB; it is very full, and the excellent illustrations enable one to form a definite picture of what the temple looked like in the time of Christ; the art. in the Encyc. The original sources are not always in agreement, but taking them together a sufficiently accurate picture of Herod's temple is obtainable.

On the south side were the two 'Huldah' gates, remains of which have also been discovered. the south-west corner there was a bridge which led from the city into the temple area; a huge arch which formed part of this bridge was discovered by Robinson, and is called after him. There was one gate on the east, which has been walled up; this was called the 'Golden Gate,' which tradition identifies with the 'Beautiful Gate' mentioned in Ac 31. On the north there was likewise one gate, called in Middoth the 'Tadi Gate.'t All these gates led directly into the great temple area, or outer court; around the whole area, within the walls, were ranged portuces with double rows of pillars; but the finest was that on the south side; here there were four rows of Corinthian columns made of white marble. All these porticoes were covered with a roof of wood. The eastern portico was called Solomen's Porch (Jn 10<sup>23</sup>, cf. Ac 3<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>28</sup>); it belonged to an earlier building which tradition secribed to Solomon. On the north-west two sets of steps led up to the Tower of Antonia; the Roman garrison stationed here kept constant watch during the feasts and other occaaions of great gatherings, in case of tumult (cf. Ac 21<sup>26,48</sup>). This temple area was called the 'Court of the Gentilea'; it was not part of the temple proper, and therefore not sacred soil, consequently any one might enter it. It is to this outer court that reference is made in Mt 21<sup>13-16</sup>, Mk 11<sup>136</sup>, Lk 19<sup>36, 46</sup>, Jn 2<sup>13-17</sup>; the money-changers; and those who sold animals for the temple sacrifices had free access

2. The Court of the Israelites. - This inner court was raised fifteen cubits above the outer one just referred to; it was surrounded by a terrace (ed), ten cubits in breadth, which was approached from the outer court by secending fourteen steps; these steps ran round the whole terrace, and at the bottom of them there was a low wall or breast-work (46reg) which was the limit to which non-Brachtes might approach; along it were placed, at intervals, inscriptions warning Gentiles not to pass beyond, on pain of death; they were written in Latin and Greek; one of the latter has been discovered by Clermont-Ganneau. On entering this inner court, 'holy' ground was reached, which accounted for the prohibition just referred to: only the seed of Abraham might enter here, hence its

(a) The Women's Court.—This was the smaller division; it occupied the eastern part. The court received its name from the fact that it formed the limit to which women might advance towards the manctuary, not because it was reserved for the use of women. It was on a lower level than the Men's Court, which was entered through six of the nine gates belonging to the Women's Court. Of these gates, three deserve special mention, viz. that presented by Alexander of Alexandria; it was one of the largest, and was covered with gold and silver; secondly, the Eastern gate, which was covered with Corinthian bronze; and, above all, the gate

(b) But the Court of the Israelites proper was the western and larger court, called also the Men's Court, and to this only men had access. It ran round the whole of the Sanctuary itself, in which was included the Priests' Court (see below). In the Men's Court were (according to Josephus) the treasury-chambers, where all the more valuable temple belongings were kept. The 'treasury' spoken of in Mk 1241-45, Lk 211 was clearly entered by women; the discrepancy may, however, be ex-plained by supposing that one of the trumpet-shaped receptacles into which offerings were cast, and which usually stood in the Men's Court, was at certain times placed in the eastern portion of the court, so that every one, including the women, might have the opportunity of making the offer-ings; on such occasions the Women's Court was, for the time being, a treasury. On the other hand, the treasury mentioned in Jn 82 would appear, from the context, to refer to that in the Men's Court, the word being used here in the strict sense

(see, too, Mt 27<sup>3, 4</sup>).

3. The Court of the Priests.—Before entering the most sacred parts of the Sanctuary, the Priests. Court had to be traversed. In this court there stood, in the centre, the great altar for burnt-sacrifices, and close to it the brazen laver for the priestly ablutions. On the right of these, on entering, was the place for slaughtering the animals brought for sacrifice. On either side of the court were the priests' chambers; it is probable that one of these was the Lishkuth parkedrin, 'the Hall of the rocedoor' ('assessors'), in which the members of the Sanhedrin met in a quasi-private character before they met officially in the Lichkath ha-gazith,: Where this latter was the Hall of hewn stone.' precisely, it is impossible to say, owing to the con-flicting evidence of the authorities; the only thing that seems tolerably certain is that, while it was within the enclosure of the temple proper, it was not within the Priests' Court ; this is certain from the fact that none but priests might enter the court called after them; the only exception to this was that which permitted the entrance of those who brought offerings, for they had to lay their hands upon the sacrifice, in accordance with

The Holy of Holles  $(d\dot{e}b\hat{t}r)$ .—No human foot might enter here, with the one exception of the high priest, who entered once a year, on the Day of Atonement, for the purpose of presenting sacrifice and incense before God. It was properly the place wherein the ark should have rested; but nothing is heard of the ark after the Captivity, and the Holy of Holies was, therefore, quite empty. The 'foundation stone' (תְּיֶתֶּלְ ) upon which, in the first temple, the ark had stood, was nearly in the centre of the Holy of Holies; in the second temple it was exposed to the extent of about six inches;\* there is no mention of this anywhere in reference to Herod's temple, but, as this was built on the site of the earlier temple, it is difficult to believe that it was not there. There was no means whereby any light could enter the Holy of Holies; it was, therefore, always in total darkness, excepting when artificially lighted. It was separated from the Holy Place by means of two veils, with the space of a cubit between them; in Mt 27<sup>51</sup>, Mk 15<sup>28</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup> (cf. He 6<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>, though it is not Herod's temple that is referred to in these passages) only one veil† is spoken of; but as the two were so close together, they were probably regarded as two parts of one whole.

iii. CHRIST AND THE TEMPLE.—1. The earliest mention of the temple in connexion with Christ is on the occasion of His being brought there for 'presentation' and 'redemption' thirty-one days after His birth, in accordance with Jewish law (Lk 2<sup>22-29</sup>, cf. Ex 13<sup>1-18</sup>). This ceremony took place in the Court of the Women, as the presence of Mary and Anna shows: it was a simple one took Mary and Anna shows; it was a simple one, t consisting only of the formal presentation of the child to the priest, who offered up two 'benedictions,' or thanksgiving prayers, one on behalf of the child for the law of redemption, the other on behalf of the mother for the gift of the firstborn son.

From Lk 241 it may be assumed that Christ was brought annually to Jerusalem for the Passover celebration in the temple; there was no need for Him to be left behind. § and the presence of children in the temple was evidently of common occurrence (Mt 2119); the visit, therefore, recorded in Lk 242 was not the first time that Christ was present at the yearly Passover feast in the temple.

One other reference, prior to the time of Christ's public ministry, but on the threshold of it, is contained in the parable of His Temptation, whose second scene (in Lk. the third) is represented as having taken place on the pinnacle of the temple.

2. By far the most important part of Christ's connexion with the temple is His teaching given within its precincts. On a number of occasions we read of the representatives of different classes coming to Him in the temple, often, no doubt, with the genuine object of profiting by His teaching, but frequently also for a more sinister purpose (e.g. Mt 16<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>15</sup>). The most elaborate account of such teaching is probably that contained in the long passage Mt 21<sup>22</sup>-23<sup>26</sup>; the whole of this discourse, addressed, as opportunity offered, to a variety of hearers, would appear to have been spoken in the large outer court (ii. 1). The manysided character of Christ's teaching in the temple is well illustrated by this section; the first who are here mentioned as coming to Him were the chief priests and elders of the people, who asked Him by what authority He taught; the series of parables which constituted His reply to their question concluded with an appeal to Scripture: 'Did ye never read in the Scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner?' (Ps 118<sup>22</sup>); there was peculiar aptitude in the quotation being given in the temple, for 'stone' was a figurative expression for the leader of the people, which must have been familiar to His hearers (cf. Is 1913, Jg 202, 1 S 1433, Zec 104); a family, and also a nation, were conceived of as a building (cf. 1 P 25), the head of which was regarded as the most prominent feature—the part of the spiritual building which stood out most conspicuously. There is ample evidence to show that the Jews regarded the temple as, in a real sense, a symbol of their nation. When Christ spoke of Himself as the 'corner-stone,' He was claiming for Himself the leadership of the people, i.e. He was, in effect, declaring Himself to be the Messiah. Christ's teaching was next addressed in turn to the Pharisees, the Herodians, the Sadducees, the lawyers, and, lastly, to the surrounding people; the whole section gives a vivid picture of the use He made of the temple for His teaching of all sorts. and conditions of men. Other references to His teaching in the temple are Lk 1947. 48, from which it is clear, on the one hand, how exasperated the chief priests and scribes were, and, on the other hand, how the people flocked into the temple to hear Him (Mt 26<sup>55</sup>, Mk 14<sup>49</sup>, Lk 21<sup>37, 38</sup> 22<sup>53</sup>, Jn

But perhaps the most impressive teaching of Christ in the temple was during the great festivals, when immense numbers of people from all parts of the country came up to Jerusalem. It is in the Fourth Gospel that the details of this teaching are, for the most part, preserved; thus in Jn 7<sup>10a</sup> we read that during the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus went into the temple and taught, so that the people marvelled at His teaching; and that on the last day of this feast a climax was reached; for, while on the one hand He was declared to be the Messiah, on the other this claim was disputed; and that the chief priests and Pharisees, believing that their opportunity had come, attempted to take Him, but in vain, for the majority of the people sided with Christ. The method of Christ's public teaching in the temple, together with the way in which the learned Jews sought to combat it, is graphically described in such passages as Jn 7. 8; the whole of the episode dealt with in these chapters took place in the outer Court of the Gentiles, where the largest number of people congregated: this is clear from the fact that some of the people took up stones to cast at Christ (859). Again, at the Feast of Dedication, Christ was once ragain, at the reast of Dedication. Christ was once more in the temple, teaching, with the like result, that the people threatened to stone Him: in this case we are definitely told (Jn 10<sup>22-42</sup>) that it took place in 'Solomon's Porch, which was in the Court of the Gentiles (see above, ii. 1). Lastly, that Christ was again present in the temple, and teaching, during the other great that Passage ing, during the other great feast, the Passover, seems tolerably clear from Jn  $12^{12-36}$ .

It is certain, therefore, that Christ made every use of the opportunities afforded of pressing home

*The 'corner-stone,' as implied above, has nothing to do with the foundation of a building; this is quite clear from the Heb. איש פנה and from the Syr cur and Pesh. בישו פנה ; the root-idea of [O] is that of 'excrescence' (see Brockelmann, Syr. Lex. s.v.). Literally, the phrase might be rendered, 'the top of the highest point'; and the spot indicated would probably be the same as that referred to in the narrative of the Temptation.

† The other courts were paved.

His teaching in the temple; no other spot offered the same favourable conditions, viz. it was the most convenient centre for the gathering together of the multitude; the frequent presence of priests, Pharisees, scribes, and lawyers enabled Christ, in the hearing of the multitude, to contrast His teaching with theirs; there was also the fact that teaching in the temple naturally appealed to the multitude more than if given anywhere else, as the temple was the officially recognized place for instruction.

3. It is extraordinary that no instance of a miracle of healing by Christ is recorded in the Gospels as having been performed in the temple; but in view of such passages as Ac 3<sup>1-12</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> we cannot doubt that such did take place, especially as the Outer Court of the temple would be a natural spot for the lame and crippled to congregate for the purpose of arousing the pity of those going up to worship.

Only once is the temple the scene in a parable, namely, in that of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18<sup>10-14</sup>); while in one other, the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30-38</sup>), temple officers are referred to.

4. There are, in the next place, a certain number of passages in the Gospels in which there are direct references to the temple, or something connected with it, though it is not mentioned by name. temple and its furniture would have been so well known to the people that Christ could use both symbolically without actually mentioning them, and yet His hearers would perfectly understand the reference. The most striking instance of this is where the sanctuary is used as a symbol of Christ's risen body (Jn 2<sup>19-21</sup>; cf. Mt 28<sup>61</sup> 27<sup>60</sup>, Mk 1456 1529). But, as a rule, these references are not so obvious to modern ears as to those who heard them. The significance of these examples is enhanced in the case of those which were spoken in the temple itself; among them are: Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 'I am the light of the world'; one may reasonably infer that there was a reference here to the sevenbranched lampstand in the Holy Place; † but for this artificial light it was altogether in darkness; the context ('he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness') receives emphasis when one remembers this. Christ is drawing out the contrast between the Jewish teaching, according to which the close approach to God in the Holy of Holies meant darkness, and His own, according to which the darkness, and his own, according to which the nearer one approached to Him, the Son of God, the greater the light. Again, there is a reference to the temple service of praise when Christ quotes Ps 8<sup>2</sup> (LXX): 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou has perfected praise' (Mt 21<sup>16</sup>); here again was an implied contrast between the formalism of the temple working and the whole formalism of the temple-worship and the whole-hearted praise of the children crying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' A further and more direct reference to the worship of the temple is to be found in Mk 12<sup>20</sup>, where Christ quotes the Shema': 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One'; the Shema' (Dt 6<sup>4</sup>) was one of the earliest portions of the temple liturgy, and was recited every morning and evening. In the same section occurs a reference to the daily sacrifices in the temple, viz. that to love God and one's neighbour is 'more than whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices' (Mk 12<sup>33</sup>). Other references of this kind are in Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, where Christ speaks of the Sanhedrin ('Council'); Mt 5<sup>22, 24</sup>, where the offering on the altar in the Court of the Priests (see above, ii. 3) is mentioned; Mt 23<sup>167</sup>, which contains the prohibition of swearing by the temple or the altar; Mk 7<sup>11</sup>, where Christ speaks against an abuse which was clearly of frequent occurrence;\* the word korban (see CORBAN) was a technical term used in making vows, and meant that a gift was made to God; the abuse arose when a man would say to another (who as a relative or the like had a claim upon him): 'My property is korban to thee, for by this means he could prevent his relative from deriving any benefit from his possessions. Korban means lit. 'offering'; it was used also of the sacred treasury in which gifts for the temple were kept; it is used in this sense in Mt 275.+ In Mt 232 Christ speaks of 'Moses' seat,' i.e. the Rabbinic college, the official deliberations of which took place in the temple. Not all of these references were spoken in the temple itself, but it cannot be doubted that Christ had the temple, or something connected with it, in His mind when He spoke. Lastly, there are other passages which record sayings or actions of Christ in which a connexion of some kind with the temple is to be discerned, e.g. Jn 151 'I am the true vine'; golden vines, with immense bunches of grapes, were carved on the door leading into the Holy Place  $(H\hat{e}kh\bar{a}l)$ ; it is permissible to assume that Christ based His teaching here, as so often elsewhere, on what was familiar to His hearers. Again, at the washing of the disciples' feet, Jn 13<sup>36</sup> recalls to mind the priestly ablutions at the brazen laver near the great altar in the Priests' Court, preparatory to their undertaking the duties of the priestly office; it must be remembered that Christ, in the episode referred to, was about to perform an act apper-taining to His high-priestly office, and the disciples were being consecrated in a special manner to their future work.

One has but to bear in mind the part that the temple and its worship played among the Jews, not only of Palestine but also of the Diaspora, to realize that the references indicated above are not fanciful.

iv. CHRIST'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE TEMPLE worship.—The Gospels present to us two elements in Christ's attitude towards the temple and its system of worship which appear, at first sight, to be contradictory; but they can, nevertheless, be satisfactorily accounted for.

On the one hand, Christ evinces a great love and reverence for the temple; His frequent appearance there cannot have been only for the purpose of teaching the people, for, while it is true that the Gospels never directly record an instance of His offering sacrifice, there can be no reasonable doubt that He fulfilled the duties incumbent upon every true Israelite; this the following considerations will bear out:

The keynote of Christ's subsequent observance of the Law (cf. Mt  $5^{18}$ ) was already sounded at His presentation in the temple (Lk  $2^{22\cdot24}$ ); from boyhood He was taught to observe the Passover (Lk  $2^{41\cdot42}$ ), and it is inconceivable that He should, later on, have omitted what was a sacred duty in the eyes of every Jew, viz. taking His share in the family sacrifice in the temple at the Passover feast.

I See above, ii. 3.
¶ Although the Passover was celebrated in the home in our Lord's time as well as at the present day among Jews, yet the Paschal lamb might be killed only in the temple, the central sanctuary. At the Passover even laymen were permitted to kill the sacrificial animals, on account of the immense number that were offered. But, in any case, every Jew had to take part in the offering, by means of the consecrating act of laying the hand upon the victim on the altar.

Moreover, all Jews took a direct share in the Moreover, all Jews took a direct snare in the ordinary services and worship of the temple; a crowd of worshippers was always present at the daily morning and evening sacrifice which was offered up on behalf of the congregation; they waited either in meditation or in prayer while the high priest entered into the Holy Place to present the income offering and when he came forth they the incense-offering, and when he came forth they received, with bowed head, the priestly benediction; they listened to the chant of the Levites, and at the conclusion of each section, when the priests sounded their silver trumpets, the whole multi-tude prostrated themselves.* That Christ, furthermore, observed the Jewish feasts has already been shown, and His own words as to the celebration of the Passover (Lk 22<sup>rs.</sup>) clearly show His attitude towards the sacrificial system generally. Then, again, several occasions are recorded of His dissagail, several versions at 1 feet and 12 in the transition of the law of sacrifice: Mt 8<sup>4</sup> (cf. Mk 1<sup>44</sup>, Lk 5<sup>14</sup>) 5<sup>22, 24</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>, Lk 17<sup>14</sup> (cf. Jn 5<sup>46</sup> 7<sup>22</sup>); and His reference to the shewbread in Mk 2<sup>26</sup>, Lk 6<sup>4</sup> is also to the point. Indeed one has but to recall His instinctive desire to be 'in his Father's house' (Lk 2<sup>26</sup>), His zeal for the 'house of prayer' (Lk 19<sup>45, 46</sup>), His sense of the holy character of the sanctuary (Mt 23<sup>17</sup>), His insistence on the need of paying the temple tax (Mt 1724.), to realize how fully He acquiesced in the contemporary conceptions regarding the temple and its worship.

But, on the other hand, there are references, equally decisive, though fewer in number, in which both the temple and its worship are regarded as of quite subordinate importance. Thus in Mt 126, where Christ speaks of Himself as 'greater than the temple,' He was uttering words which, at all events to Jews, must have implied a depreciation of the temple; in the same passage the quotation from Hos 6 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice' (repeated in Mt 9<sup>13</sup>) pointed distinctly to the relative unimportance of sacrifice. Again, the parable of the Good Samaritan illustrates what Christ thought of the priesthood (Lk 10<sup>31</sup>); and most striking is His reply to those who lavished praise on the beauty of the temple: 'Verily, I say unto you, There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down' (Mt 24<sup>2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>1-3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>5-6</sup>), in connexion with which must be taken Jn 421 'Neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father.'

This twofold, and apparently contradictory, attitude of Christ towards the temple and its worship has also a twofold explanation. There can be little doubt, in the first place, that Christ's realization of the relatively minor importance of the temple and its worship stood in the closest relation to His second coming (παρουσία) and the doctrine of the last things. This is very distinctly seen in that it is immediately after the prediction of the destruction of the temple (Mt 24<sup>2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>1</sup>, Lk 21<sup>6</sup>) that He recounts the signs which shall precede His second coming (see esp. Mt 25<sup>315.</sup>, cf. 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup>); the near approach of the end (Mt 24<sup>14</sup>) emphasized the temporary character of the temple and all that pertained to it.§ In the second place, it is to be explained by the ever-widening conceptions which Christ experienced regarding His Person and work. In the early part of His ministry the influence of Jewish up-bringing and environment was strongly marked; but as the realization of His own Divine Personality and the world-embracing character of His work grew more and more clear, all that was distinctively Jewish and of local colour receded into comparative insignificance. The evolution of Christ's Divine consciousness brought with it new perspective, which revealed Him to Himself not merely as King of the Jews, but also as the Divine Saviour of the world (cf. Mt 24<sup>14</sup>).

Cleansing of the temple.—This episode, together with the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, is one of the few events (apart from the story of the Passion) recorded by all four Evangelists; this is significant, for its importance can scarcely be exaggerated. There are slight variations in the four accounts, but the substantial fact is identical in each (Mt 21<sup>12-17</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15-18</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45, 46</sup>, Jn 2<sup>14-21</sup>). It is necessary to realize clearly that this act of 'cleansing' (the expression is quite misleading) belonged to a definite course of action marked out by Christ for Himself, and that it formed the last great act [the narrative in Jn. being misplaced] of His public ministry prior to the Passion. It is therefore important to connect it with the leading events of

According to Mk., which may be regarded as offering the earliest and most strictly historical account, that which definitely and irrevocably marked the final breach between Christ and the ecclesiastical authorities was the question of Sabbath observance (cf. Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 68 ff.); the controversy on this subject culminated in the healing of the man with the withered hand on the Sabbath (Mk 31st.). This occurred in the country under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, i.e. during the Galilean ministry, which had as one of its most notable results the adhesion to Christ of the masses. It was on account of this popular support that the religious authorities deemed it advisable to get help from the secular arm, if this movement, so dangerous from their point of view, was to be checked. For this reason they appealed to the Herodians (Mk 3°); their appeal was evidently successful, for Christ found it necessary to leave Galilee, and to remain in such parts of the country as were outside the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas; thus freeing Himself from the molestations of the Herodians. During this time the multitudes flocked to Him; but His main purpose consisted in preparing His disciples for what was to come. This preparation went on for some months. Then Christ determined went on for some months. Then Christ determined to go up to Jerusalem for the Passover and appear publicly once more,* though He knew what the result must be, and did not hide it from His disciples (10<sup>25-24</sup>). He thereupon entered Jerusalem publicly, accompanied by His followers (11<sup>76</sup>), and the next day the 'cleansing' of the temple took place. That is to say, in the cycle of events just referred to, the 'cleansing' formed the climax. Now, the essence of practical Judaism, according to the ideas of the religious official classes, consisted. to the ideas of the religious official classes, consisted, above all things, in the strict observance of the Sabbath, and the due and regular carrying out of the sacrificial system. Christ had dealt with the former of these, as referred to above; and, in making it a real blessing, had of necessity run directly counter to the traditional rules of observance; that is to say, while holding firmly to the spirit of the Law, He abrogated the Sabbath in the old Jewish sense of the word. The 'cleansing' of the temple denotes His intention of doing the same

† This attitude of Christ towards the temple and its worship receives corroboration in an exceedingly interesting fragment of a lost Gospel, discovered at Oxynynchus, which contains an account of a visit of Christ and His disciples to the temple; they meet there a Pharisee who reproaches them with neglecting to perform the usual purification ceremony before entering the 'holy place' (presumably the Court of the Israelites is meant). Christ, in reply, emphasizes the need of inward purity, compared with which the outward ceremontal is as nothing (cf. Mt 233-35, Lk 1137-49).

with the other prime mark of practical Judaism, viz. the sacrificial system. That this is really the inner meaning of the 'cleansing' of the temple, the following considerations will show:

(i.) Excepting on this supposition, there was no meaning in Christ's action; the Onter Court, or 'Court of the Gentilea,' where the 'cleansing' took place (see above, ii. 1), was not 'sacred' soil; it cannot, therefore, have been on account of profanation of the temple that Christ acted as He did The sheep and oxen, doves, and money-changers, were all absolutely essential for the carrying on of the sacrificial system of the time; Christ's action was too significant to be misunderstood.—(ii.) The stress laid in each of the three Synoptics on the temple being a 'house of prayer,' seems to point in the same direction. There is some significance, too, in the dialogue which took place very shortly after between our Lord and one of the scribes (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>), when the latter says: '... and to love his neighbour as himself, is much more than whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices,'--words which Christ describes as 'discreet.'—(iii.) The event took place just before the Feast of the Passover, i.e. at a time when the sacrificial animals would be crowding in as they did at no other time of the year. This made Christ's action all the more significant.—(iv.) The whole belief and attitude of both hierarchy and people regarding the sacrifices were such that the abrogation of these latter was an indispensable necessity if Christ's teaching was to have practical and permanent results. Vast as the number of public, official sacrifices were, those of private individuals were of an infinitely greater number; it was these latter that formed one of the characteristic marks of the worship at Jerusalem.

'Here, day after day, whole crowds of victims were slaughtered and whole masses of flesh burnt, and when any of the high festivals came round, there was much a host of sacrifices to dispose of that it was convely possible to attend to them all, notwithstanding the fact that there were thousands of priests officiating on the occasion. But the people of farnel saw, in the punctilious observance of this worship, the principal means of excuring for themselves the favour of their God' (Schürer, HJP In. 1, 298).

These considerations seem to show that the 'cleansing' of the temple really did connote an intention in the mind of Christ to abrogate entirely the Jewish sacrificial system; if this is not what it meant, it is difficult to see any point in it at all. In how far Christ intended to mark Humself out as Him in whom was hereafter to be centred a purified, spiritual 'sacrificial system,'--or, in other words, what the relations were between the 'cleansing' of the temple and the words spoken in the upper chamber, 'This is my blood,' -is a question which cannot be dealt with here.

If the meaning of the Cleansing of the Temple here advocated be correct, it will at once be seen that few actions of our Lord possessed greater significance.

In Ja 12 'temptation' 14 used of trul generally, the issue of which is intended to be the crown of life; but in v. 13 'tempted' is used in the sense of solicited to sin; and the writer very emphatically asserts, 'God cannot be tempted (dwelpasros) with evil, and he himself tempteth no man.' This statement seems to be contradicted by man.' This statement seems to be contradicted by Jesus quotation from Dt 6s in His answer to the second temptation in Mt 47, as well as by the sixth petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 611); but tempting God does not mean soliciting Him to sin, but trying His justice and patience, challenging Him to give proof of His perfection to such a degree as to incur His displeasure, and to expose oneself to His judgment; and the temptations into which God is asked not to lead us, are the circumstances or the states of mind which, though to the strong they might prove the opportunities of winning 'the crown of life' (Ja 112), to weakness may be the occasions of failure and transgression may be the occasions of failure and transgression. This weakness of His disciples, while admitting their good intentions, Jesus recognizes in His warning in Gethsemane (Mt 2641), and commends their fidelity to Him in the trying experiences they had shared with Him (Lk 22<sup>20</sup>). To the enthusiastic but shallow hearers of His words He affirmed that trials (persecution, etc.) would prove morally fatal (Lk 8<sup>20</sup>). The cares and riches and pleasures of this life (v. 24) He regarded as hindrances to the higher life. Noteworthy is the emphasis He lays on the peril of wealth (Mt 19<sup>20</sup>, 20). That Jesus discovered the moral peril in which Judas was placed from the very first indications of distrust and disloyalty to Himself, is suggested by Jn 6<sup>20</sup>, 71, which loyalty to Himself, is suggested by Jn 6<sup>26, 71</sup>, which shows also the danger He feared for the other disciples. His repeated references to His coming betrayal (Mt 17<sup>22</sup> 20<sup>38</sup> 26<sup>3</sup>), His plain allusion to the presence of the traitor at the Last Supper (Lk 2221), His giving the sop to Judas (Jn 132), may all be regarded as loving endeavours to strengthen hun against temptation; and even when all these efforts had proved vain, what good was still in him was appealed to in the pathetic repreach, 'Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kise' (Lk 22"). Peter, too, was warned against the temptation that threat-ened him (Lk 22<sup>61, 32</sup>); and Jesus, who feared his fall through his self-confident weakness, hoped for his recovery, and the help he could be to others after his recovery, because He believed in the power of His own intercessory prayer

Jesus Himself was both tried and tempted. He seems to confess His own liability to temptation when He refuses the epithet 'good' (Lk 18"), although He never confesses to have fallen before temptation; and the attitude He assumes to sinners implies His own sinlessness. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (4") states His moral position in the words, 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin'; and St I'sul seems to indicate this liability to temptation without the actuality of sin in the phrase 'in the likeness of sinful fiesh' (Ho B"). St. Luke's statement that the tempter 'departed from him for a season' (4"), and Jesus' own reference to the temptations (Lk 22") which His disciples had endured with Him, show that the experience in the wilderness was not solitary. It is not improbable even that the narratives of the Temptation (Mt 4"), Mk 1"2. It 4". It 4". In are a summary of a succession of moral trisls through which Jesus in the course of His ministry passed, or at least that this record of an early experience has been coloured by reminiscences of later experiences. Be this as it may, we can find in the Gospals indications of similar trials of His fidelity to God. The desire of the people for healing (Jn 449) and bread (628), the demand of His enemies for to God. a sign (Mt 16<sup>1</sup>), the attempt to make Him a king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>), may be regarded as illustrations of the three kinds of temptation recorded. A careful study of the record of the early ministry (in Jn 2-4) warrants the assumption that Jesus was tempted by His enthusiasm (which see) to force the issue between Him and His enemies prematurely, and that the reserve in language and restraint in action He displayed as soon as He had discovered this peril, are to be regarded as a conquest over temptation. His 'escapes,' as Bruce calls them (With Open Face, ch. vii.), were intended, in the later part of His Galilæan ministry at least, not only to secure quiet for the training of the Twelve, but to withdraw Him from the danger threatened by His enemies. Had He run risks before His hour, He would have fallen before what seems to be indicated by the Second Temptation (Mt 45.5). His own family were a source of moral peril to Him. His words to His mother in Cana (Jn 24) are explicable only if in her request He found a suggestion of evil, that He should use His miraculous power at the bidding of His natural affec-tion instead of at God's command alone. The completeness of His repudiation of the claims of His mother and brethren upon Him in relation to His public ministry indicates how intensely He felt this peril (Mt 1248.49). The attempt to influence Him was nevertheless renewed by His brethren, when they advised Him to go up to the feast and so manifest Himself to the world (Jn 7<sup>3.4</sup>). Peter was rebuked as the Tempter (Mt 16<sup>23</sup>) almost immediately after being commended as the Con-fessor, because he sought to turn Jesus from His sacrifice. May His refusal of the request of the Syrophonician woman (Mt 15<sup>24-27</sup>) not have been due to the fear lest a ministry of healing among the Gentiles might divert Him from the path of sacrifice to which He knew that His Father called Him? The request of the Greeks also (Jn 12<sup>21</sup>) stirred so deep emotion, because it seemed to suggest the possibility of an escape from the Cross, which had to be rejected as a temptation. The same temptation in its most acute form presents itself in the Agony (which see) in Gethsemane.

Tests or trials which were not felt by Jesus as temptations, but which were intended by His enemies either to discredit Him with the multitude or to obtain some ground of accusation against Him, were the questions addressed to Him about the tribute to Cæsar, the resurrection, and the greatest commandment (Mt 2215-40), and divorce (193). man with the withered hand in the synogogue (Lk 66.7) was a trap set for Him, to involve Him in the guilt of Sabbath-breaking; so also was the woman taken in adultery (Jn 86), that He might either by His severity estrange the people, or by His laxity be shown to be in opposition to the Mosaic law. The sufferings and sorrows Jesus passed through were Divinely appointed trials that He might learn obedience, and so be made perfect (He 54 210); but it is not necessary here to illustrate this discipline in detail (see STRUGGLES OF SOUL). To the data from the Gospels here presented, a few observations may be added regarding the possibility, the necessity, and the nature of temptation in Jesus' life.

As God cannot be tempted, the liability of Jesus to temptation proves that there was a Divine Kenosis (which see) involved in the incarnation of the Son of God. Jesus could be tempted, because He was limited in knowledge, subject to emotion, He was limited in knowledge, subject to emotion, and undergoing a moral development. Omniscience has an insight into the moral character of all conduct, and a foresight into the moral issues of all choice, which exclude even the possibility of all choice, which exclude even the possibility of temptation; omnipotence has such a command over all its moral resources that its moral efforts can never involve any moral strain, such as is experienced in temptation; omniscience and omni-potence, therefore, cannot know the disturbance of feeling which is possible to limited knowledge and power. To ascribe these Divine attributes to the incarnate Son of God is to deny His liability to temptation, and to make His moral development a semblance and not a reality. Liability to temptation, necessary to moral development, does not, however, imply any necessity to sin. There may be growth unto perfection, with a constant choice of good. Temptation does not arise only in a sinful Natural instincts and appetites, which are morally neutral, become sinful only when seen to be in conflict with the will of God as revealed in conscience. The opinions, sentiments, and desires of sinful men may become the occasions of tempta-tion to a sinless nature. Temptation is not sin, involves no necessity of sin, although it brings the possibility of sin.

It was necessary for the fulfilment of Christ's vocation as the Saviour of men that He should be tempted without sin. His moral teaching gains tempted without sin. His moral teaching gains force from His moral example, and He can be a moral example to us only because He passed through a human moral development. His own moral struggles enable Him to feel with us in ours (He 4<sup>18</sup>). To condemn the sin of mankind (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>) it was needful for Him not only to suffer for sin, but also to overcome sin by withstanding its assaults.

The nature of His temptation was determined by The nature of fits temptation was determined by His unique vocation. The lower passions and appetites seem never to have assailed Him. He was tempted to abuse His miraculous power, His privileged position, His supreme authority as Son of God, to fulfil the popular expectations instead of His own ideal of the Messiahship, to shrink from the agony and desolation of the Cross. His terminations transported the common experience temptations transcended the common experience as much as He Himself did; but, though possible to Him alone, they were as real for Him as are the lower temptations for other men. ALFRED E. GARVIE.

TEMPTATION (in the Wilderness). -[On the general subject of temptation see preced. article,. The continuousness and variety of our Lord's temptations have probably been obscured by the circumstance that attention has been concentrated upon one episode in His life which is distinctively known as 'The Temptation.' This very significant incident is fully related in Mt. (4<sup>1-11</sup>) and Lk. (4<sup>1-13</sup>), mentioned in Mk. (1<sup>12, 18</sup>), and omitted from the Fourth Gospel. St. Mark's account is of the routh Gospel. St. Mark's account is of the briefest: 'And straightway the Spirit urges him forth into the desert. And he was in the desert forty days, tempted by Satan; and he was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered to him.'* The mention of 'wild beasts,' which is peculiar to Mark, is usually supposed to be introduced for the supposed to be introduced. duced for the purpose of accentuating the solitariness of Jesus, and His remoteness from all human aid. But Professor Bevan (Trans. of Soc. of Hist. Theol. 1901-2) finds in this mention the key to the whole incident. It seems that in the East, or at any rate in Persia, there is a traditional custom, called 'the subjugation of the jinn.' In order to achieve this victory the candidate retires to a desert place, fasts for forty days, and when the jinns appear in the forms of a lion, a tiger, and a dragon, he must hold his ground fearlessly. Doing so, power over the demons is attained. 'The conclusion,' says Professor Bevan, 'which we may draw from these facts is that the story of the Temptation, in its original form, was a description of a practice by means of which it was believed that man could acquire the power of controlling the demons. The analogy is interesting. Our Lord in this critical conflict with Satan did bind the strong man, and secured that in all future encounters He would conquer. But is there any evidence at all that the Persian custom pre-vailed among the Jews? Is there any ground for supposing either that our Lord would follow such a custom, or, on the other hand, that there is no

a custom, or, on the other hand, that there is no foundation for the story of the Temptation in the facts of His career? And is not the simple expression, ħν μετὰ τῶν θηρίων, inadequate to suggest such a conflict as is supposed?*

Order of Temptations.—In Mt. and Lk. the order of the second and third temptations is inverted, while the substance of them remains identical. The order followed by Mt. is generally accepted as correct. There seems to be an ascending scale in the temptations as recorded in the First Gospel, though Plummer (Lk 4°) says: 'The reasons given for preferring one order to the other are subjective for preferring one order to the other are subjective for preferring one order to the other are subjective and unconvincing. Perhaps neither Evangelist professes to give any chronological order.' Source of the story.—As, according to all the accounts, Jesus was not accompanied by anyone during His temptation, the question naturally arises, How did the knowledge of what took place become public property? To this there can be but one answer: Our Lord informed His disciples of what had taken place. That He should have done one answer: Our Loru informed his disciples of what had taken place. That He should have done so is probable. At first, perhaps, they might not be prepared to understand the incident; but after they had acknowledged Him as Messiah many questions as to His procedure must have arisen in their minds, and to these questions an account of His initial temperatures was the best apparent.

His initial temptations was the best answer.

Character of the incident.—The more clearly the reality of the Temptation is grasped, the less need does there seem for supposing that the tempter took a visible shape, or that any bodily transport to 'the high mountain' or 'the wing of the temple' took place. It is more difficult to determine whether such bodily transport was thought of by the Evangelists or is implied in their words. In Lk. the 'high mountain' is omitted except in so far as reference may be found to it in the word drayayar. In the Gospel of the Hebrews there occurs a characteristic apocryphal embellishment:
'Forthwith my Mother the Holy Spirit took me
by one of the hairs of my head and carried me away to the high mountain of Tabor.

Its connexion .- In all the Synoptic Gospels and in the development of our Lord's life, the Tempta-tion follows upon the Baptism. In His Baptism He had been proclaimed Messiah, called out of private into public life, summoned to take among men a place which could be filled by Himself alone. He was called from the carpenter's shop to redeem a world. The village youth was to represent in His person the wisdom, the holiness, the love, the authority of the Highest. How could He face this task? By what hitherto untried methods accomplish it? He had no counsellor, example, or guide. None had as yet attempted or even adequately conceived the part He was to play.

Its necessity.—The burden and glory, the hazard and intricacy and responsibility of His vocation must have stirred in His soul a ferment of emotions. O. Holtzmann may overstate the risk when he says (Life of Jenis, Eng. tr. 141): 'There was a grave danger of His personal life being disturbed by so august a revelation, of its causing Him to plunge headlong into fantastic dreams of the future, and into acts of violence, with the object of realizing His dreams.' Our Lord was not unprepared for the great vocation: He must often have considered the great vocation; He must often have considered how He could best bring light and life to His fellow-countrymen, but now that He was actually launched on the work, all past thoughts must have seemed insufficient, and He felt that still His decisions were The Spirit to be made. Solitude was necessary. that came upon Him in Baptism compelled Him to contemplate action, and in order that He might finally choose His path and His methods He must turn away from the expectant gaze and eager inquiries of John's disciples and seek the solitude of the desert.

Its conditions. — The intensity of our Lord's emotion and the difficulty of decision are conveyed by the Evangelists' statement that for forty days (i.e. for an unusually long period, 'forty' being used as a round number indicative of magnitude)' He forgot to eat. This gives us the measure of His absorption in thought. The temptations indeed are spoken of as if they occurred at the close of the forty days' fast; naturally, because then only out of the turmoil of thought did these three possible lines of conduct become disengaged and present themselves as now finally rejected. To present themselves as now finally rejected. one who adequately conceives the stupendous task awaiting our Lord and the various methods of accomplishing it which He had often heard discussed, no statement of His absorption in thought or of the strife of contending pleas will seem exaggerated.

Lines on which the Temptation proceeded.—The key to the Temptation is found in the necessity laid upon Jesus of definitely determining the principles and methods of the great work that awaited Him. There were necessarily present to His mind as possible courses the various expecta-tions current among the people. Eventually these presented themselves in three great questions: Am I as Messiah lifted above human needs and trials? What means may I legitimately use to convince the people of my claims? What kind of Messianic kingdom and Messianic King am I to represent? To each of these questions there was an answer present to the mind of the Lord, cherished by most of the people He was now to influence, and with much which superficially commended it, but which He recognized as Satanic.

The absence of the article before wise has given rise to the idea that the temptations were not Messianic. Against this it has been pointed out that the predicate is regularly anarthrous. But Middleton (Gr. Article, p. 62) shows that 'we sometimes find that the predicate of the will have the Article, where the subject is a personal pronoun or demonstrative, iyw, will, ever, etc. This rule is borne out by NT usage: see Mt 1016 268 271, Mk 311 etc. For this and other reasons we should expect the Article here, if the meaning were, 'If thou art the Son of God, or, the Christ.' The meaning rather is, 'If there are God's flow (the complatic place being given to use, a size of " 6 size,' if this relationship to God be the determining element in your life. But this by no means excludes reference to His Messianic dignity, it rather implies it. It was as God's Bon He had been hailed at His baptism perceisming His Messianic vocation, and fitly, because Divine Souship was that out of which the Messiahip suprang, and which underlay the whole vocation of Jesus as the Christ.

* Besides, as O. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, 143) says: 'In old Israelitish times lions still inhabited the thickets beside the Jordan (Jer 49<sup>19</sup>); in the age of Jesus the chief beast of prey in Palestine was, as it still is, the jackal. But Mark's sole object in making this addition would appear to have been the desire to bring into greater relief Jesus' complete severance from human society, with the idea of imparting more body to his description.' Dr. Abbott's Clue, p. 115, is suggestive in this connexion.

&quot;'It is only by travelling that one becomes aware how universal is the application of the number 40 to the features of Oriental architecture. If there is a famous building with something over a score of columns, or a town with a like number of minarets, it will be styled the hall of 40 columns or the city of 40 towers' (Arthur Arnold in Academy, 12 March 1881). "Forty" means "many" (Angus, Bible Handbook).

First temptation.—The first temptation was to use for His own comfort and preservation the powers committed to Him as Messiah. The circumstances in which He found Himself lent immense force to the appeal. He found Himself faint and ready to periah. What a flasco would His Messianic calling seem if He died here in the wilderness, and how easy apparently the means of relief: 'Say the word.' 'How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds makes ill deeds done!' Once only in His life can He have suffered more acutely from this same temptation: only when He knew He could command twelve legions of angels to His aid, only when He was taunted, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save.' The use He might legitimately make of His powers as God's Son must once for all be settled: and He settles it by recognizing that having taken human nature He must accept human conditions, and elevate human life not by facing life's temptations on wholly different terms from the normal, but by accepting the whole human conflict: 'Man lives—and I, being man, therefore live—not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' He accepted absolutely the human condition with its entire dependence on God. Duty was more than food. His life was to be ruled by intimations of God's will, not by fear of death by starvation. He, like all other men, was in God's hand.

Second temptation.—The second temptation was to establish the Messianic claim by the performance of some astounding feat, such as leaping from the roof of the wing of the temple into the crowded courts below. Once for all our Lord had to settle by what methods His claim could be made good. That which the people so frequently demanded, 'a aign,' must have suggested itself as a possible means of convincing them. And it was an easy means, for was it not written in the book He had pondered as His best guide. 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone' (Ps 91<sup>10.1</sup>)? Were these words not prepared for this Messianic manifestation? Could the people, ever craving for signs, be in any other way led to accept Him as God's messenger? Might not His whole mission fail, might He not miss the accomplishment of God's purpose, if He did not condescend to the weakness of His countrymen and grant them a sign? But now, as always, He saw the incongruity and insufficiency of such signs: 'an evil and adulterous generation seeketh a sign, and no sign shall be given to it '(Mt 12<sup>20</sup>)). But that which settles the matter in His own mind is the consideration that to attempt the performance of any such feat would be a tempting of God. He rebuts the temptation with the words, 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.' He perceived that He had no right to expect the protection of God in any course but the highest, in any course which His own conscience told Hun was a short cut to His end. 'To abandon the region of man's actual needs and work wonders not for their relief and as the revelation of God's love, but for mere display, was, He felt, to trespass the Father's intentions. He could not count upon the Father's countenance and help if He departed in the slightest degree from

Third temptation.—The third question which had now once for all to be settled was, What kind of kingdom must the Messiah establish? Shall it be a kingdom of this world, such as many expected and would promptly aid Him to secure? The glory of the kingdoms of the earth had a present lustre all its own. There was in their power and opportunity an appeal to beneficent ambition not easily resisted. What might not be accomplished for the down-trodden, the heavily-taxed, the outcast, the despairing? He had Himself groaned with the rest of His countrymen under the unrighteous exactions of fraudulent publicans; why not win for His people the blessings of freedom. More than once this temptation returned in the attempts of the multitude to make Him a king. But our Lord recognized that for Him to depart from the idea of founding a spiritual kingdom in which God should be acknowledged would be to serve Satan. The craving for earthly dominion was inextricably mixed up with worldly ambitions, and could only be gratified by the use of means alien to the Divine Spirit. He felt such a kingdom to be incompatible with the sole and exclusive service of God—not that all earthly kingdoms are necessarily Satanic, but His calling was to introduce the true reign of God among men. He saw that in order to win earthly dominion He would require to appeal to evil passions and use such means as the sword—in a word, to avail Himself of the aid of evil. This was impossible.

TERT (σεψή). The light shelter of the nomad, here to-day and away to-morrow, is an apt symbol of what is fleeting and transitory. This lends the suggestion of irony to our Lord's phrase (Lk 16°) 'eternal tents.' The notion of transiency is uppermost also in 2 Co 5<sup>1.4</sup> (σεήρος).

The ordinary Eastern tent is made of black goats'-hair cloth, spun and woven by the women with very primitive implements. The women pitch the tents, and on removing they strike and pack them for the journey. The roof is supported by three rows of three upright posts, from 6 feet to 8 feet in height, the middle row being highest. It is stretched by cords fastened to the edges, and attached to pegs driven firmly into the ground. The 'walls' are hung like curtains round the eaves, and a breadth of cloth across the tent cuts off the women's compartment from that open to the public. It is an effective shelter from the sun. When wet, the cloth shrinks and becomes quite waterproof, says may also mean a hut, booth, or other temporary structure, like those made by the Arab- of el-Hulte from the reeds that abound in the marshes close by the base of Hermon. Peter was doubtless familiar with these rude peasant structures, the leafy shelters erected on the roofs for cool retreat in summer, and the booths for the Feast of Tabernacles (Mt 17° etc.).

does not occur elsewhere in the Gospels. rendering 'covenant' (wh. see) is unquestionably right: 'testament' has come from the Lat. Versions.

 In classical literature διαθήκη denoted a will, and apparently nothing else (Ar. Av. 440, if an exception, is unique). A Greek will, however, was a settlement or trust-deed rather than a will in the Roman (i.e. the modern) sense. In it the conditions of inheritance were, indeed, in the first place at the sole discretion of the testator, but it was publicly and solemnly executed, and thereupon at once became absolute, irrevocable, and unalterable.

3. The LXX translators adopted the word as the equivalent of the Heb. The following considerations are supposed to have influenced their choice:—(a) διαθήκη represented essentially a 'one-sided covenant,' συνθήκη (the ordinary word) a mutual one; (b) διαθήκη was charged with religious ideas, inasmuch as the Greek will conveyed the religious institutions as well as the property of the family (cf. the similar case of the Hebrew 'birthright'). It may possibly also have been used, in the popular spoken dialect, in a wider sense than that of a will (cf. $2.5.2(2-2-1))

4. (a) The special reference in Lk 1<sup>72</sup> [= Ps 105<sup>8t.</sup>?] is to the covenant with Abraham (Gn 15. 17). (b) The words of Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>24</sup> [Lk 22<sup>20</sup>] are plainly drawn from Ex 24<sup>3</sup>. The addition of 'new' (AV, RVm) in Mt. and Mk., ll.cc., has small MS authority, and is rejected in RV text: it is due to 1 Co 11<sup>26</sup>. Yet the idea of a 'new covenant' had been the theme of OT prophets (cf. Jer 31<sup>215</sup>. etc.), and its application to the Christian covenant was in current use among the Apostles: the 'old' was in current use among the Apostles: the 'old' covenant in the implied contrast was the Mosaic not the Abrahamic (2 Co 36, He 915 etc.), and the allusion to Ex 248 seems tacitly to suggest the same contrast here.

TETRARCH (τετράρχη is the classical form, but in NT the MS evidence is strongly in favour of τετραάρχη [Tisch., WH, and Nestle]).—The title is used in the Gospels of Antipas (Mt 14¹, Lk 3¹. ¹º 9⁻), and of Philip and Lysanias (Lk 3¹). Originally it denoted the ruler of a fourth part of a country or province. Euripides (Alc. 1154) is the earliest writer to use the term reprosed and applies it to writer to use the term τετραρχία, and applies it to Thessaly, which in primitive times was divided for civil administration into four districts. This arrangement was restored in the constitution given by Philip of Macedon (Demos. Philipp. iii. 26, where the word is clearly technical and free from the doubt in which Euripides leaves it). system was met with in Galatia, where each of the system was net with in Galatta, where each of the three tribes had its four tetrarchs (Strabo, 430, 566 f.). Pompey afterwards reduced the number to three, one for each tribe, but retained the original title (Appian, Mithridat. 46). Thenceforward, if not at an even earlier date, the name lost its etymological meaning, and could be applied to any petty dependent prince, subordinate in rank to kings but enjoying some of the prerogatives of sovereignty (Cic. pro Milone, xxviii. 76; Hor. Sat. I. iii. 12; Tac. Ann. xv. 25; et al.). Such tetrarchs seem to have been numerous, especially in Syria. Antony conferred the title upon both Herod and his brother Phasael (Jos. Ant. XIV. xiii. 1, BJ I. xii. 5); but the rank was almost purely titular, and left them inferior in dignity to the high priest, Hyrcanus II. In B.C. 30 another brother, Pheroras, was made tetrarch of Peræa (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3), the nominal honour being maintained on an income granted by Herod him-self. In the Gospels the etymological signification of the term has evaporated. For, though Herod divided his kingdom into four parts, the one assigned to Salome consisted merely of a palace with the revenue of certain so-called free towns, and was in no sense a tetrarchy. With this exception, his kingdom was divided into three parts, and the title of 'tetrarch' was conferred by the will of Rome upon Antipas and Philip, whilst that of 'ethnarch,' or recognized head of a nation, was similarly bestowed upon Archelaus. On two occasions Antipas is styled 'king' (Mt 14°, cf. 14¹, Mk 6¹⁴. 22.22.); and the obvious explanation is that his subjects were encouraged, and some of them his subjects were encouraged, and some of them perhaps disposed, to speak of him by the higher title, for which Rome had substituted a lower, without any allusion to its strict meaning. Similarly in the case of Lysanias. He was ruler of the district of Abila in the Lebanon, which had been severed from the kingdom of Ituræa on the execution of Lysanias I. in B.C. 36. That kingdom was in the course of time broken up into three parts, of which Abilene formed one, with another Lysanias as its tetrarch (Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 10, XIX. v. 1; CIG 4521, 4523). The term may have been selected because of the smallness of the district in comparison with the earlier kingdom, but it preserves no record of the division of a country or associa-tion of tribes into four parts. In the Gospels the tetrarch is merely a petty prince, dependent upon Rome for the retention of his few emblems of sovereignty, whilst encouraged to self-repression and loyal service by an occasional promotion to a higher dignity.

TEXT OF THE GOSPELS .-- 1. The problem .-All true criticism must begin by taking cognizance of, and as far as possible accounting for, existing facts. The leading facts in regard to the text of the Gospels may be briefly stated as follows:

(i.) A Greek text substantially the same as the text underlying the AV has been almost universally accepted by Christendom as the authentic Greek text from about the year A.D. 350 till the development in modern times of the critical study of the text of the NT. This text is found in the great mass of existing Greek MSS, and was used by almost all ecclesiastical writers from Chrysostom onwards. Translated into Syriac, under the name of the Peshitta version, it was used by most of the Syriac-speaking Churches from at least the 4th cent. onwards. It was the only Greek text printed on the revival of learning in the West, and received the name of Textus Receptus (TR) from an expression used in the preface to the second Elzevir edition, 1633: 'textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum, in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum damus.

(ii.) Against this general unanimity in regard to the Greek text must be set the fact that the Churches of the West read the Gospels in the Latin translation of Jerome (A.D. 384), according to a text substantially different from the TR. Moreover, existing MSS and Patristic quotations of the earlier Latin versions differed from the TR even more fundamentally, and similar types of text are found to have been very widely spread, speaking in a geographical sense, and occur in some important MSS, in many ancient Versions, and in the quotations of many Christian writers, especially in the earliest times. This text (or, more correctly speaking, texts of this type) has been named 'Western'; and, although it has long been well known that the term is not exclusively applicable in a geographical sense (indeed, it is quite possible that at least some members of this family may have had their rise in the East), yet for the sake of convenience it must for the present be employed.

(iii.) But a few of our earliest Greek MSS, sup-Pathers of the earlier centuries, and by a few Versions, present a different text, which has com-mended itself on its intrinsic merits, as well as on account of its proved antiquity. to most modern critical scholars: it forms the base of practically all the modern critical editions, and of our English RV.

2. The Received Text.—A text substantially the same as the TR has been called by Dean Burgon and his school the 'Traditional Text'; by Dr. Hort (in the Introduction to Westcott and Hort's The New Testament in the Original Greek) the 'Syrian' Text. Hort also suggests the name 'Antiochian,' which is preferable, because it avoids any chance of confusion with the totally distinct Syriac versions. For reasons that will be explained later on in this article, Hort considers that the Antiochian text affords practically no evidence for the reconstruction of the original Greek of the NT, and he may therefore be considered as the most extreme opponent of the TR. In his opinion (Introduction, § 185) the Antiochian text 'must be the result of a recension in the proper sense of the word, a work of attempted criticism, performed deliberately by editors and not merely by scribes.' He further distinguishes two stages in the revision, and thinks (§ 190) that the final process was completed by 350 or thereabouts, and that the first process took place at some date between 250 and 350. According to Burgon and his close follower Miller, these recensions are purely imaginary creations; they believe the Church of Antioch (in company, no doubt, with practically all the Greek-speaking Churches) to have preserved the pure text from the first. It is at any rate certain that Chrysostom used this text: he was born at Antioch about the middle of the 4th cent., and lived in that city till 398, when he became bishop of Con-stantinople. We have seen above that even the main opponents of this text allow that it took its final shape probably about the time of Chrysostom's birth. From that time onwards it held practically undisputed sway, and the main mass of later MSS contain it. When at length, some time after the introduction of printing, the first New Testaments in Greek were published, they naturally rested on the MSS in ordinary ecclesiastical use, and thus the Antiochian text became the 'Received' Greek text of modern Christendom, from which our own AV was made.

from which our own AV was made.

As has been shown above, the history of the printed text in the 16th cent. is part of the history of the Antiochian text; although of no critical importance, it is a subject very full of interest. [A good short account of the early printed editions will be found in Scrivener's Plain Introduction (cd. Miller, 1894), vol. ii. ch. vii. Cf. also Tregelles, Account of the Printed Text of the Greek NT, 1864]. The NT was first printed in Greek as vol. v. of the Complutensian Polyglott Bible. This magnificent work was prepared at the cost of Francis Kimenes de Cisneros, Cardinal-Archbishop of Toledo, and was printed at Alcals (Complutum), where he had founded a university. The OT was given in Hebrew, Latin, and Greek; the Apocrypha and NT in Greek and Latin. The volume containing the NT (which was the first to be printed) was completed on 10th Jan. 1514; but owing to the death of the truly great Cardinal, the publication of the whole work was delayed, the Pope's license not being granted till 22nd March 1520. Meanwhile, in order to forestall the Spanish edition, John Froben, the celebrated publisher at Basle, employed Erasmus to prepare an edition of the NT in Greek, accompanied by a revised Latin version: this was hurried through the press, and published in 1516. Erasmus published other editions are those of Robert Stephen (especially the folio of 1550, which is regarded by many as the standard text), Theodore de Bèze (Beza), and the brothers Elzevir. All printed editions, even those prepared by the great founders of textual criticism, were based upon the TR until 1831, when Lachmann published a text constructed directly from the ancient documents.

Whatever may be the ultimate verdict of textual criticism, the TR must always remain a monument worthy of deep veneration and of close study. It is an essential factor in the history of the development of Christianity. Through it the Spirit of God has, during the greater part of the existence of the Church of Christ, spoken to the greater number of her members. It has controlled the doctrine and the life of Christians, and by its means we have been freed, in part at least, from the heavy yoke of mediæval sacerdotalism and superstition. Those who translated it into modern languages have left us in their work something of their own life and spirit. If extent of influence for good is to be our criterion, then surely, what-ever its origin, the TR and the translations made from it bear the impress of the seal of God's Spirit, and have an unsurpassed and almost unsurpassable claim to the veneration and gratitude of mankind.

This much every thinking Christian will surely grant. But it is a different thing to go on to say: therefore this text must be the original authentic text. It would be as logical to argue that because the gospel was given to the world in the Greek language, therefore Jesus must have spoken in the same language. It is quite in accordance with our experience of God's methods of working that He should employ an instrument fashioned and conditioned not only by the circumstances under which it took its rise, but also by those through which it has passed in the course of its history.

It is an unfortunate thing that Burgon and Miller's writings seem to imply (we believe, indeed, that the Dean stated it in so many words) that of necessity God must have provided for the accurate preservation of the text of the book which He had given to man. It appears to have been inconceivable to Burgon that the true text should be any other than that commonly accepted by the Church: to him the Church was the guardian of Holy Writ in the same sense as some people believe her to be the guardian of doctrine. If this view, even though not expressly stated, is felt to underlie the student's conclusions, then those conclusions are removed from the domain of matters with which the critic can deal. They may, as in the case of views as to the authority of the Church in matters of faith, or of theories as to the inspiration of the Bible, conceivably rest on a true spiritual perception, but they do not rest on evidence, with which alone the critic is competent to deal. We have pointed out above that a large, and the most enlightened, portion of the Christian Church read the Scriptures in the Vulgate, or Latin translation of Jerome, and regarded it as the only authoritative exponent of the true text and sense of the original. There never has been a unanimous tradition as to the never has been a unanimous tradition as to the text of Scripture: only for the three centuries that followed the first printing of the Greek NT has there been even an appearance of such unanimity. But though the writings of Burgon and Miller force one to the conclusion that for them personally their theory rested on a priori grounds, yet they have with great labour, assiduity, and learning collected a vast amount of evidence in support of the 'Traditional Text.' Unfortunately. Burgon wrote in such a contemptuous nately, Burgon wrote in such a contemptuous manner of the leading textual critics and of the most ancient MSS of the NT that most of his work has the appearance of an ex parte statement rather than of a solid contribution to the investigation of a difficult problem. Miller, who edited and completed many of Burgon's papers after his death, adopted a more temperate tone; but so much of Burgon's language is incorporated, that the subject is still treated rather after the fashion of a polemical controversy than of a critical investiga-

* This Introduction was written by Dr. Hort, and will in this article be cited under his name, though the two editors accept joint responsibility for it.

Mureover, Burgon's contention was that the tion *Traditional Text' is the only one that has any claim to be regarded as the true text; all documents that differ from it are treated as of practically no value Hort, on the other hand, considered the 'Traditional' or 'Antiochian' text to be valueless as evidence. Thus the subject has been treated at its extreme points, and neither side has taken sufficient trouble to discover how much truth is contained in the views of the other side. We lay a good deal of stress on this matter, because we think there has been a strong disposition to regard the 'Traditional Text' as a hobby of Burgon's, and to treat his defence of it with the nurgen s, and to treat his defence of it with the same contempt that he poured so freely on others.

3. Hort's 'Syrian' or 'Antiochian' Text. In part m. of Hort's Introduction, chapter m bears the heading, 'Results of Genealogical Evidence proper.' Section i. (8) 130-168) is devoted to proving the posteriority of Antiochian to other known types of readings. We hope to show later on that the eviposterior year. We hope to show later on that the evidence here adduced is not entitled to be called 'genealogical' in a strict sense, but with this we the moment concerned. Hort begins (§ 130) by stating the incontrovertible fact that all great variations of text were prior to the 5th cent., since the text of Chrysostom and other Syrian Fathers of the 4th cent. is substantially identical with the common late text; and (§ 131) the text of every other considerable group of documents is shown by analogous evidence of Fathers and Versions to be of equal or greater antiquity. If we were living in the age of Chrysostom, the problem to be solved would in all essential points be the same as it is now. Hort then adduces three lines of evidence to prove the posteriority of Antiochian readings: (i.) by analysis of conflate readings (§ 132-151), (ii.) by Ante Nicene Patristic evidence (§ 152-162), (iii.) by internal evidence of Syrian (i.e. Antiochian) readings (§ 163-168). We must deal with each of these divisions separately.

(i.) When one reading is found in one group of documents, another in a second group, and the two different readings are found combined in a third group, this reading is said to be 'conflate.' Of course it has to be assumed that the first two readings are prior to the conflate reading, or else it is not a conflate reading at all. Thus the argument goes in a circle, unless cither it can be proved that the two separate readings existed at a time when it can be shown that the conflate reading did not, or the conflate reading is so obviously wrong that it cannot conceivably be the original reading. If neither of these conditions is fulfilled, then con clusions based on the so-called conflate readings are matters of judgment, not of evidence. Hort adduces and examines eight cases of readings which he believes to be conflate: in each case, according to his view, the Antiochian text has combined two separate readings found in earlier texts. Obviously eight examples, taken four from blark and four from Luke, afford but a slender feundation on which to build: it may be, and has been, urged that these eight examples are only specimens taken from a large number available, but until further examples are collected and published the case must be judged by the eight given.

For the sake of illustration, we give here the main readings in the instance selected for special discussion by Hort. In Mk 678 following and the people saw them going, and many knows them, and they can there together on foot from all the cities) we find the following readings:

may reading aware (and outsent them), it is lect 49 Lat. vg Boh

Arm and (with everifies for excision), he leek in lat ve bon Arm and (with everifies to excision) Lat 13 leek 39, by ve had not everified every int.

In this case it will be noticed that there is no evidence to show that are evidence for an everythe acres is one was ever read, moreover, the evidence for an everythe acres is very slender, and quite possibly later than the supposed conflation. Mill suggested with much probability that I consisted the words and outered them because they contradicted Mi 1412 and Lk 911 the revorts followed him. Ewele, ad loc, quotes it as reading evolpasses were acress an everythe rose sures; this appears to have been another was of getting rid of the words objected to. The reading of the mass of MNS gives such good sense that Bort himself any (1 186). There is nothing in the sense that that himself any (1 186), There is nothing in the sense that that himself any (1 186). There is nothing in the sense that would tempt to ateration all rune easily and smoothly, and there is neither contradiction nor manifest tactology', and again (3 188). 'Had it been the only extant reading, it would have roused no suspicion'. He does, indeed, argue that the fresh point made by and came topether wat of are simply spolis the point of $\delta \text{labe} in \times 21, the multitude "followed" (Mi, Luke) the Lord to the desert region (mi), but the actual arrival at His presence was due to His act, not theirs, for He "cane out" of His retirement in some sequentered nook to meet them. But Swete, ad for, far more naturally takes to the first or mach the spot whither Jesus and His clamples were going, they ran together on the back to meet Him, and as He landed He my them, and realized that the could not see ure the quiet He sought. It is therefore quite possible that the reading of abla is due to the accelerated that the could not see ure the quiet He sought. It is therefore quite possible that the reading of meet he where, and therefore quite possible that the reading of aBLA is due to the accidental emission of a clause,

In none of the eight cases can it be proved that the two parts of the longer reading both existed separately at a time when the combined reading did not exist, and it is a matter of opinion whether the readings in which the two separate ones are combined are likely to be right or not.

Dr Salmon (Some Thoughts on the Textual Critician of the NT, p. 6%) min that "Canon (ook elaborately discussed Hort's eight cases, contending that in every one of them the conflation hypothesis gives the less probable account of the facta." He asks "In each of these cases I did not miself follow flort altogether without misetings." Miller also discusses the supposed conflations in Appendix II, of his "Causes of Corruption," and makes not a fatily good case for the originality of the supposed conflate readings.

It will be convenient to follow Hort's example in giving at this point some general considerations in regard to the character and the use of Patriatic evidence. We will speak first of the disadvantages and difficulties experienced in using it. To begin with, the material is necessarily very fragmentars in more senses than one. Each we tergulous but a I mittel number of passages, the use of Patriatic evidence. We will speak first of the disarbantages and difficulties experienced in using it. To begin with, the material is necessarily very fragmentars in more senses train one. Such we templotes but a 1 inited number of passages, so that it is only in the case of a few specially prominent passages that we can get together a really representative collection of Patristic quotations. It follows that any kind of Patristic apparatus is more or less deceptive. It may be, for instance, that thigen has a reading which agrees with MkN most approved by critical writers, but that the passage in who his occurs is not quoted by Chement of Alexandria. Here we are placed in a difficulty, because Clement and Origen id not be very means always agree, and, if a quotation had been preserved in which Clement used a different reading it would be probable that Origen's reading did not belong to the text traditionally current at Alexandria, but that he had obtained it from some other source, his evidence, therefore would be simply of a personal character. It is necessary, therefore, in weighing Patriatic evidence to deal with the authors quotations as a whole, in order to form a judgment of the character of the text he used. When Clement's and Origen's quotations are thus deal with, its found that Origen in part agrees with the text most favoured by critical editors, but that his predecessor Clement used a substantially different text of a "Western' type. Origen too, in part, followed 'Western' texts. The one lustons to which these phenomena lead will be discussed later on. The important quotations must be treated as one whole and that, while we can discover the type of text he need our knowledge of its only fragmentary, and necessarily confined as far as details are concerned to the passages explicitly quoted.

A moment a reflexion on the was in which the Bible is quoted in extempore sermons or in conversation will be sufficient to show that a writer's quotations may a vit always reproduce the text hat he cons reading which the writer, in answer to a direct question, would have deliberately stated to be the right one.

Moreover, we often feel great doubt whether the quotation stands in our printed editions in its original form. The works of many Greek kathers have been notoriously badly edited, and it is only when we have had personal experience of the editor's mathods that we can feel any security that full advantage has been taken of the MSS and other evidence available. In Nestle (in his Introductions to the Textual Criticism of the Greek NT, long tr 1901, p. 145) refers to an extreme instance of supmenson and ignorance on the part of even a fairly recent editor. he gave in his MS the first and last words of quotations, and left the printer to fill them up from a printed copy of the NT.

And when we go behind the editions, we often find that only comparatively late MSS are how estant, and we have to allow for the natural tendency of scribes to substitute, both consciously and unconsciously, familiar for unfamiliar readings. Sometimes the comments that follow the quotation enable the student to detect the substitution, but such alterations must have been made by scribes in numberless passages in which there are no meanns of discovering them.

The case of Fathers writing in a language other than Greek presents further difficulties, because it is often impossible to my how far the form of the quotation is due to a knowledge of the original terest, and how far to familiarity with the version in their own language. Analogous difficulties arise in the case of works which are preserved only in translations, because the translator was thely to introduce readings familiar to him in the versacular.

We have enlarged somewhat on this matter in order to show how much care is needed in forming a judgment on the Patristic

We have enlarged somewhat on this matter in order to show We have enlarged somewhat on this matter in order to show how much care is needed in forming a judgment on the Paristic evidence in regard to individual readings. But, on the other hand, we deare to supphasize as attengly as possible the immense importance of Patristic evidence when supployed with due pre-cautions for its proper purpose, namely, the dating and localizing of special types of text.

But again we must remember that the remains of Ante-cautions for the proper purpose, namely, as cating and socialing of special types of text.

But, again, we must remember that the remains of Ante-Nicone Christian literature that have come down to us are very fragmentary. 'The only period for which we have anything like a soft-iency of representative knowledge consists roughly of three-quarters of a century, from about 175 to 250' (Hort, $158). Besides Clement and Origen, Hort manies Ireneus, Hippolytus, Tertulian, Cypram, and Novatian, belonging to the period manned. Methodius towards the close of the 3rd cent., and Euseblus of Camarca in the first third of the 4th century. 'The fant used, writers Hort ($159), 'by all those Ante-Nicone Greek writers, not being connected with Alexandria, who have left considerable remains, is substantially Western.'

We are now in a position to consider the value of the argument for the posteriority of Antiochian readings which Hort bases on Ante Nicene Patristic evidence; it is an exilentia argument—that no extant writer before Chrysostom used the Antio hian text. The force of this argument is considerably lossened if we reflect that, had the writings of Origen perished, we should have had practically no Ante-Nicene Patristic evidence for the type of text contained in the RV.

Miller (The Traditional Text, p. 94 ff.) has attempted to prove the antiquity of the Traditional or Antiochian text by a wide appeal to Patristic evidence. In a sense he fails, because if a reading is shown to be older than the supposed revision which produced the Antiochian text, it is Antiochian, but a 'Western' reading adopted by the revisers. To one who does not adopt an extreme new on either side, this will probably appear very like a fight over empty names. The Antiochian text confessedly contained an ancient element, and the real question is whether critical editors have paid sufficient attention to the evidence afforded by it. Call the text by what name you will, but let it be judged on the intrinsic value of its readings, not in accordance with uncertain theories. Its very existence forms evidence in favour of certain types of the Western text, which must go back to the 2nd cent, as is shown by Miller; and the real question at issue is. What weight is to be attached to the evidence of these texts?

(iii) The judgment of such a scholar as Dr. Hort on the intrinsic value of the Antiochian readings must carry the greatest weight. It will be most antisfactory to quote his own words. 'Another step is gained by a close examination of all readings distinctively Syrian (Antiochian) in the sense explained above, comparing them on grounds of Internal Evidence, Transcriptional and Intrinsic, with the other readings of the same passages. The result is entirely unfavourable to the hypothesis which was mentioned as not excluded by the phe-nomena of the conflate readings, namely that in other cases, where the Syrian text differs from all other extant ancient texts, its authors may have copied some other equally ancient and perhaps purer text now otherwise lost' (§ 163). This deciaion may be regarded either as an expression of subjective judgment, in which case its value will vary according to the estimate formed of its author's ability as a critic; or else it can be regarded as the result of certain lines of argument, in which case it is the business of other critics to examine those argumenta.

The conclusions which Hort reached in regard to the conflate readings discussed above rest on, and indeed may be fairly considered to assume the truth of, his views as to the genealogical relations of the different families into which he divides all extant NT documents. His whole text is indeed based on those views; and therefore, if we are to discuss the problem before us intelligently, it is essential to have correct knowledge of the exact nature of genealogical evidence, and of how far it is available for the criticism of the NT text.

It is an obvious truth that, if the original of a document exists, no number of copies will possess any value for settling its text, which can be ascertained by reference to the document itself. This is the simple ground on which all genealogical evidence rests. If three independent copies have been made of a document which has itself perished, it may fairly be assumed that where all three agree they correctly represent the original; and further, in cases where two of the copies agree against the third, we shall confidently judge that these two preserve the right text, and that the third is in Now suppose that fifty copies have been made of this third original copy, and that it has itself perished, then it is clear that the evidence of the two extant primary copies outweighs the evidence of the fifty secondary ones. In this example it is assumed that the exact parentage of every copy is known. This is, of course, seldon the case with the MSS of ancient authors; but when the parentage of every MS concerned can be ascertained, then genealogical evidence gives results from which there can be no appeal

This matter is of such importance that it is worth while to illinetrate further what we have said, by reference to an actual instance. A fair number of MSS cast of the Feed gagine of Cleiment of Alexandria. In one faints of tress consisting of eight or more members, a passage of considerable is gith a left out. Now two leaves have been lost from a MS preserved at Florence (called b), who he contained enacts this passage it is therefore beyond doubt that the MSS referred to were copied from Fafter the loss of these leaves and they are therefore of no value as renderies. There can a said all fairs another MS(P), considerable older than b. At one time there was some little doubt about the relation exist ag between these two MSS localities and that offer at one it was pointed out by a formal so beta. It is to MSS local after a time it was pointed out by a formal so beta, by Stabilit, that certain notes that were written in P by different people and at different times, are written in P by different people and at different times, are written in P by different people and at different times, are written in the hand of the original scribe, this makes it certain that be was copied, directly or indirectly from P, and it an therefore asse be put anote. Further researches showed that every known MS of the work was derived from P, which consequently form a out outly a athority for the text. It is very send in that we be retain results as these can be reached in actual practice. It is generally possible to group MSS to some earles, it is not become in some and different and the manner in stakes independently in so real different places. It is obvious that the configure with which the relations of the MSS have been assertained. In the case of certain cursive MSS of the toopels sink to general green existence is fortheon my and it has been about that the runaive 13, 100, 124, 34d, and certain others, are derived from one common succator, but everyt for this one important and interesting case, the general part of properties at t This matter is of such importance that it is worth while to

It appears, then, that it is impossible to acqui-

Antiochian text, so far as that condemnation rests on (i.) the analysis of conflate readings, which presupposes certain genealogical relations to exist between certain groups of MSS, and involves an argument in a vicious circle, because those relations cannot be independently shown to exist; and (ii.) so far as it rests on Patristic evidence, this being precarious from its fragmentary character, while at the same time it does prove that the Antiochian text contains a very ancient element. It remains,

4. The generally accepted Critical Text.—Once again, it is with Hort's views that we must princicipally concern ourselves, because WH's text is the only one published which can be regarded as in any way self-consistent. No textual student would place much confidence in Tischendorf's judgment, which is embodied in his editio octava critica major; the Greek text underlying the RV does not appear to have been formed in accordance with any ascertainable principles; and Weymouth's 'Resultant Text,' and similar editions, founded on the consensus of critical editors, from their nature have no independent critical value. We have, therefore, to consider the principles on which WH founded their text. We have already shown how the great mass of documents, containing an Antiochian text, were set on one side. The pre-Antiochian texts Hort divided into three families, and, on what appear to many students insufficient grounds, assumed that they stood in certain genealogical relations to one another. One of these families consists of the group of texts commonly called 'Western'; after setting these aside as obvious corruptions of the original text, only a small body of MSS, Versions, and Fathers remains. This small residuum, however, Hort proceeds to again divide into 'Neutral' and 'Alexandrian' documents. It is now, we think we may say, generally acknowledged that this distinction cannot be maintained (cf. Salmon, Some Thoughts on the Textual Criticism of the NT, p. 50 ff.). Practically, he classes as 'Alexandrian' the readings of documents which usually agree with Coder B. when they differ from B. and are with Codex B, when they differ from B and are not supported by much Western evidence. We shall therefore treat these documents as forming one group, and distinguish the readings, as Salmon suggests, as early and later Alexandrian. Hort frankly admitted the close relation existing between his Neutral and Alexandrian readings, since he conceived both sets of readings to be derived from a common non-Western ancestor; this led him, in the case of an important set of readings, which he called 'Western non-interpolations,' to prefer the testimony of a small group of Western documents to the practically unanimous evidence of all other documents.

It will be convenient here to give a list of the main documents with which criticism has to deal. We begin with those which more or less regularly support the Alexandrian readings. See also art. MANUSCRIPTS.

B, the famous Codex Vaticanus, assigned to the 4th cent., is by far the most interesting; according to Hort, it contains a purely 'Neutral' text in the Gospels.

 M. Codex Sinaticus, discovered by Tischendorf on Mt. Sinal, and probably to be assigned to the 4th century. This MS is thought by Hort to be tree from Antiochian readings, but to contain a 'mixed' text, that is, one in which Western, Neutral, and Alexandrian elements are all found, though in the Gospels he looks on it as largely Neutral; this is equivalent to saying that its agreements with B are very numerous.
 C. Codex Ephræmi Rescriptus, a palimpeest preserved at Paris, and belonging probably to the 5th century. The text of this MS is undoubtedly of great importance. Miller (Plain Intr. 4 vol. i. p. 123) well describes its text as 'standing nearly midway between A and B, somewhat inclining to the latter.' Hort considers C to contain an Antiochian and also a Western element.
 L. Codex Regius, preserved at Paris, belonging to the 8th century. This MS is especially remarkable for the number VOL. II.—46 *, Codex Sinaiticus, discovered by Tischendorf on Mt. Sinai, of readings it has in common with B. According to Hort (§ 209), 'The foundation of the text is Non-Western Pre-Syrian.' But he aids: 'The fundamental text has been largely mixed with late Western and with Syrian elementa.

T. Under this symbol are placed several fragments of MSS containing a Greek text and a translation in the dialect of Upper Egypt (Sahidic or Thebaic). They range in date from the 5th to the 7th century.

X. Codex Monacensis, preserved at Munich, of the 9th or 10th cent., has a fundamentally Antiochian text, but is of interest because it often joins with CL in giving readings which may be regarded as late Alexandrian.

Z. Codex Dublinensis Rescriptus, perhaps to be assigned to the 4th cent., contains 295 verses of Mt. in 22 fragments. The text is apparently pre-Antiochian, and agrees more

A, Codex Sangallensis, of the 9th or 10th cent., has an ordinary Antiochian text, except in Mk., in which Gospel it has many readings in common with CL.

S, Codex Xacynthius, a palimpeest, probably of the 8th cent., belonging to the British and Foreign Bible Society in London. This MS contains 342 verses of Lk., giving an apparently pre-Antiochian text, in which both Western and Alexandrian elements are found.

The ancient Egyptian Versions, as might be expected, to some extent support the Alexandrian text; but there is so much uncertainty in regard to these Versions that it is not easy to reckon with them as an element in the critical problem presented to us. Forbes Robinson, in his art. 'Egyptian Versions' in Hastings' DB, declines to follow Lightfoot and Hort in assigning one, if not both, of the principal Egyptian Versions (i.e. the Bohairic and the Sahidic), or at least parts of them, to the close of the 2nd century. He gives good reasons for thinking that the Sahidic Version, which was current in Upper Egypt, was the earlier of the two; and it must be regarded as fundamentally Western rather than Alexandrian. The Bohairio (miscadingly called Coptic, and also Memphitic) Version, current in Lower Egypt, confessedly agrees in general with B, and perhaps even more closely with the text used by Cyril of Alexandria. If it has to be assigned to a date as late as the middle of the 3rd cent., it is evident that it may be the result of the type of text then current in Alexandria, and cannot be used as evidence for the greater antiquity of that text. The remains of the Bashmuric Versions—those current in Middle Egypt—are so scanty that they offer little help at present.

It would be easy to extend this list by including

It would be easy to extend this list by including documents which occasionally support the Alexandrian text, but it will be found that the nucleus of the attestation for most of Hort's readings lies practically in the group NBCLX 33, often sup-ported by the Egyptian versions.

At the same time, it is most necessary to bear in mind that the greater part of the attestation for Hort's readings is often afforded by documents which he classes as Western, and whose evidence he would put on one side were it not supported by some member or members of the Alexandrian group. We proceed, therefore, to give a list of the main Western documents, which have not already been mentioned as containing an Alexandrian element.

D. Codex Bezze Cantabrigiensis, of the 6th century. This is in many ways the most interesting MS of the Gospels extant: its text is, to a great extent, unique, and gains in interest and importance from the support which it often receives from the most ancient versions known, the Old Latin and the Old Syriac. All evidence tends to show that it preserves for us a text which was widely read in the 2nd cent, and the questions connected with this text are likely to increase rather than to decrease both in importance and in versities!

was wicely read in the 2nd cent., and the questions connected with this text are likely to increase rather than to decrease both in importance and in practical interest.

P and Q. Two palimposts preserved at Wolfenbüttel, assigned respectively to the 6th and 5th centuries. P contains 31 fragments, consisting of 518 verses from all four Gospels; Q 12 fragments of 247 verses from Lk. and John. The ancient element in these MS8 is partly Western and partly Alexandrian.

R. Codex Nitriensis, a palimpost of the 6th cent., in the British Museum, contains 25 fragments of Lk., consisting of about 516 verses. The pre-Antiochian readings are mostly Western.

Two groups of minuscules are of importance. 1-118-131-209 are fairly closely related, and offer some interesting readings; but far more important are the minuscules of the Ferrar group, mentioned above, 13-69-124-346-543-(789)-326. This group preserves the readings of a lost MS containing a peculiar Western text, different from that of D, but in a manner parallel to it. Another important minuscule, of the 9th or 10th cent., is preserved at St. Petersburg, and is named by Miller-Scrivener 473 (665 of Gregory, 81 of Hort, 22° of Tischendorf).

The evidence of the Versions is of great importance in regard to the Western text, for it shows how widespread this text was in the earliest times, and teaches us that the name "Western" caused properly be applied to it in a geographical series. From East and West and trom the south of Egypt we get evidence of the prevalence of distinctively western types of readings.

The Old Latin (if the pre Vulgate Latin) is fund in different forms, which have been distinguished as African. European and Italic, the last of these, however, approaches so nearly to the Yulgate text, that we shall now leave it on one side. The most important bis of the African Latin is if (todex Bobbiensis), of the 5th or 6th cent., preserved at Turin infortunstely, it contains only periods of his and Mark. The close agreement of its readings with the quodations of Cyprian proves that it contains a text used in Africa in early times, of (Codex Palatinus), of the 6th or 5th cent., preserved at Vienna, contains a version of a similar type, though by no useans so homogeneous as that of k. Of the European Latin there are several MSB. a, b, f(bit only), A (part of Mt.), a (part of Mt.), a (part of Mt.), a (part of Mt.). The type is also found to some extent in c, f, and q, and in man) tragments of MSB.

The text of the Latin Vulgate is preserved in very numerous MSB. It is fundamentally Western in character, as being a descendant of the Old Latin, but has been much modified, superially in the teorpels, by the influence of Greek MSB of the Antiochian type.

demendant of the Old Latin, but has been much modified, superfaily in the toopels, by the influence of Greek MSS of the Assiochian type. In Syrinc, the Peshitta Version holds a place analogous to St Jurome's Visigate in Latin, and supports the Antiochian taxt. Asother Version, called by the followers of flort the 'Gid Syrinc,' in preserved in tw. MSS, one in the British Museum, the text of which was published by Cureton, is called after him the 'Gurstonian's Syrinc' (Syrins), the other was discovered by Mins. Lawis and Mins. Gibson in the Labrary of the Convent on Mount Blank, and is known as the 'Sinait' Syrinc' (Syrins). These Versions, alised, but by no means identical, have an ementially Western trait. Another factor in the Syrinc problem is the Discovered Taxtan (Sourabed A. D. 180), the text of which has to a great extent been recovered from an Arabic translation, from an Armenian translation of the Syrinc commentary of Ephraem Syrins, and from the quotations of the Syrinc meter Aphrasics. The Disdessoron was a harmony of the four Goopels, which was widely used in Syrinc-speaking sountries in preference to the departs of Goopels, and in compiling it Taxtan used a Western Ext. Another has the Old Syrins. The multial relations of these documents are still in dispute, but the most probable view is that the Old Syrins translate to the Peshipta as the Old Latin does to Jerome a Vignite. Two later versions must be mentioned. One is the Harkleian revision of the Philozenian Byrinc, made by Thomas of Harkleian revision of the Philozenian Byrinc, made by Thomas of Harkleian revision of the Philozenian Byrinc, made by Thomas of Harkleian revision of the Philozenian Byrinc, made have a few the Alexandrian type. The mair mass of use talk that have not less here mentioned and of the minuscules, may be recorded as similar to allow the respective the state of the stat be regarded as simply a applementing the evidence of A, because the importance to be attached to them depends upon the esti-maks formed of the value of the text of A.

We have now to consider in more detail the use which Hort makes of the Alexandrian group of documents. We have already tried to show how precarious any argument is which rests on genealogical considerations, owing to the lack of suffi evidence affords us no help in judging between the Western and the Alexandrian texts, because they are confessedly parallel to each other, and have are confessedly parallel to each other, and have equal claims to consideration on genealogical grounds. But if it can be shown that the Alexandrian group consistently supports readings intrinsically better than those of the Western documents, this will afford good reason for following it. In other words, the question comes to this: Is the first of WH, which all critics admit to be substantially a text used at Alexandria early in the 3rd cent, on the whole preferable to the TR, and to such a text as would be formed by following exclusively Western documents? The answer of critics at the present time to this question would undoubtedly be in the affirmative. But, in the great majority of cases in which it differs from the TR, WII stext has the support of the best Western as well as of the Alexandrian documents; it is possible, therefore, to argue that its general excellence is due to the pure form of the Western element which it contains, and to look upon the distinctively Alexandrian readings as blemishes. On what grounds does flort prefer these dis-tinctively Alexandrian readings? His main argu-His main argument is the internal evidence of groups; all the readings supported by a group such as RB or RD are examined, and judgment is passed on them collectively, and also on the text common to the MSS forming the group. Now, the text common to N and D is, according to Hort's classification, Western, and in his opinion gives inferior readings (of course, when unsupported by other primary documents); whereas the agreement of & and B almost invariably gives readings which he con-siders intrinsically excellent. This method of forming a judgment on a wide consideration of the general readings of a group, to a great extent does away with the personal element which is so great a danger when individual readings are considered each on its intrinsic merits, but it still leaves plenty of room for the personal equation, since a general judgment is based on a special individual judgment in a number of separate cases, thus Hort's system is far less impersonal than it appears to be at first sight. It is obviously impossible to enter into all this minute research unless one is able to devote many years of close work to the subject; yet, without doing so, it appears presumptuous to dispute Hort's conclusions.

But judgment in this matter really rests on a wider question. If it can be shown to be probable that the Alexandrian text is the result of a revision, then the greater part of Hort's work has been expended in restoring the original text of that revision, and is only a step, though an important one, in getting back to the readings of the original autographs. Now, recent investigations seem to tend to render two facts probable: (1) that all documents giving an Alexandrian text are connected with Egypt, and (2) that the text current in Expet prior to the time of Urigen was fundamentally Western, not Alexandrian. If a rundamentally western, not Alexandrian. 11 is strong probability can be made out for these two views, then it will be a reasonable conclusion that the Alexandrian text had its rise in Egypt during the early part of the 3rd cent, and it will have to be treated as parallel to, though earlier and more important than, the Antiochian text. Lapp was the home of scholars, and if such a recension was made there, it is natural that the conclusions of early scholars should commend themselves on their intrinsic merits to men of similar training even at a much later date; we have also to remember that it is quite probable that those early scholars, with more evidence before them than we now leave duselect the best readings, and may have preserved to us many true readings which would otherwise have perished. The dislike with which the later students of Antioch regarded the opinions of the carlier Alexandrian Fathers, and the taint of heresy which attached to them, easily account for the text they preferred not having continued in general use, if indeed it was ever widely current Hort has declared that there are no grounds at all for believing in this Alexandrian revision, but we are not aware that he has gone beyond assertion on this point. In the same way, Burgon and Miller declared that Hort's Antiochian revisions were the creations of Hort's in againstion. But the fact re mains that the Alexandrian text rannot be traced earlier than the first quarter of the 3rd century. Clement of Alexandria used a distinctively Western text; it is true that he sometimes has what are commonly regarded as Mexandrian readings, but it is manifestly impossible to prove that these may not have been part of the Western text, current in Alexandria, and naturally taken up by the revisers. If it is the case that the Saludic version is earlier than the Bohniric, again we find the Western type further right in assigning the Boliaric to the 3rd, and not the 2nd cent., then it may very possibly have been made from MSS with the revised Alex andrian text, and its character is thus accounted

The great importance which Hort assigns to the agreement of N and B depends on his contention that the two MSS are independent of each other; but there are really strong reasons for doubting this. Hort (§ 288) admits the truth of the fact pointed out by Tischendorf, 'that six leaves of the A'T in R, together with the opening verses of the Apocalypse, besides corrections, headings, and in two cases subscriptions, to other parts, are from the hand of the same scribe that wrote the NT in B.' He adopts the obvious conclusion that the scribe of B was the corrector of R, and adds that it shows that the two MSS were written in the same generation, probably in the same place. He argues, however, that the evidence of the text, supported by differences in the order of the books and other externals, creates a strong presumption that they were copied from independent exemplars. But where so much depends on the absolute in dependence of two witnesses, this close local connexion must cause the most serious doubts. Have we any means of saying where it is likely that the two MSS were written? Both MSS contain a peculiar system of chapter numbers in the Acts, in each case in a very early hand, and with such differences that in neither case can the numeration have been copied from the other MS, but must have come from a common original Dean Armitage Robinson, in his 'Euthaliana' (TS iii. 3), gives reasons for believing that this chapter numeration is the same as that connected with the name of Enthalius, and points out (p. 35) that a Euthalian codex claims to have been collated with the accurate copies in the library at Casarea of Eusebius Pamphyli. The connexion of Origen with this great library is well known, and suggests (though it can hardly be called more than a suggestion) that the same library may have been the birthplace of these two great MSS which, when in agreement, support the text which Origen mostly used, and with the rise of which he may well have been connected. It is impossible to speak with any confidence until a great deal more work has been done, but it does seem as if the evidence in favour of an Alexandrian revision is growing (cf., further, Burkitt, TS v. 5).

We are able to judge of Hort's work only by the results, and to some extent our judgment must be based on a consideration of extreme instances that is, we must judge the theory by cases in which he has pushed it to its furthest limits. No one denies that the greater part of his text, right or wrong, is of extreme antiquity, being based on the agreement of Alexandrian and Western documents: the question is whether his theory has led to the inclusion of readings that cannot be shown to be earlier than Origen, and may therefore be due to an Alexandrian revision, or may be errors that had crept into the Western text current at Alexandria on which that re-vision was based. We propose to examine a few vision was based. We propose to examine a few examples which throw light on the methods he employed.

One of the most important, instructive, and truly typical examples over a in Jn 1th. The passage has been exhaustively discussed by Hort in the first of his Two Discretal ons (1876). But the important point to that we have good evidence for the existence of this reading prior to the time of trigen. We may therefore regard it as an old reading current in Alexandris. On the other hand, the evidence of the givent majority of MSS and Versoun, supported by a good array of Fathers, shows that the rival reading was widely spread at an equally early period. Hort had no doubt how to decide on the evidence, impressed as he was with the general excellence of the Alexandris and proof, and he argued so well that internal evidence supports proof, impressed as he was with the general excellence of the Alexandrian group, and he argued so well that internal evidence supports proof which that he is in the right. We have seen that there is some remove for connecting R and R with the great library of Commenta Emphisis was no doubt a great authority on points of fliblical criticism there, and we know that his opinion was against these verses (Mal, Script, Vett. His 'iestimony is to the effect that some of the copies in his time contained the verses, and some did not; but that those which omitted them were then the more numerous, and, in his against, the more trustworthy. It is quite possible that the evidence we have so far consulered comes to no more than that — 'MSS preferred by Emebius.' If he rejected these verses on internal grounds, we believe he was right in doing so, but we must take care that subjective evidence is not treated as objective textual evidence. It is probable that the scholis found in various minimumles, to the same effect as the testimony of Emphism quoted above, are derived from him, and have no independent value. But a shorter ending to the Gospel was also current, which was undoubtedly spurious, and this afforch indirect, but definite, evidence for the omission of vr 920, because it could arise only through the Gospel ending abruptly at v 8. It is not an easy thing to convey a fair impression by a selection of readings, but we hope the above passages are sufficient to show two things, the undoubted excellence of the Alexandrian tradition, and the inadvisability of following it against internal evidence of readings. If Hort's views of the genealogical relations of the main texts are, as we believe, unproved, then the Alexandrian group must stand on its merits alone, and we must in mind that its readings may be due to a definite revision, * in any case, however, whether there was an Alexandrian revision or not, the text preserved by this group of documents is the purest and the most important now known to us. We believe that the following passage from Dr. Salmon (Introd. to the NT4, p. 164, note) well expresses what will be the ultimate verdict in regard to the work of the two great Cambridge critics:

'It seems to me that textual critics are not entitled to feel absolute confidence in their results, if they venture within range of the obscurity that hangs over the history of the first publication of the toospels. Such a task as Bentky and Lachmann proposed to thermelves, u.e., to recover a good fourth-century lack, was perfectly feasible, and has, in fact, been accomplished by Westcott and Hort with trumphant success. I suppose that if a MS containing their text could have been put into the hands of Eurobius, he would have found only one thing in it which would have been quite strange to him, namely, the short conclusion on the last page of St. Mark, and that he would have pronounced the MB to be an extremely good and accurate one. But these editors aim at sothing less than going back to the original documents, and, in order to do the, it is in son e cases secessary to choose between two forms of text, each of which is attested by authorities older than any extant MS. Now, a choice which must be made on subjective grounds only cannot be made with the same confidence as when there is on either side a clear preponderance of historical testimony. And, further, there is the possibility that the Evangelist might have himself published a second edition of his Gospel, so that two forms of text night both be entitled to claim his authority. 'It seems to me that textual critics are not entitled to feel

In his treatment of this difficult subject, the present writer has tried to set out main principles rather than to go into minute details, he has also tried to show how a judgment must be formed rather than to express his own opinions But it is almost impossible to move in textual criticism without having a working hypothesis. Supporters either of the Traditional Text or of WH's views have the advantage of starting from a clearly defined position, and attack or defend definite The present writer has found it neces theories. sary to intimate, as a working hypothesis, what his own views are, and has attempted to show the reasons why he holds them. We can reconstruct a text which was current at Antioch by the middle of the 4th cent., and which won its way to practically universal acceptance in countries which used the Greek language; this would not differ in any material respects from the Textus Receptus. We can also reconstruct a text current in Alexandria probably as early as the first quarter of the 3rd cent, this would be almost the same as Westcott and Hort's text, if we except those passages where they give the preference to Western documents. What are we to do with the documents of very What are we to do with the documents of very divergent types, which are loosely classified as Western? This is really the main problem which textual critics now have to face. We may perhaps roughly distinguish the following groups of documents as attesting different types of readings, but it is necessary to remember that there is continual ross attestation ( to) D supported by the old Latin; (b) groups in which & sides with Western door ments against distinctively Alexandrian readings; (c) the ancient text underlying the Antiochian revision, which is often very difficult to distin guish; (d) the Ferrar group of minuscules; (e) the Old Syriac; we also know of a certain number of readings which were evidently widely spread in early times, but which have left little or no trace of their existence in extant MSS and versions.

It is impossible within the limits of this article to enter on this very wide question; nor is it possible at the present stage of criticism to say that any really definite results have been reached. Whatever may be the history of the origin of the Western texts, and however strongly certain isolated readings may commend themselves to the judgment of a few students, it is not likely will ever command the respect of a considerable body of students of textual criticism and of exegesis; and it must be borne in mind that the inal decision must rest on exegesis, inless textual evidence at present not even guessed at should be brought to light. The truth appears to be that the Antiochian text adopted much of what was best in the various Western texts; but at the same time the agreement of Western and Alexandrian documents in many readings that are almost undoubtedly right warns us that right readings may lurk in the most divergent texts, though it is improbable that much of value escaped both the Alexandrian and the Antiochian revisers.

But the existence of these early divergent types of text, in regard to which textual criticism can give no definite verdict, has a very distinct practical lesson to teach, and one which is greatly needed at this critical period in the history of Christianity, it is unpossible to recover at present the instance verba of the NT writers. Of course the limits of doubt are very narrow, and the possible variants are few and for the most part unimportant; but the fact of doubt remains, and is a standing protest against all mechanical theories of inspiration, for however slight the discrepancies the question must arise, 'Which text or reading is inspired' We must build on the general sense, not on the mere letter of Scripture; this is the practical lesson which textual criticism teaches us at this moment. And what result can be happier than if the study of the letter, by its inconclusiveness, leads us to a firmer grasp of the general sense, in which is the 'apirit that maketh alive'?

THADDEUS occurs only Mk 3th and Mt 105; in the latter place in the AV in the form: 'Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus.' On the textual questions, see art. JUDAS (vol. i. p. 906). LEBEEUS (above, p. 22), and 'Thaddeus' (DB iv. 741). In the Western Church neither 'Lebbeus' nor 'Thaddeus' became common, their place being taken by 'Judas,' occurring in Lk.'s Gospel and Acts as Judas Jacobi, and found in Mt. as Judas son of James in SyrSin; his day falling with that of Simon on the 28th October.* But even under the name of Juda this Apostle never became very popular. The Calendar of the English Church, Illustrated (Oxford and London, 1851), knows only of two old churches in England dedicated in the joint names of Simon and Jude, and of several instances in modern churches of their names being honoured separately, as in Liverpool, Manchester, Bethnal Green, West Derby; 'but this is quite against the medieval custom'. Neither was 'Thaddieus' frequent as a proper name; cf., however, for instance, the Italian painter Taddeo Gaddi. In the Greek Church the 19th June is kept as μνήμη τοῦ ἀγίου καὶ ένδόξου dwoστόλου Τούδα, who by Luke, in the Gospel and Acts, is called 'Isobar; by Matthew and Mark, Θαδδαίοι και Λεββαίοι, άδελφόι κατά σάρια χρηματίζων τοῦ κιρίου ήμων Ίησού Χριστού ως είδι Ίωσης τοῦ μεήστορος, άδελφὸς δέ γεήσιος Γαπωβου τοῦ άδελφοθέου, ό και την φωτιστικήν και δογμάτων έμπλεον τοι Πνεύματος άνθρώποις Επασιν έπιστείλας επισταλήν, then told that he was sent by Christ Himself & delayer and μυσταγωγός to Mesopotamia, came to Edessa, healed Abgar, and was shot with arrows by the infidels in the town Ararat. On 30th June, the day of all Apostles, he is numbered 12th; the place where he died in one MS being called & Αράτω τη πόλει. On the 21st August the Greek Church celebrates μνήμη του άγιου άποστόλοι Θαδάιου τοῦ και λεββαιοι ένδι τών έβδομήκοντα. Ης is said to have been from Edessa, a Hebrew by birth, who came to Jerusalem in the days of John the Baptist, was baptized, and afterwards followed Jesus till His Passion. Then he returned to his home, healed Abgar of the 'black' leprosy, came to Syria, and died in Bipvres; cf. the Acta Apostolorum Apocr., ed. Tischendorf.

On the identity of Lebbeus-Thaddeus-Judas Jacobi with the author of the Epistle and the brother of Jesus, see Mayor, 'Brethren of the Lord' (DB i. 320); Dom J. Chapman (JThSt vii. 412-433); Th Zahn, Forschungen, vi. [1900] 225-363. For evidence that the Epistle of Jude is quoted occasionally under the name of Thaddeus, see ZNTW iii. [1902] 251. In the Syrian Churches, Jude is identified with Thomas, and sometimes regarded as twin brother of Jesus; see J. H. Harris, Diosewi in the Christian Leginds, and The Cult of the Heavenly Thems (1906), p. 105. In the Onomastica sacra the name 'Thaddeus' is explained by aberts (ed Lagarde, 202–83). The same etymology is followed in the Talmud, Sanh. 43a, where the last of the five disciples of Jesus is called Thoda, and Ps 1001 502 are applied to him.

On monuments of Christian art the name does not seem to occur frequently (see Mrs. Arthur Bell, The Saints in Christian Art (1901), vol. i. ch. viii, 'The Twelve Apostles'; ch. xvi. 'St. Simon, St. Jude, and St. Matthias'). In the mosaic of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, Thaddeus is the last of the Apostles; on its bronze doors, cast at Constantinople in 1070, he is left out altogether along with James the Less and Matthias. The Romanic frontale aureum of the altar of the church at Comburg (Würtemberg), representing the Salvator Mundi in the midst of the Twelve Apostles, gives him under the name S. Tatheus. When the Creed him under the name S. Tathens. When the Creed is apportioned among the Twelve, 'Thaddens dixit: carnis resurrectionsm.' In the Hexameters ascribed to Bernard of Clairvaux, 'Rostituit carnem Judas'; with Firminus: 'Judas Jacobi dixit: sanctorum communionem, remissionem pecontorum' (Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole', pp. 52-54, 97, 104)

In the Const. Apost. the ordinances about widows are ascribed to Thaddwus (viii. 25).

Very complicated is the question about the relation of the Apostle Thaddeus to Sellass, who is said by Eusebius to have been one of the Seventy, and to have been contafter the Assession, by Thomas, to Edoma to heal King Abgar. Jeroma, on &#x27;In the Calendar of Cordova for 961 the entry runs 'festum Bimonia Cananel et Tadel apostolorum', see M. Férotin, Le liber ordinains en mages dans l'églass Wisspothique et Mozarabe d'Espagne, Paris, 1904 ("Monumenta ecolesses liturgies, ed. Cabrol-Leclerq, vol. v.).

Mt 104, tells the same about the Apostle Thaddæus, while in the Syrian legend the messenger to Edessa is called Addai (on the form Haddai in one of the MSS of the Syriac Version of the HE of Eusebius, see DB, s.v. 'Thaddsus'). Zahn thinks that Eusebius is guilty of the confusion of Addai with Thaddaios. On the Syriac Doctrine of Addai, see Lagarde, Reliquiæ juris eccles. antiqu. syr. p. 32 = Gr. p. 89; Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents; G. Phillips, The Doctrine of Addai (1876).

As the place of his burial there is mentioned, besides Beirut in Phœnicia, the town Ostracine in Egypt (see Const. Apost., ed. Lagarde, p. 283), where Θαδδαῖος ὁ Λεβαῖος καὶ Ἰούδας is distinguished from Judas Jacobi, the latter, after preaching throughout the whole of Mesopotamia, was stoned by the Jews, and lies at Edessa; the former preached to the Edessenes, was crucified, and buried in 'Ostracine, the town of Egypt.

The most probable etymology of the name 'Thaddeus' seems to be that proposed by Dalman, who sees in it the Heb. abbreviation of a Greek name beginning with Theo-, as in Theudas. The 'Gospel of Thaddæus' mentioned in some MSS and editions of the Decretum Gelasii is due to a clerical error. On the legends connected with Thaddeus see Lipsius, Die apokr. Apostelgeschichten, ii. pp. 142-200 (1884).

THANKSGIVING (εὐχαριστία, εὐχαριστέω) is an important Christian virtue, and in pre-Christian Greek the word is rare. Used chiefly of man's attitude to God, it implies a recollection of Him, a recognition of His actions in the past (cf. ὁμολογεῖν and cognates, He 13<sup>13</sup>, Mt 11<sup>28</sup> etc.), quite apart from any thought of petition for the future. Meaning originally to do a good turn to a man (cf. εχειν χάριν, 1 Ti 112), εὐχαριστία acquires the meaning of repaying a favour, and hence of showing gratitude. Philo uses it in the technical sense of thank-offering. Outside the Gospels and Apocalypse it occurs in the NT only in the writings of St. Paul.

1. Usage in the Gospels.—The word εὐχαριστέω 1. Usage in the Gospels.—The word εὐχαριστέω (εὐχαριστία does not occur in the Gospels), though found in other connexions (Jn 114, Lk 17<sup>16</sup>), occurs principally in relation to grace before meat, especially at the miracles of the loaves, and the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 15<sup>36</sup> 26<sup>27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17-19</sup> [before the breaking of the bread we have in the || Mt 26<sup>26</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22</sup> εὐλογήσαs (EV blessed') for εὐχαριστήσαs in Lk. |, Jn 6<sup>11, 23</sup>). From this fact in later times though not in the NT this fact, in later times, though not in the NT itself, the word Eucharist became a recognized term for the Holy Communion, and is found in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (9') and other sub-Apostolic literature (Ign. Smyr. 7, Just. Mart. Apol. 1, 65), as well as in later writings. further, artt. BENEDICTION and BLESSING.

Besides εὐχαριστέω we find in the Gospels, as terms denoting the giving of thanks, (1) έξομολογέομαι (Mt 11<sup>25</sup> | Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, RVm 'praise'); (2) ανθομολογέομαι (Lk 2<sup>38</sup>); and (3) έχω χάριν (Lk 17<sup>9</sup>, cf. 6<sup>32π</sup>). In (1) Jesus Himself thanks His Father for revealing to babes what is hidden from the wise and understanding. In (2) Anna the prophetess gives thanks to God for the vision of the infant Jesus. In (3) Jesus sets aside the idea that a servant should be thanked for doing the things which were commanded him.

2. Christ's lessons regarding thanksgiving.—(1) His own example is a lesson. He gives thanks to His Father for daily bread (Mt 15<sup>36</sup> || Mk 8<sup>6</sup>, Jn 6<sup>11, 22</sup>; cf. Lk 24%); for the revelation to babes of the secrets of the heavenly Kingdom (Mt 11<sup>28</sup> || Lk 10<sup>21</sup>); for the Divine hearing of His prayer (Jn 11<sup>41</sup>); for the bread and wine of the Holy Supper, and all the spiritual blessings which they connote (Mt 26<sup>sxt</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22t</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17.19</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>24t</sup>). (2) His words convey lessons. We have no claim to be regarded as profitable servants, deserving to be thanked, if we have merely done our duty (Lk 17<sup>8t</sup>). There is a kind of thanksgiving to God which is only a form a kind of thanksgiving to God which is only a form of hypocrisy, being really a flattery of ourselves (Lk 18<sup>11</sup>). The truly thankful heart is rare (Lk 17<sup>1ex.</sup>); it recognizes God's hand in the gifts of human benefactors (v. 18); it is inspired by faith, and wins great blessings (v. 19).

It is worth noting that it is to St. Luke alone that we are the term of the Ton Leners and the

that we owe the story of the Ten Lepers and the Grateful Samaritan, which is typical of the Christian grace of gratitude that finds expression in thanksgiving; while it is to St. Luke's beloved friend and teacher, St. Paul, as to no other, that we owe the repeated and characteristic Christian utterance of thanks to God for His unspeakable gift (2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>, and the Pauline Epistles, passim).

THEOPHILUS.—The name of an early Christian to whom a couple of NT documents, the Third (canonical) Gospel and its sequel, the Acts of the Apostles, are addressed (Lk 1, Ac 1). This does not, of course, imply that the writer had no wider audience in view. The two books in question are far too carefully composed to be mere private com-munications. In modern parlance they are 'dedi-cated' rather than addressed to Theophilus; that is, if we suppose the name to be a genuine proper name. On this point, however, there has been some difference of opinion. Conceivably Theophilus (= OT Jcddidiah, 'God's friend') might be no more than a conventional title for the average the typical catechumen. This symbolic sense of the word was conjectured by Origen. At the same time, instances of Theophilus as a proper name are not uncommon, and it seems simpler, on the whole, to regard it as such in the NT. A modification of the other these theory has a leader here proposed for a by the above theory has also been proposed (c.g. by Ramsay and Bartlet), which would make Theo-philus a baptismal name given to a Roman official, and employed here for the sake of safety. This is and employed here for the sake of safety.

The name, then, is to be taken as denoting some contemporary of Luke (or of whoever wrote the Third Gospel and Acts). Otherwise he is unknown to history. Later tradition naturally busied itself with fanciful conjectures upon his personality, turning him eventually into the bishop of Antioch or of Casarea (cf. Zahn's Einleitung, § 58. 5). But this is the region of guesswork, though modern critics have often been tempted to stray back into it. As, for example, Beck, who, in his Prolog des Lk.-Evangeliums (1900), deduces from èν ἡμῶν (1³) the fact that the author was one of the two Emmaus disciples, while Theophilus must have been a wealthy Antiochene tax-collector, an acquaintance of Chuza and Herod, who accompanied Herod and Bernice to Cæsarea, where he fell in with St. Paul and St. Luke. Godet opines that Luke was a freedman of Theophilus. The latter, at any rate, may have been the patronus libri, expected to be responsible for the publication and circulation of the Gospel and its sequel. Whether he was of Greek extraction or a Roman, possibly of equestrian rank, it is impossible to say; but one may cheerfully set aside the theories which identify him with Philo or Seneca.

THEOPHILUS THIRST 727

begin with, he was a Christian when the Third Gospel was composed. He had been 'instructed' in the faith by some Christian teachers as a catechumen. But either he or his friend, the author, felt that some fuller acquaintance with the historic basis of the Christian religion (not of the Pauline gospel, as Hilgenfeld argues in Ztschr. für Wiss. Theologie, 1901, pp. 1-11) was advisable, and it was with this end in view that the Third Gospel and its sequel were addressed to him, in order to remove uncertainties caused by diversity, inexactness, lack of thoroughness, and absence of order, in the current accounts of Christ's life on earth. Some critics still hold that Theophilus was simply a pagan interested in Christianity. But the term κατηχήθης (Lk 14, cf. Ac 18<sup>25</sup> 21<sup>21</sup>), especially in the light of its context, seems to preclude this hypothesis. St. Luke's preface implies that he was more than merely an interested inquirer. It suggests, as Wright says (Composition of the Four Gospels, p. 55), that 'busy men like Theophilus had been catechized in their youth, but later occupations had driven out many of the lessons, and unless a man could secure the same catechist whom he had attended as a boy, the frequent discrepancies in the ever-changing tradition would jar on the precision of youthful memory, and produce a general sense of disappointment and uncertainty. Oral tradition had its merits. It was vital and free from any danger of codifying the Christian spirit. But among its defects were liability to discrepancies (cf. Jos. c. Apion. i. 2) and absence of uniformity. But there is no other instance of one Furthermore, if there is no other instance of one Christian hailing another by a secular title in the NT, on the other hand there is no case of a Christian writing for the benefit of any save fellow-Christians. Besides, such a title need not have been incongruous with Christianity. If Theophilus was of high rank, the faith which bade Christians honour all men would not preclude a Christian author from employing such a title once in a semi-formal prologue to his work. (2) That Theophilus was a man of rank is suggested by the term  $\kappa p d\tau u \tau \tau =$  "most excellent' or 'your excellency' (Ac 23° 24° 26°), which may be almost semitechnical, and in any case implies respect for exalted position and high authority, though the idea of intimacy and affection need not be excluded (cf. Jos. Ant. vi. 8, etc.). He may have been on the proconsular staff, or an official of some kind in the Imperial service. And this would tally with the special emphasis laid by St. Luke upon the relation of the Church to the Empire, and the repeated connexions which he suggests between the political affairs of the age and the progress of Christianity (cf. e.g. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? ch. iii.), especially in Acts. His social position is further suggested by the internal evidence of the Third Gospel, which, as has been often pointed out (cf. e.g. Encyc. Bibl. 1792), is specially concerned with the hindrances thrown up by money and rank in the path of a consistent Christian character. 'Lk. seems to see, as the main obstacles to the Faith, not hypocrisies, nor Jewish backsliding, but the temptations of wealth and social position acting upon half-hearted converts; and his sayings about building the tower, putting the hand to the plough, renouncing all one's possessions, and hating father and mother, are pathetic indications of what must have been going on in the divided household of many a young Theophilus.' In the case of Theophilus, however, wealth and dignity did not form an obstacle to faith. It says something for this well-to-do Christian that he was willing to be instructed, and evidently keen to learn the historic principles of his faith. To his open-mindedness we owe, in one sense, two of the most important historical documents in early Christian literature. For it is plain that this man's need stirred his friend to write. Behind Theophilus he probably saw many a likeminded inquirer. This catechumen's case was in some ways typical and characteristic, and thus St. Luke was led to write his Gospel narrative, an instance of the 'first and noblest use' of the human imagination, 'that is to say, of the power of perceiving things which cannot be perceived by the senses, viz. to call up the scenes and facts in which we are commanded to believe, and be present, as if in the body, at every recorded event of the history of the Redeemer' (Ruskin, Frondes Agrestes, § 9). The writer's aim was personal, as well as modest and religious. Early Christian literature sprang from no literary ambition. Even in its historic form it was prac-tical and didactic. But in this case the writer, like Burke, who originally drew up his Reflections on the French Revolution for the benefit of a puzzled young friend, has gained a wider reach and range for his pen's products than perhaps he contemplated when he began.

The omission of the semi-formal adjective rpdriore in Ac 1<sup>1</sup> is not unnatural. It is needless to see anything subtle or significant in the change from Lk 1<sup>3</sup>. No doubt the excessive use of the term was one feature of ancient servility (Theophrastus, Char. 5). But St. Luke might well have used it twice in two volumes without any fear of incurring the charge of obsequiousness, and we cannot suppose he dropped the adjective lest he should be guilty of bad taste. Still less probable is the conjecture that the absence of the title in Ac 1<sup>1</sup> denotes the conversion of Theophilus to Christianity since Lk 1<sup>3</sup> had been written. For this there is no evidence whatsoever, and we have already seen that there was no necessary incongruity in applying such a title of honour, pagan though it was, to a fellow-Christian.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the articles in Bible Dictionaries s.v., and to the critical editors on Lk 1<sup>1-4</sup>, see the monographs on that passage already referred to, and add Blass, Philology of Gospels, pp. 7-20, with Zahn's Einleitung in das NT, § 60. J. MOFFATT.

THIEF (κλέπτης).— Thieves are mentioned in the following passages of the Gospels, besides several others where RV substitutes 'robber' as the equivalent of $\lambda_{\text{porths}}$. See Robber. 1. Mt 6<sup>11, 20</sup> Lk 12<sup>28</sup>. Christ's disciples should have their treasure where thieves do not break (lit. 'dig') treasure where thieves do not break (lit. 'dig') through and steal. Eastern houses, being commonly of mud or sun-dried brick, are easily broken into; cf. Ex 22², Job 24¹⁶, Ezk 12⁵⁻². 2. Mt 24⁵˚≡ Lk 12⁵⁰. The unexpectedness of Christ's coming is compared to that of a thief's entry. This figure seems to have greatly impressed the Apostles; it is echoed several times in the NT (1 Th 5⁴⁶, 2 P 3¹⁰, Rev 3³ 16¹⁶). 3. Jn 10¹⁻⁵ s⁻¹⁰. False and self-seeking teachers—whether false Christs or, more probably. teachers-whether false Christs, or, more probably, Pharisees—are compared to thieves and robbers.

4. Jn 126. Judas 'was a thief, and having the bag' (lit. 'box') 'took away what was put therein' (RV).

HAROLD SMITH.

THIRST.—The occasions on which the physical THIRST.—The occasions on which the physical suffering arising from thirst is noted by the Evangelists are connected in every instance with the personal experiences of Jesus. Early in His public ministry, as He was journeying back from Judæa to Galilee, leaving the former country as a result of Pharisaic hostility, the writer of the Fourth Gospel notices that Jesus suffered the pangs of thirst, and records His request for a drink of water from the Samaritan woman as she came to draw from the Samaritan woman as she came to draw water from 'Jacob's spring' (πηγή τοῦ Ίακώβ, Jn 46). It is remarkable that this author mentions this fact, as well as the weariness felt by Jesus in His journey, side by side with the title (ὁ κύριος, 41)

The other instance of Jesus' suffering in this respect is also mentioned by this writer, who records His cry 'I thirst' (διψῶ, 19<sup>28</sup>) from the cross. And although he seems to connect the expression with the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy (cf. Ps 69<sup>21</sup>), there can be no doubt as to the reality of the feeling which prompted the utterance of the Sufferer. The intensity of His suffering is attested by the unwonted interference of one of the soldierguards, who, out of compassion for the Crucified, attempted to allay His anguish. One result of these and such like incidents in the course of His life is to be seen in the vivid portraiture by Jesus of the great Day of final judgment. The common physical wants of struggling humanity afford opportunities of service in the sacred cause outlined by the two great commandments of the Law (Mt 22<sup>362</sup>). Nor must we omit to notice the basis upon which Jesus has placed the service of man by men, and the grounds upon which He distributes the final awards. To every believer in the cosmic significance of the Incarnation the use of the first person (ἐδίψησα, etc.) by the Judge-King (Mt 25<sup>36</sup>) who is 'the Son of Man' (v. <sup>21</sup>), reveals the nature and character of His sympathy with our weaknesses (συνπαθήσαι ταῖς ἀσθενείως ἡμῶν, He 4<sup>18</sup>), and guarantees the truth of the assertion that 'it was necessary that he should in all things become like his brethren' (ἄφειλεν κατὰ πάντα τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς ὁμοιωθήναι, He 2<sup>17</sup>).

Following the example of OT thinkers, Jesus employed the idea embodied in the word 'thirst' to express the conscious needs of the human soul for something higher and more satisfying than it could discover in its earthly experiences (cf. Is 55¹, Ps 42² etc.). Just as man in the vigour of physical health revolts against physical deprivation in the shape of thirst, so in proportion to his spiritual health and energy he reaches out and cries for spiritual satisfaction, and cannot rest as long as his wants are unsupplied. In this restlessness Jesus sees a source of men's ultimate happiness, and those He accounts blessed (μακάριο) who thirst for righteousness (διψῶντες τὴν δικαιοσύνην, Mt 5⁶). As might perhaps be expected, the Johannine writer makes the most frequent reference to this feature of Jesus' teaching. Belief in Himself, Jesus asserts to be the means by which spiritual thirst is assuaged (cf. Jn 6³⁰ 7³¹); and if we compare this statement with its expansion and elaboration, we will observe that by belief He means the spiritual appropriation of His entire Manhood (ἡ σάρξ μου . . τὸ αξμά μου ἀληθής ἐστι πόσις, 6⁵⁶).

On two distinct occasions Jesus makes incidental, though didactic, reference to the profound union, between Himself and those who believe on Him, hinted at above. In His conversation with the woman of Samaria He characteristically emphasizes His teaching by the details in her drawing of the water from the fountain. For her the well was a source of the satisfaction of personal need, and at the same time a means of supplying the needs of others dependent on her. In a manner analogous to this, if she had drunk of the living water which He was ready to supply, Jesus promised her a part in His glorious work of sharing with others out of the fulness she had received (cf. 116). In her the living water would become 'a fountain springing unto eternal life' (to αὐτῷ πηγὴ δδατος ἀλλομένου εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, 414). This thought is more definitely and directly stated by Jesus during the Feast of Tabernacles which He attended in Jerusalem. His invitation to all who thirsted (tár τις διψᾶ, 757) to come to Him and drink was followed by the promise, founded on the phrase-ology and thought of the OT (Is 125 5811, etc.), that they who accepted would themselves become sources of blessing and satisfaction to their fellow-men ( $\pi \sigma r a \mu o l \ \epsilon \kappa \tau \hat{r} \beta \kappa \sigma \lambda l a \beta, \kappa.\tau.\lambda.$ , 728). 'He who drinks of the Spiritual Rock becomes in turn himself a rock from within which the waters flow to slake the thirst of others' (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.). It is impossible not to see in this living relationship between Jesus and believers the foundation upon which must ultimately rest all human activities, as they display themselves in the service of the race.

J. R. WILLIS.

THISTLES.—In the NT thistles (τρίβολοι) are mentioned twice (Mt 716, He 68 RV). The term, however, is loosely employed, and probably embraces several genera of spinous plants, in which Palestine is peculiarly rich. In Hebrew there is a very extensive and varied nomenclature, about twenty terms being employed which denote prickly shrubs or weeds; but in many instances the precise meaning is unknown, while in many others the words are used in the most general way. Tristram, who goes very fally into the matter (Nat. Hist. of Bible, 423-432), identifies Heb. hōāh with the common thistle (Carduus) and dardar with knapweed (Centaurea). Of the former there are many species, the most common among them being: (1) Notabasis syriaca, a tall thistle with pink flowers; (2) the yellow spotted thistle (Scolymus maculatus); and (3) Carthamus oxycanthus, which has a yellow flower. Of the latter there are also many species, notably the star-thistle (Centaurea calcitrapa). These plants were exceedingly troublesome to the farmer, the corn-fields often being overrun with them.

The only reference to thistles which occurs in the Gospels is in our Lord's question, 'Do men gather . . . figs of thistles?' (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>).

HUGH DUNCAN. THOMAS.—One of the twelve Apostles. (For the name see DIDYMUS). In the lists of the Twelve his name is always in the second group of four. In Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, where the names are not in pairs, he is eighth; so in Lk 6<sup>18</sup>, where he is coupled with Matthew. In Mt 10<sup>8</sup> he is seventh, coming before Matthew. In Acts 1<sup>18</sup> he is sixth, and is coupled with Philip. No incident is recorded of him in the Synoptics or in Acts; but he comes into some the synopties of in Acus; but he comes into some prominence in the later scenes in the Fourth Gospel. When Jesus is about to return to Judæa because of the death of Lazarus, and the disciples are afraid of Jewish hostility, Thomas says, 'Let us also go, that we may die with him' (Jn 1116). In the conversation after the Supper, Thomas inter-jects the remark, 'Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?' (145); and thereby elicits the great saying, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (14*). When Jesus appeared to the disciples on the evening of the Resurrection day, Thomas was absent, and was unable afterwards to accept the testimony, 'We have seen the Lord.' He must himself not only see the Master, but touch His body before he could believe (20<sup>24, 23</sup>). A week later Thomas is present when Jesus again appears; and then his doubts vanish, and he rises to the completest confession of faith recorded in the Gospels, 'My Lord and my God' (2025-29). Thomas is mentioned also in 212 as one of the group to whom Jesus appeared on the morning by the Lake-side.

Later traditions of Thomas, obviously of little value, are mentioned in Eusebius and in the Apocryphal Acts of Thomas. He is spoken of as a missionary to Parthia, or to India. Some traditions assign to him the honour of martyrdom; and his supposed grave was shown at Edessa in the 4th century.

The personality of Thomas has a clear and consistent expression in the incidents which the Fourth Gospel records. He belongs to the quiet, reflective group of the Apostolic company; and his temperament is that of a man who finds the best things too good to be true, and who usually imagines that the worst foreseen possibility will be realized. He requires direct personal evidence, and will not hastily accept the testimony even of his friends. Yet he is not lacking in devotion and love to his Lord. He will die with Him rather than desert His cause; and in his gloomiest days of unbelief he does not separate himself from the Apostolic company. Though not persuaded of the reality of the Resurrection, he keeps his old loyalty and love; and when the Master's presence is utterly sure, he gladly accepts the highest that the revelation of Christ implies. His unbelief was never a failure to respond to the spiritual truth and love brought to him by his Master; at most it was an inability to accept unexpected and marvellous external manifestations of that truth. 'In Thomas we have a man incredulous but tenacious; despondent but true; with little hope but much courage; sincere in love though perplexed in faith; neither rushing to the right conclusion as Peter might have done, nor rushing away from it into danger and dishonour as Peter did '(T. T. Lynch).

The seepticism of Thomas has a real apologetic

The scepticism of Thomas has a real apologetic value. It goes to disprove the contention that the Apostles were credulous persons easily misled by their hopes, and so deluded into a mistaken belief that their dead Master had spoken to them. Thomas believed because the fact which was too good to hope for became too certain to reject.

E. H. TITCHMARSH. THORNS.—Palestine is unusually rich in acanthous plants. As many as 50 genera and 200 species occur in Palestine and Syria, 'besides a multitude clothed with scabrous, strigose, or stinging hairs, and another multitude with prickly fruits' (Post in Hastings' DB iv. 753). In the OT references to thorns are numerous, and many different words are used to express them. vocabulary, though full, is very indefinite, many of the terms employed being as vague and general as our own English word 'thorns.' We have the as our own English word 'thorns.' We have the reflex of this uncertain terminology in EV, which renders almost indiscriminately by 'thistle,' 'thorn,' or 'bramble,' a single Hebrew word. In the NT three terms occur, viz.  $d\kappa a\nu\theta a$ ,  $\tau\rho l\beta o\lambda os$ , and  $\sigma\kappa \delta\lambda o\psi$ . The last-named is found only in 2 Co  $12^7$  'There was given to me a thorn  $(\sigma\kappa\delta\lambda o\psi)$  in the flesh,' but in this instance the rendering should rather be 'stake' or 'pale.' The second (τρίβολος) has already been explained (see THISLES). It remains that we should consider ἄκανθα (Mt 716 137.22, Mk 47.18, Lk 646 87.14, Jn 192, He 62), which is invariably translated 'thorns.' Strictly speaking, this term denotes Acanthus spinosus, a showy perennial with deeply indented and spiny leaves, and bearing white flowers tinged with pink. In the NT, however, it is a quite general term for all thorny or prickly plants, and is applied to bushes and weeds alike. alike. Among the most common are thorny Astragali, which abound in the higher mountainous regions, and many species of Acacia, Eryngium, Rhamnus, Rubus, Solanum, etc. Some of them, such as Poterium spinosum and Rhamnus punctata, are found in all parts of the country. In our Third Gospel mention is made of the bramble ( $\beta \acute{a} ros$ , Lk 6<sup>4</sup>). This may quite possibly be the common bramble (Rubus fruticosus), which is found in many parts of Palestine. It is noteworthy, however, that, except in this one passage,  $\beta$   $\delta\tau$  or is always rendered 'bush,' and is used only of the 'burning bush' of Moses (Mk 1228, Lk 2037) etc.). The corresponding Heb. word (אָסָר) is similarly restricted in its use. As the bramble is not found on Horeb (Sinai), it has been thought by some that the 'bush' was a kind of acacia. For the crown of thorns which was set in mockery on the head of Christ (Jn 19²), see CROWN OF THORNS.

Much might easily be said regarding the symbolism of thorns in the Scriptures. But it may be sufficient merely to note that they were regarded as the direct consequence of human sin, and so became the natural symbols of sin and the sufferings in which it issues (Gn 3<sup>18</sup>, Nu 33<sup>55</sup>, Pr 22<sup>5</sup> etc.). In the light of this symbolism there is an apt pathos and beauty in the fact that Christ was crowned with thorns (see Cox, An Expositor's Note Book, 349 ff.; and Earl Lytton, Fables in Song, i.).

THRONE (θρόνοι) is a term applied, first of all, to the royal seat of a king; and, secondly, to the official seat of a judge or subordinate ruler. In the former sense it is employed of heaven as the throne of God (Mt 5<sup>24</sup> 23<sup>25</sup>). The Messianic reign of Jesus is foretold by Zacharias in the words, 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David' (Lk 1<sup>25</sup>). Jesus speaks of His own exaltation as the time 'when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory' (Mt 19<sup>26</sup> 25<sup>21</sup>). The universal dominion which He is to share with His Father is suggested by 'the Lamb in the midst of the throne' (Rev 5<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>), and by 'the throne of God and of the Lamb' (22<sup>25</sup>). So in He 8<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> Christ is seated 'on the right hand of the throne' of God. The promise given to the Twelve, of sitting on thrones of judgment (Mt 19<sup>26</sup> || Lk 22<sup>20</sup>), is practically given to all who overcome in the battle with evil (Rev 3<sup>21</sup>). In Col 1<sup>16</sup> 'thrones' are among the subordinate powers of the universe which owe their creation to Christ.

THUNDER ($\text{Sporrh}$) is but twice mentioned in the Gospels (Mk 317, Jn 1229). In mountainous Palestine, with the long deep gorge of the Jordan, it is perhaps the most awe-inspiring of natural phenomena. It seldom occurs save in the winter half of the year, and is almost invariably accompanied by rain. For the old Israelites thunder was the voice of God, with a meaning which persons specially gifted might understand. 'It seems probable that the "voice out of heaven" (Jn 1222 22) was a thunder-peal, as indeed most of those present thought, and that its significance was recognized and interpreted by Jesus alone' (Hastings' DB iv. 757b). The surname 'sons of thunder' given to James and John (Mk 317) disappears at once and finally from the records. On the available data no sure opinion can be formed as to why it was applied to them. As men in the East are called 'sons' of that which is most characteristic of them, there was doubtless something 'thundery' about them,—a tendency, e.g., to wrathful resentment of slight or injury (Lk 924). TIBERIAS (Τιβεριάς).—A city situated on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, founded by Herod Antipas, and named by him in honour of the Emperor Tiberius. The original inhabitants were foreigners, whom Herod either forced to reside in the new city or to whom he gave special inducements if they would. Our Lord, so far as is known, never visited Tiberias, it being His custom to avoid Gentile cities. The only reference to the city in the NT is Jn 6<sup>23</sup>, in which it is stated that 'there came boats from Tiberias unto the place

On the other hand, in the Bab. Talmud, Tiberius is sometimes identified with Bakkath, sometimes with Hammith, and sometimes with Chinnereth (cf. Jos 192). Jerome (Onom. 112, 28 ff.) identifies it with Chinnerath

2. History. Herod Antipas is supposed to have completed the building of Tiberias about A.D. 22. Ancient sepulchies were removed to make room for the new foundations, and accordingly the dews regarded the new city as legally unclose (cf. Nu 100s) Novertheless the town graw with great tapidity, and, before the downfall of Jerusalem had become one of the chief either of Palestine. Herod had made it the capital of Galilee, removing the wat of poveriment from Sopphoris, the forner empiral. The city was fortified by Josephus when commander in chief of Galilee (c. 3.1), (6). During the struggle of the Jows with Rome, its inhabit ants remained loyal to the national cause. however, Vespesian appeared before its walls with three legions, the citizens yielded without resistance. Vespoolan restored it to Herod Agrippa II., who stripped it of its political prestige by transferring the capital again to Sepphore. When Aprilipse died (v. b. 100), it fell directly under Roman Bliggetly after the destruction of Jerusalem (A to 70), l'illerian became the chief sont of the Jow cand of Jowish learning. According to Epiph anny, it was not long before the city was inhabited exclusively by Jows - In the "nd cent, the Sanhe drin, which had been shifted from Jerusalem to Januara and then to Sepphore, was established at Piberia, under the projudency of the celebrated Rabbi Judah the Holy

The winters are milds show being very rarely known. The Lake furnishes the only supply of water. The view from the city embraces the whole extent of the Sea of Gaullee except the S.W. extremity. Schurer speaks of Tiberias as the most beautiful spot in Gaillee, which, however, is an exaggeration. At present it is one of the four sacred cities of the Jews in Palestine, the others being Jerusalem, Hebron, and Safed. The study of the Talmud still flourishes in Tiberias.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

TIBERIUS. In Lk 3th it is stated that a word of God came upon John the Baptist, in the 15th year of the rule of Tiberius Cosar. It is by no means certain what year is indicated by this date. The sole rule of Tiberius began in A.D. 14; the 15th year of this sole rule would be A.D. 28. But it is more probable that we ought to count from the time at which Tiberius received power equal with that of Augustus over the provinces of the Empire, that is, from the end of A.D. 11; this brings us to A.D. 25 26 (Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? p. 199 ff.).

Tiberius Claudius Nero, named after his adoption Tiberius Julius Casar, on the monuments bears the name Tiberius Casar Augustus. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero (a Roman noble) and Livia (whom Augustus took to wife while her husband was still alive), and was born in u.c. 42. Constitutionally, the principate died with each Emperor, and the Emperor could not appoint a successor. Augustus got over this difficulty by appointing a partner or co-regent in the Empire: it was practically impossible to pass over such in electing to the principate. The Imperial powers were gradually conferred on this consort. M. Vipsanius Agrippa first held this position (died n.c. 12). Marcellus (who died n.c. 23) and Gains and Lucius Casar were marked out as successors. In their youth they were entrusted to the care of Tiberius, who was forced to divorce his wife and marry Augustus daughter Julia (B.C. 11). By this time Tiberius had proved himself an able soldier, and in n.c. 9 was raised to the position which Agrippa had occupied. Augustus had a dislike to Tiberius, and did not desire his succession. This obvious desire to use Tiberius selfishly, for his own ends. embittered the life of the latter, and in B.C. 6 he minority only stronged at one time tarther south. The present town is detended on the land sale by a will firm shoot with towers. There are the times of a one timposing castle at the NW corner. ## TIMEUS.—See BARTIMEUS.

TIME.—1. The word 'time' is used in the Gospels in a variety of phrases more or less indefinite. Probably the most definite expression is ἐν στιγμῆρονον, 'in a moment of time' (Lk 49). χρόνον is used of time in general (Lk 157 827, Mk 921, Jn 56), passing or having passed. In a similar sense we find ωρα (Mk 628) rendered 'day' in RV (see DAY). More definite is ἀπὸ τότε, 'from that time' (Mt 417 1621, Lk 1616), and ἔωτ τοῦ νῦν, 'until now' (Mt 2421 RV, Mk 1318). The most important word, however, is καιρότ, used invariably of a definite period or occasion. Three uses in this sense are noteworthy. (1) It is used to indicate the time of certain events in the ministry of Jesus (Mt 1125 122 141). (2) In a special sense we have the remarkable passage Jn 76.8 'My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready,' where the contrast is used apparently to emphasize the peculiar character of Jesus' mission and the lostility which it aroused in Jerusalem. (3) Most important is the use of καιρότ to indicate the dawn of a new epoch—πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρότ, 'the time is fulfilled' (cf. 1321, Lk 1269, Mt 163)—which the ministry of Jesus had inaugurated. This new era is contrasted with the past (Mk 115) and with the future (Mk 1020, Lk 1820; see artt. DAY [THAT], GENERATION). In a similar sense of world-period or era we have καιροί ἐθνῶν, 'the times of the Gentiles' (Lk 2124; but cf. c<sup>131</sup> ng, i.e. judgment-day, Ezk 303). καιρότ is also used of a season of the year (Mk 1113, Mt 1330; cf. Lk 1249).

2. Various methods of reckoning time were in existence at the beginning of the Christian era, and this fact makes it extremely difficult to locate events with any certainty. The time of day was reckoned at the outset mainly by physical considerations, temperature, etc. (Gn 38 181, 1 S 119, Job 2418), or by the sun's movements (Gn 1913 3241); the night in early Jewish history was reckoned by watches (see artt. DAY, HOUR, NIGHT, WATCH). The days of the week were numbered, not named.

The division of time into weeks was probably of Babylonian origin, and would be suggested by the moon's phases, although there is no trace of this influence either in QT or NT. The word for 'week' in the Gospels is σάββατον (Lk 18½). The use of the plural (Mt 28½, Mk 16², Lk 24½) may have arisen from the Aram. Sabběthā, 'the Sabbath' (Heb. Shabbāth), which at an early date gave its name to the whole week.

Of the larger divisions of time, the month, so familiar in OT times, is hardly mentioned in the NT (Lk 126.36, Jn 426). The Jewish month was lunar. Hence the usual Hebrew name for 'month' ($\vert_{n}$) is properly the 'new moon.' Three methods were employed to distinguish the month: (1) old Canaanite names, of which only four now survive; (2) numerals (Gn 711, Ex 191 etc.); (3) Babylonian names (see Hastings' DB iv. 765).

The Jewish year, like the month, was originally lunar, consisting of 354 days. But as this fell so far short of the full solar year, difficulty would naturally arise in celebrating feasts at the same time in each year. To avoid this, it became necessary to add an extra month at least once in three years. This was done by adding a second Adar (the Bab. name for the twelfth month), February-March, so contrived that the Passover, celebrated on the 14th Nisan (the first month), should always fall after the spring equinox. The exact method of doing this is somewhat obscure. But as a month in three years was hardly sufficient, a cycle of eight years was observed in which three months were intercalated, based on general observation of the seasons. This continued until some time after the Christian era, when a more perfect system, a cycle of nineteen years with seven months intercalated—the invention of an astronomer of Athens named Meton—was adopted. It seems unlikely that the Jews had any fixed chronological calendar in the time of Christ, but this is disputed (see Wieseler, Chronol. Synopsis of the Four Gospels, p. 401, etc.).

p. 401, etc.).

The method of reckoning years is a complicated and difficult subject. In accordance with Eastern ideas, that precision in reckoning events to which we moderns are accustomed was unknown. It was not considered necessary (cf. e.g. the loose phrases 'in the days of Herod the king,' Mt 2<sup>1</sup>; and 'Herod being tetrarch of Galilee,' Lk 3<sup>1</sup>); nor was it easily attainable. For it was possible for a writer in NT times to employ various systems of reckoning, and it was also possible to employ any one system in various ways. In addition to the various eras in which it was common to reckon, viz. the Olympiad era beginning B.C. 776; the Seleucid, used in the Books of the Maccabees, beginning B.C. 312; the Actian leginning B.C. 31; there was also the Roman method of reckoning by consuls or emperors (Lk 31), and the Jewish by high priests. Further, the year began at a different time in different countries, e.g. the Roman year began on Jan. 1, but in a few cases the emperors dated their years from the date of their election as tribunes of the people on Dec. 10. The Jewish sacred year began about the vernal equinox, as did also, in all probability, the years of the Seleucid era. But in Asia Minor a year beginning in autumn was also observed in ordinary use. These and other considerations render it almost impossible to give the precise date of any event even in NT times (see art. DATES). The one date given with any apparent precision is in Lk 31 date given with any apparent precision is in Lk 3' in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cresar.' This seems tolerably accurate, but the actual date intended depends on how St. Luke reckoned. He may have dated from the death of Augustus, Aug. 19, A.D. 14, counting that year as the first of Tiberius' reign, or from the beginning of A.D. 15, which was also a method of reckoning. Or he may have reckoned from Dec.
10, A.D. 15, when Tiberius assumed tribunician authority. Or, as the tribunician authority was interrupted in the reign of Tiberius. St. Luke may authority. Or, as the tribunician authority was interrupted in the reign of Tiberius, St. Luke may have dated his reign from the time when he assumed tribunician power the second time. In addition, there is the question whether St. Luke would reckon according to the Roman year from Jan. 1, or, according to local methods prevalent in Syria, from the autumn equinox.

TITHE.—On the tithe as a Jewish institution, see art. 'Tithe' in Hastings' DB.
Our Lord makes but three references to the tithes, and they are all of the observance of them by the Phariscos (Mt 23°, Lk 11° 18¹). In the first two passages He contrasts the minute exactness with which the Pharisees observe their less important and external laws of tithe with their careless disregard of the inner and more important virtues of justice, mercy, faith, and the love of God. In Lk 18<sup>12</sup> He illustrates how compliance with external requirements, especially when these are exceeded, as in the case of the Pharisees, and dissociated from the corresponding state of heart, breeds a culpable and overweening self righteousness. Our Lord in these references, as also in Mt 518, recognizes degrees of importance in the Law's demands. Minute observance of the less important does not excuse from attending to the greater, but neither does compliance with the greater absolve from the obligation to observe the greater absolve from the obligation to observe the leaver. 'This ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' Our Lord evidently thought the tithe, as well as the other OT institutions, of Divine origin, and binding upon the Jews of His day. At the same time, He foresaw a period when outward observances should give place to the more purely inward, as men should worship the Father in spirit and in truth (Jn 421-34). See also artt. Anisk and Rug. G. GOODSPEED.

TITLE ON THE CROSS, - The technical word rirkes is found only in Jn 1911; Mt 277 has airia, Lk 23m έπιγραφή, and Mk 15m ή έπιγραφή τῆς airia. Again, as regards the wording of the titulus, no two Gospels agree exactly Mt. has οδτός έστις Ιησούς ὁ βασιλεύς τῶν Ἰουδαίως; Mk. ὁ βασιλεύς τῶν Ἰουδαίως εξικ. ὁ βασιλεύς τῶν Ἰουδαίως οδτος; and Jn. Ιησούς ο Ναζωραίος ο βασιλεύς των Ιουδαίων.

The only important variation is in the case of Lk., where the TR reads ever very i.g. v 'l., probably from assimilation; to the form above given (Lk. 25%) is found in 481,, and is supported by the Latin of D very Judovina his caff. The so-called Gospel of Peter, taking the words as an insult to Jesus on the part of the Jews, reads: **ever seven i.g. ver Legach.**

It was customary at Roman executions, at least in the case of remarkable prisoners, for the charge in the case of remarkable prisoners, for the charge under which the prisoner was suffering to be written briefly on a tablet (σarl) covered with gypsum (γορφ Δληλιμμόνος, Suidas; of titulus qui causam paeno indicatri [Suct. Bilingual and trilingual inscriptions such as this were naturally common in the East under the Roman Empire—Grotius (on Mt 2737) mentions the case of the inscription on the tomb of the Emparor Gordian, which was written in no fewer than five languages, the five being the three above mentioned, together with Fersian and Egoptian.

The wording of the title differs in all the four Gospels, as above remarked, and many attempts have been made to harmonize or explain the varia-Wordsworth (on Jn 1919) has even supposed Nazareth, the King of the Jews.' Such an attempt at harmonizing the variations is absolutely unnecessary. All four Gospels agree in giving the important words which were offensive to the chief priests, viz. 'the King of the Jews.' Others have supposed the variations to be due to slight differences in the form of the title in the three languages. This, as a general idea, is possible, even probable; but, as regards detail, agreement seems to be nearly hopeless. The uncertainty appears greatest as to the Latin form, which Edersheim linds in Mt., Cook (Speaker's Com.) in Mk., Farrar in Lk., Grotius and Swete in John. In the case of the other two languages the more general consensus of opinion finds the Greek in Mk. and the Hebrew, or rather Aramaic, in John. It can be said with some confidence that it is more natural that c Naturalors should represent the word of the Aramaic inscription, as this method of description would have little point for those who would read the Greek or the Latin (cf. Sadler on Jn 19<sup>18</sup>) We have seen above that the form given by Mt. agrees with that of the Latin titulus mentioned in the letter of the Churches of Gaul. Assuming, then, that Jn. gives the Aramaic form and Mt. the Latin, the Greek must be looked for in Mk, as Lk agree-with Mt. in retaining the word cores. We may suppose, then, that the various forms were some-what as follows

This view agrees with Edersheim (Life and Tones, in 501 n), except as regards the order. He supposes the Latin to have been at the top and the training last, but this see nearly to the only exidence we have. He is certainly right in the attempt to give the Arama. TITTLE (Gr. κεραία [WH κεράα; see vol. ii. App. p. 151]).—Both the Gr. and the Eng. words occur in NT only in Mt 518, Lk 1617. κεραία ('little horn,' dim. of κέρα;) was used by Hesychius and other grammarians of the accents and diacritical marks in Gr., and the slight points and bends by which in Heb. such letters as z and z, z and z, z and z, and n are distinguished from each other. 'Tittle,' which is just 'title' in another form of spelling (the shorter form is used in all the Eng. VSS, except the Rhemish, up to and including the AV of 1611), comes from titulus, which was used in late Late to denote any mark or stroke whereby one letter was distinguished from another. It was adopted by Wyclif and Tindale to render κεραία—Luther similarly employing Tüttel (Titel in modernized Germ. spelling). Great importance was attached by the Rabbis to the little marks by which certain Heb. letters are distinguished from others that they closely resemble, and there are several Jewish sayings which declare that any one who is guilty of interchanging such letters in certain passages of the OT will thereby destroy the whole world (see Edersheim, LT i. 537 f.; cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. xi. 991.

On the lips of Jesus the saying, 'One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law till all be fulfilled' (Mt.5<sup>18</sup>), is startling; and a number of modern critical scholars are inclined to meet the exegetical difficulty by denying the genuineness of the logion—regarding it as an answer of the Evangelist himself to the Pauline anti-legalism, or even as a later Jewish-Christian insertion. Certainly, if the saying stood by itself, unqualified and uninterpreted in any way, there might be some warrant for such criticism, even although on textual grounds there is nothing to be said against the verse, which, moreover, reappears in Luke, though in a shorter form. But the very fact that our Lord proceeds in what follows to repeal the old Law at various points, and to substitute for its enactments precepts of His own (vv. 10.1 1807. 2007.), suggests that v. 16, so far from being likely on His lips to mislead His hearers utterly, would be understood easily enough as nothing more than an emphatic affirmation, in the Master's own characteristic style, of the rounded perfection of the ideal law. The objection that the reference to the jot and the tittle implies the written Law, and not the ideal law, has little force. One might as well say that when Jesus, in vv. 29. 20, bids His disciples pluck out their right eyes or cut off their right hands, He is urging them to a literal self-mutilation, inasmuch as hands and eyes are physical realities, not ideal things.

When we remember that Jesus was constantly charged by His enemies with being a law-breaker (Mk 216. 12. 24 etc.), we may see in the saying an utterance that has its polemical bearing. Immediately after (v. 29) we find Him declaring, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.' And elsewhere He affirms that the Pharisaic and Rabbinic legalism led to a positive dishonouring of the Divine law in the interests of a human tradition (Mk 78. 2. 12). There were thus two reasons why on polemical grounds Jesus should assert the claims of the OT Law in the strongest possible way: (1) Because His enemies themselves continually dishonoured it; (2) because they falsely accused Him of being indifferent to it. And apart from polemics altogether, there was this positive reason why He should 'magnify the law and make it honourable'—He knew (v. 17) that the very purpose of His coming was, not to destroy it, but to fulfil. And so in the striking language of paradox and even of hyperbole that He was wont to use when He felt strongly and desired to speak strongly, He exclaimed, 'For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all be fulfilled.'

The point of the saying clearly lies in the word 'fulfilled.' Christ comes, not to lower the standards of righteousness, as His enemies said, but to exalt them (cf. v.<sup>20</sup>). He comes, indeed, to repeal much in the old Law. The jots and tittles, be it observed, are to pass away when the Law is fulfilled. But He is to repeal the old by supplying the power for its true fulfilment, and by showing how the letter is transcended by the spirit. Regarded in this way, the saying is nothing more than an arresting utterance of the familiar Christian truth of the relation in spiritual things between the kernel and the husk, the calyx and the flower. Every fibre of the husk is precious—until the time comes for the living germ to be released. Each tiny, pointed sepal of the enfolding calyx must be preserved in its integrity—until the hour arrives for the bursting of the perfect corolls. Thus Jesus comes, not to destroy the least commandment (v. 19), but to fulfil it. His 'royal law,' as St. James calls it (Ja 26), the law of liberty and love, is an abrogation of the Divine Law that went before only in the sense in which the blossom abrogates the bud and the flower the blossom. See, further, art. Law, § 6.

TOLERATION, TOLERANCE.—The Lord Jesus Christ exemplified the highest forms of toleration and encouraged the virtue in His disciples (Mk 928-40). The Love had no dealings with the Samaritans.

Christ exemplified the highest forms of toleration and encouraged the virtue in His disciples (Mk 9<sup>32-40</sup>). The Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans (Jn 4<sup>9</sup>), yet Jesus laboured in Samaria (Jn 4, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>), healed and praised a Samaritan leper (Lk 17<sup>15-19</sup>), and chose a Samaritan, in preference to a Levite and a priest, to exhibit the meaning of the term 'neighbour' (10<sup>30-37</sup>). When His enemies asked, 'Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon?' He passed over the former and limited His reply to a denial of the latter charge (Jn 8<sup>481</sup>.). While by example and teaching He sought to build a bridge of kindly consideration from the side of Judaism, He built also from the other side, and declared in Samaria that the Jews were to be respected as the possessors of the means of salvation (Jn 4<sup>22</sup>; cf. Ro 3<sup>1.3</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>20-1</sup>). There are other kinds of tolerance manifested by the Lord. Persons of diverse views, habits, temperaments, were attracted to Him, so that Petrine and Johannine minds, the tax-gatherer Matthew and the tax-hater Simon, Nicodemus and Zacchæus, Martha and Mary, found in Him what they needed. His gracious comprehensiveness shielded the good in all. The ascetic Baptist (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>), who drew men into the wilderness (11<sup>7-9</sup>), received the highest commendation (Lk 7<sup>26-28</sup>) from Him whose scene of ministry was the street and the synagogue, and who honoured with His presence bridal and other feasts (Mt 9<sup>10-12</sup>, Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>). The Samaritan villagers (Lk 9<sup>22-26</sup>), whose intolerance James and John would have avenged, were left alone; thus were they punished, whereas they might have made their place glorious, as he did who lent the Lord the room in which the Holy Supper was instituted (22<sup>7-20</sup>). In this case we see the intolerance of the Gamaritans borne with, and (as in 9<sup>40-80</sup>) the intolerance of the disciples rebuked.

Again, though the Lord Jesus was frequently compelled to attack the Pharisees on account of their doctrines and practices. He showed them consideration by accepting their hospitality (Lk 7" 1177,; and He reminded His disciples, on an occasion when His enemies criticised His conduct (520-27), that those who preferred old ways were to be judged lemently (5<sup>20</sup>). The great parables of Lk 15, heades being a rebuke of the leaders in religion for neglecting to minister to publicans and sinners, are a gracious appeal to share in the delight of seeing men saved,—an appeal to the benevolence latent in the hearts of Christ's unscrapulous critics. He was tolerant to the intelerant. There is, moreover, a striking proof of the existence, in the minds of the Pharisees, of a strong belief in our Lord's toleration. No matter how vehemently He denounced their hypocrisy, they were convinced that He was free from animosity. Always they counted upon His forbearance. Of the reality of His power they entertained no doubt, though they could assign it to a Satanic origin (11<sup>13</sup>, Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>); and yet so confident were they of impunity, that they never anticipated injury at His hands, and they ridiculed Him openly (Lk 16<sup>14</sup>). They were aware that His graciousness alone spared them, and they knew that that graciousness would not fail. W. J. HENDERSON.

TOMB, GRAVE, SEPULCHRE.

The terms 'tomb' and 'sepulchre' are used in AV Indifferently to tr assesses, pages, and rapes 'Grave' is used at times (Mt 2752 23, Lk 1164, Jn 558 1117 21 39 1217) as rendering of assesses. This last is by far the most frequent Greek word, passes occurring only in Mk 62 6 1546, Lk 82 2333 241. The usage of the RV is as follows. 'Sepulchre' is reserved as tr. of rapes (it. 'burying-place'). Mt 287 29 783 54 62 251 [all the Gospel occurrences of energy]. In all the other passages 'tomb' is substituted for 'sepulchre,' or retained where A' already has it, as tr. either of passages 'Grave' thus disappears enterly in RV.

The forms of sepulture that a people adopts depend partly upon religious belief, partly upon climate, partly upon the geological structure of the country. Among the Hebrews, while the conreption of a personal resurrection arose only after the return from the Exile, the belief in Sheol as a place where the soul after death remained in some port of connexion with the body did much to determine the disposal of the corpse and the nature of the tomb. Early in Hebrew history the burial customs became stereotyped. Between the days of Abraham and Jesus they underwent no essential modification.

1. Religious belief demanded (a) that the body should be buried (see BURIAL). The soul of the unburied person was supposed to have no rest, and even in Sheol the souls of such lurked in the corners (Is 1413, Ezk 323). Any one, therefore, who discovered a dead body was under a sacred obligation to bury it. The soul of the body left untion to bury it. The soul of the body left unburied was regarded as almost under a curse (I K 14<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>23</sup>). (b) That members of the same ramily should be buried, if possible, in the same tomb (Gn 47<sup>2-33</sup> 49<sup>3-1</sup>, 2-8-19<sup>3</sup>, I K 14<sup>3</sup>, Neb 2<sup>3</sup>). For this reason the family tomb was often situated upon the family property. It was this dread of being buried apart from one's kith and kin that was one of the elements of the Hebrew's hatred of the sea (Rev 21) (c) That, except under very exceptional circumstances, the family sepulchre should be reserved for the burial of members of the one family. There are no Hebrew monumental inscriptions; but from Arangean inscriptions calling down curses on any who should intrude their dead upon the dead already lying there, we can measure the intensity of feeling on this point. To allow a stranger to be buried in the family and love (Mt 27°, Gn 23°). (d) That no body should be burned except as part of the punishment of the most odious of crimes (Lv 20¹4 21°, Jos 7°). To burn the body of a for was to do something that passed all the rights of belligerents (Am 2¹).

2. Climate demanded that interment should take place as soon as possible after death (Mt 92, Ac 5, 10 82)

3. The geological character of the country conditioned to a large extent the particular form of sepulture. The country is one long limestone ridge, and almost everywhere the hills are naturally terraced, while the soft rock is easily worked. But the simplicity of the Hebrew burial customs should be noticed. It is not a little remarkable that a people hving between two such civilizations. as those of Babylonia and Egypt, in which the cult of the dead played so large a part, should have remained uninfluenced by such ornate and imposing ceremonial. The Jews did not embalm their dead. They raised no elaborate sepulchres over them; indeed, the building of a sepulchral chamber was an innovation based on the practices of Greece. While this may have been due in some degree to the lack of artistic capacity in the Hebrew, it was due also to spiritual views of death, and to the dread of idolatry that had always characterized the Semitic race. Wherever, in Syris or Arabis, Greek or Roman civilization has left some representation of the human body, the traveller finds that the face at least has been disfigured by the nomads.

The forms of sepulture were these :- (a) The simplest, though not the commonest, form was an excavation in the rock surface, roughly corresponding to the shape of the human body, and covered with a slab of stone countersunk till it was level with a siab of stone countersink till it was level with the ground. All over Syria these primitive graves are to be met with. The Jews were most careful to keep the stone whitewashed, lest any should unwittingly walk over the grave and so incur ceremonial defilement. This kind of burial is referred to in Lk 11th. Woe unto you, same and Director for the grave and so incur ceremonial defilement. and Pharisess, hypocrites, for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them ' (b) A chamber was excavated in the limestone rock-face, and long narrow recesses, perhaps six feet by two, were cut into the rock at right angles to the face. bodies, covered with the samplest of grave clothes (Mt 27%), Jn 1144, were thrust into these. The recesses were known as kokim, and were frequently made of double walth, intended for the reception of two bodies Sometimes, but very generally it had several. It might, as in the case of the Tombs of the Kings and the Tombs of the Prophets, have one chamber opining off another, each chamber having many letter. Three other forms of sepulture are in reality only modifica-tions or combinations of these two main modes already mentioned. (c) Shelf tombs. Inside the chamber the recess for the body, instead of running on at right angles to the wall, was simply out parallel with the wall, and formed a shelf on which the body was laid. The notable thing about many of these shelves is their narrowness. (d) The slielf was sometimes exerciated so as to form a trough in which the body was laid. (c) In the floor of the clain ber itself, or in the passage leading from one chamber to another, a grave might be cut, as in (a), and covered with a slab it was in one of those chamber tombs that our

Lord was laid (Mt 27%, Mk 15%, Lk 23%), and disused tombs of this kin, were used as places of abode by the outcast and the homesess (Mk 52) tomb was a sign of the very greatest magnanimity | To prevent desecration by wild beasts, the tombs TONGUE TORCH 735

were often cut in almost inaccessible places; and ancient tombs in the Kidron Valley and in the face of Mount Quarantania are used even now as cells by anchorites, who may be seen climbing by ladders to and from their abodes. This form of sepulture in chambers was used also by the tribes of the desert. Doughty found such tombs at Medain Salih.

'The mural locult in the low hewn walls of these rudely four-square rooms are made as shallow shelves, in length as they might have been measured to the human body, from the child to the grown person. . . In the rock floors are seen grave-pits, sunken side by side, full of men's bones, and bones are strewed upon the sanded floors. . . In another of these monuments I saw the sand floor full of rotten clouts, shivering in every wind, and taking them up, I found them to be those dry bones' grave-clothes '(Arabia Deserta, i. 108).

In the time of Christ the protection of the tombs was comparatively easily secured. The door of the sepulchre was made intentionally small, and was closed by a great stone, sometimes circular, that ran in grooves in the rock. Ceremonial defilement was guarded against by whitewashing the stone at the door of the sepulchre every spring (Mt 2327). In Lebanon the present writer saw a tomb which had been excavated in the rock-face from a point below the normal level of the soil. After a body had been interred, the stone was replaced in the entrance, the earth was tossed back against the door, and all trace of the tomb was obliterated. This special precaution may have been peculiar to a district where wild animals were common. A tomb was never opened save for a fresh interment. It is this that gives point to St. Paul's saying (Ro  $3^{12}$ , cf. Ps  $5^9$ ): 'Their throat is an open sepulchre' ( $74\phi os$ ), i.e. at every opening of their mouth they bury, by slander and detraction, some one's fair fame. On the Holy Sepulchre see GOLGOTHA.

nas ethical and emotional qualities (Ps 120-2120-), it performs acts of worship (Is 45<sup>28</sup>, Ro 14<sup>11</sup>, Ph 2<sup>11</sup>).

2. Language (Mk 16<sup>17</sup>, Ac 2<sup>8</sup>).—In this sense it forms a counterpart to deed and actuality (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>18</sup>). In RV of Ac 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>40</sup> 22<sup>2</sup> 26<sup>14</sup> 'language' is substituted for AV 'tongue' as tr. of didherros, local and provincial speech. Language formed the first expectation this speech. formed one of the first antipathies that the preaching of the Kingdom encountered, and one of its earliest triumphs was in the discovery and de-claration that in the new citizenship there was

a. Index of nationality, Rev 59 146, being thus equivalent to 'race,' 'people,' 'humanity.'

In keeping with the important influence attached to language, Christ charged His disciples to avoid to language, Christ charged His disciples to avoid the state of the stat unloving, untruthful, and irreverent speech (Mt 5<sup>22, 33-37</sup>). He trusted the defence of Himself and His teaching to the power of right words (Lk 1211. 12), and the future extension of His Kingdom to the proclamation of a definite message (Mt 10<sup>27</sup> 28<sup>19</sup>). G. M. MACKIE.

TOOTH (odoo's).—1. In legal compensation.—The tooth was the least important of the particulars enumerated as exemplifying the exaction of like for like (Ex 21<sup>24</sup>, Lv 24<sup>20</sup>, Dt 19<sup>21</sup>). Under primitive conditions of social life, this law acted mercifully in repressing wanton disregard of life and limb in the relationship of master and slave, and of the strong towards the weak generally. It also in-culcated respect for the body by the compensation awarded when any mutilation had been inflicted or disability incurred. Although the item of loss was in itself insignificant, the claim connected with it lay within the area and application of a great principle, which by its recognized standard of liability protected both parties, and prevented private abuse. It thus in due time formed part of the boundary line of an outgrown ideal, the transcending of which led at once and dean itely into the Kingdom of the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>28, 29</sup>).

the Kingdom of the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>28, 29</sup>).

2. In emotional expression. — Gnashing of the teeth, with weeping and wailing (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>42, 50</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> etc.), is the physical expression of regret over remembered advantages and opportunities lost. It was also, a sign of evil possession (Mk 9<sup>18</sup>), and a manifestation of malignant hatred (Ac 7<sup>54</sup>). Among the modern inhabitants of Palestine, on account of the similarity in physical accompaniment, the same Arabic word is used to indicate both violent indignation and the sorrow of bereavement. When a forgotten promise or matter of When a forgotten promise or matter of neglected duty is suddenly recollected, or it is discovered that a grave mistake has been committed, Orientals indicate their feeling of annoyance and regret by slapping the hand on the thigh (Jer 31<sup>19</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>12</sup>), and by thrusting the knuckle of the forefinger into the mouth, as if instinctively seeking something on which to press and clench the teeth.

G. M. MACKIE.

TORCH.—In the six passages in which the word 'torch' occurs in the Gospels (AV and RV), once in the text (Jn 18<sup>3</sup>) and five times as an alternative rendering in the margin (Mt 25<sup>1.36.71</sup>), it answers to the Greek λάμπας, which in the LXX represents the Hebrew lappid in Gn 15<sup>17</sup>, Ex 20<sup>18</sup>, Jg 7<sup>16.20</sup> 15<sup>41</sup>, Job 41<sup>19</sup>, Is 62<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 1<sup>13</sup>, Dn 10<sup>8</sup>, Nah 2<sup>4</sup>, Zec 12<sup>6</sup>. Now the regular meaning of lappid is 'torch,' by which it is mostly rendered in the OT either in the text or in the margin. This meaning fits in very well with the context in Jn 183, but seems unsuitable in the other passages, where a light fed with oil is required. Probably we are to think in them of a lamp borne on a pole, and therefore bearing some resemblance to a torch, or of a torch fed with oil in some way from time to time. .The use of the former is attested for Arabs in the Middle Ages by a statement to which Lightfoot called attention (Works, ed. 1684, vol. ii. p. 247), found in the medieval lexicon 'Aruch, and, on the authority of Rabbi Solomon, in a gloss on the reference to lappid in Kelim, ii. 8. It has been often cited or referred to, but a literal translation from the gloss may be of interest:

It is a custom in the land of Ishmael for the bride to be con-It is a custom in the land of isnimal for the bride to be conducted from the house of her father to the house of her husband in the night before she goes into the huppah (cf. Ps 194), and for ten poles to be borne before her, on the top of each of which is a sort of saucer of brass containing pieces of garments and oil and pitch—these are kindled, and give light before her.

The other custom, the use of torches fed with oil, is said by the German writer, Ludwig Schneller, who was born in Jerusalem, and was for a time a minister in Bethlehem, to be in force in the Holy Land at the present day. These torches consist of long poles, round the upper end of which are wrapped rags saturated with olive oil. Unless fed with fresh oil, they burn down in less than a quarter of an hour (Evangelienfahrten, p. 460). The maidens of Bethlehem, says the same writer (ib. p. 459), assemble at sunset on the occasion of a marriage, and move with degree and some through marriage, and move with dance and song through the street to the house of the marriage festival bearing torches in their hands. Bauer also (Volksleben im Lande der Bibel, p. 94) mentions the use of oily torches by the women who go out to meet the bridegroom. On the other hand, Robinson Lees (Village Life in Palestine<sup>2</sup>, p. 87f.) affirms that small earthenware lamps are still carried in villages by the virgins who go to meet the bridegroom, together with little jars containing an additional supply of oil. He admits, however, that torches are used in the cities. With our presen slender knowledge of the marriage customs of the Jews in the time of our Lord, it is impossible to determine exactly the nature of the torches or lamps of the parable, but the balance of probability seems to incline to some kind of lamp-torch lifted high into the air. W. TAYLOR SMITH.

TORMENT.—The literal and figurative references to suffering in the Gospels are to be distinguished.

1. In the natural sense of pain caused by disease the words βάσανος and βασανίζειν are used (Mt 424 86); also, of evil spirits anticipating Christ's displeasure (Mt 829||). Similarly, the use of the word 'tormentors' (βασανισταί) by Christ (Mt 1834) must be taken as a reflexion of well-known severities of the time; cf. 'cut him asunder' (with scourging) in Mt 2451. It has not been an infrequent occurrence that cruelties have been inflicted on prisoners with a view to inducing their friends to raise the sum of money demanded for their release.

2. The one example of the figurative use of the word in the Gospels is in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>2-28</sup> βάσανος, 'torment'; δδυνᾶσθαι, 'to be tormented'). Christ addressed the startling language of this parable to men who were hurting their souls by covetousness. To pierce the hard crust of complacency born of wealth He used the heaviest strokes of threatening; and, choosing language that was most fitted to cause a smart to the softness of their luxury, He spoke of torture, agony, and fire. Ethical truth has always to be expressed in terms of physical sensibility, and these were things His hearers could understand. Christ read off to them in vivid words what their vision was too dull to see,—the penalties attached to their sin by the law that 'Justice founded and eternal Love.'

T. GREGORY.

TOUCH.—The word 'touch' is always associated in the Gospels with Christ Himself, except in one instance. The exception is Lk 1146 'Ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers,' a passage requiring no exposition.

passage requiring no exposition.

I. CHRIST'S TOUCH.—1. Christ's touch of healing.—Christ habitually established outward contact with the sick as a sign and means of healing. Besides the word ἄπτεσθαι, 'touch,' there are used such phrases as ἐπιτιθέναι τὴν χεῦρα, 'to lay the hand upon,' and κρατεῖν τῆς χειρός, 'to take by the hand.' It might at first be supposed that there was a slightly more mediatorial significance about the latter phrases, as though our Lord were rather acting as the delegate of another than on His own authority, but it will be found, on examination of parallel passages, that this distinction cannot be observed. The wide extent of Christ's contact by touch with human malady is seen as soon as the passages recording this act are enumerated. By a touch only, recorded in its simplest form (ἄπτεσθαι), Christ healed a leper (Mt 8³), fever (ν.¹⁵ where Mk 1³¹ has κρατήσας τῆς χειρός), blind people (ε.g. Mt 9²²), the ear of Malchus (Lk 22²¹). By a touch, recorded in its stronger form of grasp or imposition of hands, He healed one deaf and dumb (Mk 7³³), the blind man at Bethsaida (8²²-²²), a woman with a spirit of infirmity (Lk 13<sup>18</sup>), the epileptic lad (Mk 9<sup>27</sup>), many divers diseases (6<sup>8</sup>), and the dead daughter of Jairus (Mt 9<sup>25</sup>).

2. Christ's touch, other than of healing.—Here four instances are to be noted: the arresting touch laid upon the bier of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 714 ήματο τῆς σοροῦ); the upholding touch or grasp offered to Simon Peter upon the sea (Mt 14<sup>31</sup> ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα ἐπελάβετο αὐτοῦ); the encouraging touch laid upon the disciples after the Transfiguration, when 'he touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid' (Mt 177 ἡματο αὐτῶν; cf. Rev 117 'he laid his right hand [ἐθηκε τὴν δεξιάν] upon me, saying, Fear not'); the touch of blessing vouchsafed to the children brought by their mothers (Mt 19<sup>16</sup>

The Incarnation itself has been truly described in one of its aspects as God's coming into touch with men, or God's putting Himself where men can touch Him. St. Paul says that men 'seek the Lord, if haply they may feel after [lit. 'handle'] him'  $(\psi\eta\lambda a\phi\eta\sigma\epsilon \epsilon a\nu$ , Ac  $17^{27}$ ); and one purpose of the Incarnation is that in Christ this desire may be satisfied. And, accordingly, to recognize something symbolic about the 'touches' of Christ mentioned in the Gospels, is no mere exercise of fancy.

(1) In the instances recorded above we are, as a first step, permitted to see the broad fact of Divine love seeking friendly contact with those for whom it cares. Our Lord is not ashamed to call men brethren. He lays His hand upon the bier; takes children in His arms; holds up a sinking disciple; encourages by touch as well as by word those who otherwise are overwhelmed by fear. Thus we see already an acted parable of how in the Incarnation our Lord 'taketh hold of the seed of Abraham' (He 2<sup>16</sup> επιλαμβάνεται, the word already quoted of Jesus 'catching' Peter on the waves to hold him up). In Christ, 'God put on the garment of humanity, and drew near in person, that we might clasp Him as a kinsman in our arms' (Ker, Scrmons, 1st ser. 191). Instead of the spoken 'word' of the OT prophets, addressed only to the hearing, there is now the living 'Word,' meeting the lives of men in warm and friendly contact.

(2) But a further and deeper truth suggests itself when we pass to the many records of Christ's touch of healing. There we see what might be called the victorious vitality of the Incarnate Saviour, whose touch represents not only a sign of friendliness, but the opening of a channel of life-imparting power. If it be true that the 'fundamental meaning of the symbol' of laying on of hands in the OT—on an offering, a criminal, a young disciple, etc.—was 'identification by contact' (Swete in Hastings' DB iii. 85°), then even to the self-consciousness of Jesus there must have been something deeply significant about the deliberate touch or imposition of hands on others. It meant that He identified Himself with them in their weakness; and that He identified them with Himself in His superabounding life. 'He touched nothing which He did not'—heal. Christ said to men, 'Because I live, ye shall live also' (Jn 141°). He revealed this Divine power amid immense variety of malady, and amid the human helplessness of many of the cases.

(3) Still another step is offered to us when we observe that Christ healed by touch such a disease as leprosy, where contact with the polluting ailment was distinctly forbidden by the Levitical law (Lv 13th). For here we see a vivid representation of Christ's identification with mankind, not only in weakness but in defilement. To touch the blind or deaf was the act of a Divine physician; but to touch the leper was more than this—it was the act of One who could triumph over pollution, who could come in contact with defilement and yet not be defiled. 'Another would have defiled himself by touching the leper: but He, Himself remaining undefiled, cleansed him whom He touched; for in Him health overcame sickness, and purity defilement, and life death' (Trench, Miracles, 233). Thus the life revealed in the Incarnation not only sustains and heals, but delivers from the guilt which it is not afraid to meet in closest contact.

(4) Finally, in many of the instances we can discern in Christ's touch an admirable means of discern in Christ's touch an admirable means of suggesting the presence of a Healer, and so of challenging faith. 'Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you' (Mt 929). The touch of our Lord must often have been of the nature of a challenge. It provoked attention, proffered help, and awaited response.

II. TOUCHING CHRIST.—The occasions on which men are recorded in the Cospula to have touched men are recorded in the Gospels to have touched, or sought to touch, our Lord may be arranged as follows. The principle guiding the arrangement will be referred to when the instances have been collected.
